It is a most singular fact that Unitarianism, which has been considered the faith of the educated and cultivated in other lands, and, as has been said, so began in Poland and Hungary, should have found at last its sole support among the Szeklers. For they are not even of Aryan descent, but of Turanian, cousins of the Turks, whom they have had to fight so often. When the dreaded Huns swept down upon the Roman empire in the fourth century A.D., under Attila, and rushed, panic-stricken, back again after their terrible defeat at Chalons in 434, one fragment remained among the hills of Transylvania. Here they were when the Huns came again in the ninth century, under the name of Magyars, and began the history of the Hungarian nation; and here they have been ever since, as the bulwark of Hungary and of Christendom against the Turks.

It was this singular race that received and kept the Unitarian faith when Polish scholars and Hungarian nobles surrendered it. Whether monotheism was in their blood, as it was in that of their cousins, the Turks, and of other Asiatic stocks, is a question that leads us too far back into the mists of prehistoric times to be answered; but the Szeklers have clung to it with such constancy and courage as to suggest some deep affinity. The story of their loyalty has no parallel in Unitarian annals, and ranks with that of the Waldenses.

There are few stories in religious history so thrilling as that of the villages of Bág-yon and St. Gerlitz, when the Catholics were taking forcible possession of the Unitarian churches of the land. They took advantage of the absence of the men from these places, and made a bold assault upon the sanctuaries. But the women rushed in and defended them through the windows and doors, and held them till masculine help arrived. In the brave but ill-fated revolution under Kossuth in 1848, the Szeklers showed their love of liberty afresh, though the Wallachs attacked them in the rear; and nothing was more thrilling in my visit than to clasp hands with some of "Kossuth's hussars,"—fine types of manhood, with the Hungarian costume, especially the long black coat, buttoned to the throat and crossed by loops of braid, or "frogs." It was hard to realize that the quiet and gentle farmers whom I met, or the courteous nobleman who sat at my side at one of the banquets, and could trace his pedigree far back through the centuries by his "documente," were the descendants of the wild and savage Huns whom Gibbon describes so vividly; but their whole history has shown that, when there was fighting to be done, especially for liberty, the spirit of Attila was very much alive in them. This indomitable constancy has been applied to religious liberty also, and to the defence of their Unitarian faith.

This natural loyalty has been preserved and economized by a very compact organization. Unitarianism elsewhere is individualistic: here it is socialistic. We in New England are Congregationalists of the Congregationalists; but the Unitarians of Hungary are essentially Presbyterians, though even more absolutely governed. The congregations have almost no independence. They are controlled by a body which they have no voice in electing. Their ministers are appointed by the bishop, from three candidates whom they present to him, though he usually takes the one who had the largest number of votes from the congregation. In certain circumstances his power of appointment is absolute. The Consistory also fixes, or may fix, the amount of the minister's salary. The separate congregations are governed each by a body called the "Inner Men," who are the pastor, schoolmaster, and certain laymen. The churches are grouped into districts; and the "Inner Men" of a district constitute the District Assembly, which elects the dean, or superintendent, and other officers, and manages the affairs of the district. Above these bodies stands the Consistorium, with about three hundred members,—a close corporation, filling its own vacancies or adding new members by the nomination of the deans or of the bishop. The Consistorium is the governing and legislative body of the church. Meeting once a year in Kolozsvár, it is the Ecclesiastical Council. Meeting every Sunday, except the first of the month, in the same city, it is the Representative Council, representing the church to the government. Meeting every four years with some district, it is the Synod, with power to ordain ministers and to elect the bishop and certain lay officers. The bishop is its executive officer, largely under its control nominally, but, if he is a man of power, capable of moulding its action to a large degree.

Of the eight districts, six entertain the Synod in pairs, the other two alone, so that there are five meetings in a series, covering twenty years. This year the Synod met in the little village of Bölön, not far from Kronstadt, in the south-western part of Siebenbürgen.

Leaving Kolozsvár in the very early morning, a ride of about eight hours brought us to the station of Apácz, where we were to alight. Here, to me at least, accustomed to the cooler manners of Western Unitarianism, there was a most delightful surprise. No sooner did the bishop show his face at the door of his car than a shout arose from a large crowd of men by the side of the train. At their head were Hungarian flags, and several ministers clad in trailing robes of black silk, faced with velvet. As the bishop approached them, the dean of one of the entertaining districts greeted him with a hearty address of welcome. The bishop replied with grace and fitness, as even one to whom the words were unintelligible could see by the effect upon his hearers. Then we were placed in open carriages drawn by four horses each, followed by a long line of other vehicles.

Fifty or sixty young men on horses took their places ahead, and we galloped and rolled along the road to Bölön. We could see the new Templum far ahead, shining fresh and white on the top of its hill. Along the road the peasants came to their gates or lined the fences, smiling or waving welcome to the good bishop. Soon we halted, however, at a little village, where children were singing the "Austrian National Hymn," and, on alighting, were received with another address of welcome, to which the bishop again replied. Meantime our carriages had been so loaded with bouquets and wreaths of flowers—roses, mignonette, zinnias, and others, all familiar to American eyes—that we could hardly find room for ourselves. Another drive, through clouds of dust and lanes of smiling people, brought us to the foot of the hill on which the church stands, and under a fine triumphal arch of flags and flowers. Here the dean of the other district made a third address of welcome; and then the pastor of the place, Rev. Salomon Csifó, welcomed the brethren of other lands in the person of the American. This was done in excellent English, but with a poetical fervor such as is seldom heard in English lands. Mr. Csifó is one of the many young men who have received the whole, or a part, of their theological education in England, and who, as pastors or professors, are doing admirable service to their people, and making all English-speaking guests feel doubly at home.

After this we were conveyed to our respective hosts. Prof. Kovács and myself, to my great pleasure, were assigned to one of the Szekler farmers, Mr. Uzon (or Uzon Ur, to be quite Hungarian), who, with his most cordial wife, showed us the true hospitality for which the Szeklers have always been famous, the Unitarian Szeklers especially. The Szeklers call a large "help" of anything at table a "Unitarian piece." My hostess apologized for serving me with Indian meal mush and milk at breakfast, as being peasants' food; and I had some difficulty in convincing her that I had been brought up on it. Theodore Parker's brown bread in Italy came again to my mind. Not less acceptable was the paprikash chicken, which came as a second course; i. e., chicken fricasseed in butter and the Hungarian scarlet pepper, or papriká. In all things and in all respects the Uzonis gave us always a real "Unitarian piece."

Kenilworth, England.

THE FUTURE OF THE NEGRO.*

BY BOOKER T. WASHINGTON, PRINCIPAL TUSKEGEE NORMAL AND INDUSTRIAL INSTITUTE, ALABAMA.

Mr. President, Gentlemen of the Board of Directors, and Citizens:—

One-third of the population of the South is of the Negro race. No enterprise seeking the material, civil, or moral welfare of this section can disregard this element of our population, and reach the highest success. I but convey to you, Mr. President and Directors, the sentiment of the masses of my race, when I say that in no way have the value and manhood of the American Negro been more fittingly and generously recognized than by the managers of this magnificent Exposition at every stage of its progress. It is a recognition which will do more to cement the friendship of the two races than any occurrence since the dawn of our freedom.

Not only this, but the opportunity here afforded will awaken among us a new era of industrial progress. Ignorant and inexperienced, it is not strange that in the first years of our new life we began at the top instead of the bottom, that a seat in Congress or the State legislature was more sought than real estate or industrial skill, that the political convention or stump-speaking had more attractions than starting a dairy farm or truck garden.

A ship lost at sea for many days suddenly sighted a friendly vessel. From the mast of the unfortunate vessel was seen the signal, "Water, water! we die of thirst!" The answer from the friendly vessel at once came back, "Cast down your bucket where you are." A second time the signal, "Water, water, send us water!" ran up from the distressed vessel, and was answered, "Cast down your bucket where you are"; and a third and fourth signal for water was answered, "Cast down your bucket where you are." The captain of the distressed vessel, at last heeding the injunction, cast down his bucket; and it came up full of fresh, sparkling water from the mouth of the Amazon River. To those of my race who depend on bettering their condition in a foreign land, or who underestimate the importance of cultivating friendly relations with the Southern white man who is their next-door neighbor, I would say, Cast down your bucket where you are. Cast it down in making friends in every manly way of the people of all races by whom we are surrounded. Cast it down in agriculture, in mechanics, in commerce, in domestic service, and in the professions. And, in this connection, it is well to bear in mind that, whatever other sins the South may be called upon to bear, when it comes to business pure and simple, it is in the South that the Negro is given a man's chance in the commercial world; and in nothing is this Exposition more eloquent than in emphasizing this chance. Our greatest danger is that, in the great leap from slavery to freedom, we may overlook the fact that the masses of us are to live by the productions of our hands, and fail to keep in mind that we shall prosper in proportion as we learn to dignify and glorify common labor and put brains and skill into the common occupations of life,—shall prosper in proportion as we learn to draw the line between the superficial and the substantial, the ornamental gewgaws of life and the useful. No race can prosper till it learns that there is as much dignity in tilling a field as in writing a poem. It is at the bottom of life we must begin, and not the top. Nor should we permit our grievances to overshadow our opportunities.

* Delivered at opening of Atlanta Exposition, Sept. 18, 1895.

To those of the white race who look to the incoming of those of foreign birth and strange tongue and habits for the prosperity of the South, were I permitted, I would repeat what I say to my own race, "Cast down your bucket where you are." Cast it down among the eight million Negroes whose habits you know, whose loyalty and love you have tested in days when to have proved treacherous meant the ruin of your firesides. Cast it down among these people who have, without strikes and labor wars, tilled your fields, cleared your forests, builded your railroads and cities, and brought forth treasures from the bowels of the earth, and helped make possible this magnificent representation of the progress of the South. Casting down your bucket among my people, helping and encouraging them as you are doing on these grounds, and to education of head, hand, and heart, you will find that they will buy your surplus land, make blossom the waste places in your fields, and run your factories. While doing this, you can be sure in the future, as you have been in the past, that you and your families will be surrounded by the most patient, faithful, law-abiding, and unresentful people that the world has seen. As we have proved our loyalty to you in the past in nursing your children, watching by the sick-bed of your mothers and fathers, and often following them with tear-dimmed eyes to their graves, so in the future, in our humble way, we shall stand by you with a devotion that no foreigner can approach, ready to lay down our lives, if need be, in defence of yours, interlacing our industrial, commercial, civil, and religious life with yours in a way that shall make the interests of both races one. In all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress.

There is no defence or security for any of us except in the highest intelligence and development of all. If anywhere there are efforts tending to curtail the fullest growth of the Negro, let these efforts be turned into stimulating, encouraging, and making him the most useful and intelligent citizen. Effort or means so invested will pay a thousand per cent. interest. These efforts will be twice blessed, "blessing him that gives and him that takes."

There is no escape, through law of man or God, from the inevitable:—

"The laws of changeless justice bind Oppressor with oppressed;
And, close as sin and suffering joined,
We march to fate abreast."

Nearly sixteen millions of hands will aid you pulling the load upward, or they will pull against you the load downward. We shall constitute one-third and much more of the ignorance and crime of the South, or one-third its intelligence and progress: we shall contribute one-third to the business and industrial prosperity of the South, or we shall prove a veritable body of death, stagnating, depressing, retarding, every effort to advance the body politic.

Gentlemen of the Exposition, as we present to you our humble effort at an exhibition of our progress, you must not expect overmuch. Starting thirty years ago, with ownership here and there in a few quilts and pumpkins and chickens (gathered from miscellaneous sources), remember the path that has led us from these to the invention and production of agricultural implements, buggies, steam-engines, newspapers, books, statuary, carving, paintings, the management of drug stores and banks, has not been trodden without contact with thorns and thistles. While we take pride in what we exhibit as a result of our independent efforts, we do not for a moment forget that our part in this exhibit would fall far short of your expectations but for the constant help that has come to our educational life, not only from the Southern States, but especially from Northern philanthropists, who have made their gifts a constant stream of blessing and encouragement.

The wisest among my race understand that the agitation of questions of social equality is the extremest folly, and that progress in the enjoyment of all the privileges that will come to us must be the result of severe and constant struggle rather than artificial forcing. No race that has anything to contribute to the markets of the world is long in any degree ostracized. It is important and right that all privileges of the law be ours, but it is vastly more important that we be prepared for the exercise of these privileges. The opportunity to earn a dollar in a factory just now is worth infinitely more than the opportunity to spend a dollar in an opera house.

In conclusion, may I repeat that nothing in thirty years has given us more hope and encouragement and drawn us so near to you of the white race as the opportunity offered by this Exposition; and here, bending, as it were, over the altar that represents the results of the struggles of your race and mine, both starting practically empty-handed three decades ago, I pledge that, in your effort to work out the great and intricate problem which God has laid at the doors of the South, you shall have at all times the patient, sympathetic help of my race. Only let this be constantly in mind: that, while from representations in these buildings of the products of field, of forest, of mine, of factory, letters, and art, much good will come, yet far above and beyond material benefit will be that higher good that, let us pray God, will come in a blotting out of sectional differences and racial animosities and suspicions, and in a determination, even in the remotest corner, to administer absolute justice, in a willing obedience among all classes to the mandates of law, and a spirit that will tolerate nothing but the highest equity in the enforcement of law. This—this, coupled with our material prosperity—will bring into our beloved South a new heaven and new earth.

THE SOUTHERN PRESS.

WHAT IT THINKS OF MR. WASHINGTON'S ADDRESS.

The speech of Prof. Booker T. Washington, president of the Negro Industrial School at Tuskegee, Ala., delivered in the opening exercises of the Atlanta Exposition, has attracted a great deal of attention, and deservedly so. Prof. Washington is a very intelligent man, and one who talks practical common sense. He appeared with the Citizens' Committee from the South before the Appropriation Committee of Congress in behalf of the Exposition appropriation, and his speech on that occasion attracted much attention. There is no nonsense or affectation about Booker Washington. In the very opening sentence of his speech he properly referred to his people as Negroes, and frankly gave tribute to the white men of the South as the Negro's best friend.—The Chronicle, Augusta, Ga.

The big hit which was made by Prof. Booker Washington in his speech at the opening of the Atlanta Exposition has raised general curiosity among the public to know something about this clear-headed Negro and his work. The average reader has noted the fact that he is at the head of an industrial school for Negroes in the State of Alabama, but few know more than that. It will be a surprise to many to know the dimensions of the work which he has in hand.—The Chronicle, Augusta, Ga.

He delivered his address in clear and incisive voice, which was heard by every one in the hall. Almost every sentence was applauded, and his speech was a great hit all the way through. His opening assertion that the recognition of the Negro race by this Exposition would do more to secure the friendship of the two races than anything which has happened since the Negro was emancipated was received with demonstrations of profound approval by both white and colored.—The News, Savannah, Ga.

The hit of the day was made by Booker T. Washington, the representative of the Negro race, who in a twenty-minute speech evoked greater applause than all the others put together. He seemed to have the ear of the audience, and pleased both whites and colored. His speech is considered an augury of the future friendship of the races.—The Register, Mobile, Ala.

The programme presented the remarkable spectacle of ex-Gov. Rufus B. Bullock, elected chief executive of the State by Republican votes during the reconstruction period, and now a leading citizen of Atlanta and director of the Exposition, acting as master of ceremonies, introducing in succession to a Southern audience Mrs. Joseph Thompson, president of the Woman's Board, and Booker T. Washington, the representative of the Negro race. This incident, coupled with the appearance of Negroes in carriages in the parade, and the presence of the Negro Building on the grounds, emphasized the recognition given to the race by this Exposition for the first time in the history of such enterprises.—The American, Nashville, Tenn.

Of all the speeches made at the opening of the Atlanta Exposition no one was more sensible and pertinent to the occasion than that of Booker T. Washington, the Negro president of the Tuskegee Institute in Alabama. In the course of a conservative, thoughtful address, full of wise and good counsel to his race, he told them that at the present time it was more important for members of his race that they should have an opportunity of earning a dollar in a factory than an opportunity of spending a dollar in an opera house. He covered the case, as every one South knows; and it is obvious to any one that it is the Negro's disinclination to acquire the training necessary to skilled labor that makes the majority mere ordinary from hand-to-mouth workers.—The American, Nashville, Tenn.

Some ultra-conservative people who have doubted the propriety of inviting a Negro to take a prominent part in the programme were enthusiastic in their praise of his speech, and it is generally conceded that its effect will be a happy one.—The States, Columbia, S. C.

Booker T. Washington of Tuskegee, who delivered the address on behalf of the Negroes at the opening of the Atlanta Exposition, is a Negro, proud of his race and an honor to it. His advice has always been in favor of harmony between the two races, and especially in favor of the betterment of his own race by the inculcation of habits of industry and economy.—The Advertiser, Montgomery, Ala.

The change is one that augurs well for the future of the Negro and of the country. It means that the Republican party, abandoning the Negro as a political issue, will leave the South to solve in the best way it can one of the most serious problems ever imposed upon a people. We may be sure that, in the process of solving it, the Negro's right to vote will become sacred just as soon as he has a moral right to take a part in the government of the country.—The Telegram, Macon, Ga.

Among the speeches made at Atlanta on Wednesday last, on the occasion of the opening of the Atlanta Exposition, none produced a more pleasing impression than that delivered by Rev. Booker T. Washington, a prominent colored man, and principal of the Tuskegee Normal Institute, in turning over the exhibit of the colored people to the Exposition management. The address was most temperate, and calculated to throw considerable light, for the benefit of our Northern critics, upon the relations existing between the races in the South. Mr. Washington admits, and the justice of his admission will be generally recognized, that in the South the colored race has full opportunity to engage in all lucrative and paying occupations,—a privilege not generally extended to him in the North, where Southern intolerance is so commonly paraded and dilated upon. The great majority of honest and humane people will read with interest these remarks of a sensible colored man, who has grasped more completely than most educated men of his race the great and salient truths connected with the race problem in this section. Were such views as he has voiced at Atlanta placed before the people of his race, instead of the misleading mouthings of selfish politicians, the race difficulty would be greatly simplified, and the working out of its solution would be robbed of much that is disagreeable and disheartening.—The Picayune, New Orleans, La.

In the most progressive and enterprising city of the South, in the midst of an assemblage composed largely of Southern people, a woman stood forth at the inauguration of a great industrial undertaking, and told of the share that women had taken in making it a success. It was not the first time, it is true, that such recognition had been accorded to women; but it was the first time that such a thing happened south of Mason and Dixon's line. It constituted the official concession of the South of the enlarged rights and privileges of the women of the land. Of equal, if not greater, significance was that part of the ceremonial which brought into the foreground the representative of the colored race. When Booker T. Washington stepped forward to address that vast assemblage, the respectful hearing accorded him testified the fact that the South has come to recognize and concede the fitness of the Negro as a citizen and as an agency in the moral and material progress of the country. It was a practical admission that the Negro is fit for other things than being a hewer of wood and a drawer of water. The masterly character of Mr. Washington's address, which has been generally pronounced the best effort of the day, is a legitimate source of pride to the race he represented. Time is the great leveller. It breaks down the barriers of prejudice, and under its influence the impossible of yesterday is the accomplished fact of to-day.—The Times, Washington, D. C.

It is surprising to see with what unanimity the press of [the country awards to Booker T. Washington, the representative of the colored people, the credit of having made the best speech at the opening exercises of the Atlanta Exposition. One reason of this may be that the speech was a surprise, because of the sentiments expressed by the orator and the excellent advice he gave to his race. The speech was an admirable one, and was heartily applauded all through its delivery. The South is willing to give the colored people a chance to show what they can do for themselves. In fact, she has given it to them. She has opened every profession, business, and occupation to them. If they fail, it will be because they lack the qualities necessary for success. They have the opportunity. It remains to be seen to what extent they will take advantage of it.—The News, Savannah, Ga.

Prof. Washington has shown himself an administrator of the first order; and we are not surprised that a man who could make such an astonishing success at the school at Tuskegee has been able to grasp the salient purposes in such industrial expositions as that at Atlanta, and present them in such order, with such force, and so eloquently as to surprise, instruct, and charm his audience.—The Commercial, Louisville, Ky.

While other men of his race have discoursed upon the right belonging to the colored people and the wrongs to which they have been subjected, Booker T. Washington has labored for the practical betterment and elevation of his people. As a moving spirit from the first in the establishment and maintenance of the Tuskegee Industrial School, he has held up the standard of practical, useful, available education for the colored people of Alabama, beginning with a handful of pupils, which has now increased to nine hundred attendants. He has sent out hundreds of working carpenters, blacksmiths, and other craftsmen; and so great has been the influence of these educated working people that the old one-room shanty, the old slave habitation in Alabama, is being supplanted by well-built cottages. Mr. Washington, laboring for his race, has deserved well of the country, and has vastly helped both races.—The Star, Kansas City, Mo.

When a Negro applies for work, it is not refused him in the South because he is a Negro. How is it at the North? In the South the Negro has as good opportunities for earning a support or accumulating property as the white man has. How is it at the North? Never yet have Negroes been driven from their homes in the South because they were trying to make an honest living. Never has a Southern State refused them protection in their legal rights. How is it at the North? Of course, the majority of the people of the North condemn the outrage recently perpetrated on the Negroes in Illinois. So do the majority of the white people condemn the lynchings that have sullied the honor of Southern States. Each section should seek to eradicate its own faults, and this will give both plenty to do.—Jacksonville (Fla.), Times-Union.

The address of Booker T. Washington, the representative of the Negro race, yesterday, has attracted the attention of all the country. Telegrams are pouring in from everywhere, and special correspondents have orders for articles as to Mr. Washington's history and life-work in education. The incident has called particular attention to the display which is now being installed in the Negro Building. Enough of it is in place to show in a very attractive way what the race can do in the higher class of handicraft.—The News, Savannah, Ga.

In all respects it was the most remarkable address ever delivered by a colored man in America, for it was the first time that one of that race ever took so prominent a part in any great national or international affair not of a political character. The speech stamps Booker T. Washington as a wise counsellor and a safe leader. It was a very dignified and eloquent oration; and, if it could reach the hearts and touch the minds of the colored people, it would undoubtedly accomplish great good. And yet it was an address levelled at the whites. It will reach these, and will go far toward narrowing, if not solving, the great problem known as the Negro question. The Negro can only be advanced as he deserves to be advanced. While he may have temporary success as a politician in an abnormal period, he must surely find his proper level; and his proper level is that which he has won and must win by the work of his hands and brain.—The Constitution, Atlanta, Ga.

We exaggerate nothing and deprecate nobody when we say that the most interesting and significant utterance made on the occasion of the opening of the Atlanta Exposition was made by Prof. Booker T. Washington, the principal of the Tuskegee (Ala.) Colored University. A great many speeches were made, and they received the attention and commendation they deserved; but none was so important as to its matter or so felicitous as to its style as the speech of Prof. Washington. A Negro himself, and speaking for the highest intelligence, the broadest thought, and the noblest purpose of his race in this country, Mr. Washington was the focus of an attention which no other orator received. What he said was so moderate, so sensible, so instinct with true patriotism, and withal so gracefully and so eloquently conveyed, that, as the New Orleans States' report of the occasion puts it, "he evoked greater applause than all the others put together." One such man as Booker T. Washington is worth a thousand of such noisy, contentious, and mischief-making charlatans as one hears in this city, exploiting their offensive vanity and agitating foolish remedies for fancied ills. He is doing noble and splendid work for both races. Both races may well be proud of him.—The Post, Washington, D. C.

Hon. Clark Howell, editor Atlanta Constitution, in an article in the New York World, September 19, said:—

To the Editor of the World:—

I do not exaggerate when I say that Prof. Booker T. Washington's address yesterday was one of the most notable speeches, both as to character and the warmth of its reception, ever delivered to a Southern audience. It was an epoch-making talk, and marks distinctly a turning-point in the progress of the Negro race; and its effect in bringing about a perfect understanding between the whites and blacks of the South will be immediate. The address was a revelation. It was the first time that a Negro orator had appeared on a similar occasion before a Southern audience.

The propriety of inviting a representative of the Negro race to participate in the opening exercises was fully discussed a month ago, when the opening programme was being arranged. Some opposition was manifested on account of the fear that public sentiment was not prepared for such an advanced step. The invitation, however, was extended by a vote of the board of directors; and the cordial greeting which the audience gave Washington's address shows that the board made no mistake. There was not a line in the address which would have been changed even by the most sensitive of those who thought the invitation to be imprudent. The whole speech is a platform on which the whites and blacks can stand, with full justice to each race.

The speech is a full vindication from the mouth of a representative Negro of the doctrine so eloquently advanced by Grady and those who have agreed with him that it is to the South that the Negro must turn for his best friend, and that his welfare is so closely identified with the progress of the white people of the South that each race is mutually dependent upon the other, and that the so-called "race problem" must be solved in the development of the natural relations growing out of the association between the whites and the blacks of the South.

The question of social equality is eliminated as a factor in the development of the problem; and the situation is aptly expressed by Washington in the statement that "in all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one as the hand in all things essential to mutual progress."

The speech will do good, and the unanimous approval with which it has been received demonstrates the fact that it has already done good.

CLARK HOWELL,
Editor of the Atlanta Constitution.

CONFERENCE NOTES.

It was promised in last week's "Conference Notes" that the excursion rates to the Atlanta Exposition from Washington would be obtained and published in this issue of the Register. The secretary has received these; and they are as follows: The Pennsylvania Railroad offers a twenty-day excursion from Washington to the Atlanta Exposition, at $19.25 a person, and at $14 a person to parties of ten. The Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad offers an excursion ticket at $14, good for twelve days, either all rail or by steamer from Washington to Norfolk, Va.

What with the Atlanta Exposition and the capital as sub-attractions, and this glorious October weather to make folk long to go on pilgrimages, there is every reason to believe that the attendance at Washington will be very large. Attention has already been drawn to the fact that many churches which last year were not represented at Saratoga have been among the first to appoint delegates to the coming Conference, which, owing to its place of meeting and to certain press arrangements that have been carefully made, will undoubtedly make itself felt all over the country as a most important and interesting religious convention.

Metzerott Music Hall,—so named for its proprietors,—where the Conference is to be held, has every accessory which Convention Hall at Saratoga lacked to make the oratory of the meetings a success. Its acoustic qualities are excellent, and there will be no reason why the speakers cannot say their wise and eloquent good things with every likelihood that they can be heard in all parts of the hall. This is a great desideratum to hearers as well as to speakers.

It is certain that no one will want to lose a word of the Thursday morning meeting, which is to be ushered in by a devotional service conducted by Rev. Edward Hale of Orange, N. J. This will be the spiritual high-tide meeting of the whole Conference, as its topics, "The Holy Spirit," "Incarnation," "Atonement," and "Forgiveness," easily promise.

The only accredited delegate to the Conference from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will be Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford, who in the past has been so actively identified with our Unitarian work in this country. He returns to us with added honors and renown, as one of the foremost leaders in the recent "Forward Movement" in London. One has only to read Dr. Herford's recently published book of addresses to see how important was his contribution to this movement across the water, which has put new life into the Unitarian churches of London.

So many applications have been received for an extension of Washington round-trip Conference tickets, to take in Atlanta and the Exposition, that Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb have now completed arrangements to this end. A personally conducted party will leave Washington, in Pullman vestibuled cars, Friday, October 25, at 11.15 A. M., reaching Atlanta Saturday at 6 A. M., and, returning, leaving Atlanta Tuesday, October 29, at 1 P. M. Headquarters at Atlanta will be the Kimball House; and price of round-trip tickets, all expenses included, Washington back to Washington, will be $48. All holders of Raymond & Whitcomb tickets who wish to visit Atlanta independently can have their Washington tickets extended, and purchase round-trip tickets (transportation only), Washington back to Washington, for $15.

Religious Intelligence.

(Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.)

IMPORTANT Sunday-school announcements will be found on the 9th page.

REV. BROOKE HERFORD is to preach in Appleton Chapel, Cambridge, next Sunday, October 13, and on October 16 will give the "Dudleian Lecture," dealing with some aspects of the relation of Catholicism to liberalism.

PRISONERS' SUNDAY.—We call attention of ministers to the fact that the National Prison Chaplains' Association, at its recent meeting at Denver, respectfully ask all churches who can conveniently do so to observe the appointment, now of many years' standing in New York State, of the fourth Sunday in October, this year October 27, as "Prisoners' Sunday."

NEW HAMPSHIRE UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The autumnal meeting of the New Hampshire Unitarian Association will be omitted on account of the National Conference at Washington. Tickets to Washington and return, at reduced rates (the certificate plan), can be obtained at all the principal railroad stations in New Hampshire. Frank L. Phalen, Secretary.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Rev. Howard N. Brown, the new pastor, preached last Sunday morning, the church being opened for the first time since its renovation.

Second Church: Rev. Thomas Van Ness preached last Sunday on the subject of "Prayer."

In the Church of the Unity last Sunday Rev. M. J. Savage preached a discourse adapted to the season, entitled "Reaping-time."

Ministers' Monday Club: October 14, 10.30 A.M. Rev. Charles T. Canfield will preside. George W. Stone, Esq., treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, will confer with the ministers about finances. A full attendance is requested.

South Congregational Church: Owing to the severe sickness of Mrs. Hale and his son, Robert Beverly Hale, whose death is elsewhere reported, Dr. Hale was unable to occupy his pulpit last Sunday; and it was filled by Rev. C. C. Everett of Cambridge.

The Arlington Street Church has just issued a manual giving an account of the various organizations which are included in its activities, and a short but interesting account of the history of the church by Mr. Charles C. Smith. The new organ is completed; and with its fine choir, one of the best in the city, and Mr. Cuckson in the pulpit, the vesper services of this church, which are held every Sunday afternoon at 4 P.M., will undoubtedly be as popular as ever. Hereafter the chimes, instead of being rung in the old-fashioned way, will be played by the organist, Mr. Louis O. Thompson, the bells being connected by electricity with a key-board in the organ loft.

Christ Church, Dorchester: The Starr King Club, composed of the men of this parish, began the season with a most enthusiastic meeting last Thursday evening. The club has assumed the financial responsibility for the new parish paper and the insertion of the weekly press notices. At its next meeting the subject for discussion will be Henry D. Lloyd's "Wealth versus Commonwealth." The Sunday-school shows a gratifying increase in numbers. A most enjoyable excursion was made to Lexington last Saturday afternoon. Under the helpful guidance of Rev. C. A. Staples the various points of historic interest were visited, and the early scenes of the Revolution were brought before the imagination far more vividly than is possible from simply reading the printed narrative.

CONCORD, MASS.—Rev. Loren B. Macdonald was installed as pastor of the First Parish Church October 3. The invocation was by Rev. Alfred P. Putnam, and Rev. Carlton A. Staples of Lexington read from the Scriptures. The sermon by Rev. Samuel M. Crothers of Cambridge dwelt on the need of a religion which enables men to stand alone, feeling that the will of God is sustaining them. The prayer of installation was made by Rev. Charles C. Everett, D.D., of Cambridge. He referred very touchingly to the late Rev. Grindall Reynolds, a former pastor, and also referred to Rev. Benjamin Bulkeley, who was the last settled pastor. The right hand of fellowship was given by Rev. Francis B. Hornbrooke, who welcomed the new pastor to a town famous for its history and its great men, to a meeting-house of historic memories, to a succession of noble souls in the ministry, and to a faithful and loyal people. Rev. Edward A. Horton gave the charge to the pastor, and Rev. Thomas Van Ness the address to the people. The congregation then joined in singing the hymn, "One Holy Church of God appears"; and the benediction was pronounced by Rev. Loren B. Macdonald, the newly installed pastor.

HUMBOLDT, IA.—The Unity Club here opened its sixteenth season on Sunday evening, the 29th ult. Heretofore they have been held on Friday evenings; but it is hoped that the change will serve the double purpose of valuable work for the club and providing appropriate Sunday evening services. The main work of the coming year will be the study of James Freeman Clarke's "Ten Great Religions," alternating with the study of sociological subjects. An introductory paper given by Rev. Charles Graves was an able exposition of the mission and value of this branch of the church and the possibilities it opens.

NORTH ANDOVER, MASS.—A notable event in the history of the Unitarian North Church took place October 2, it being the celebration of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the society. The white church in which the exercises were held is the third which the society has occupied. The exercises were opened with prayer by Rev. Francis O. Williams of Brookline, who was the pastor from 1850 to 1856. Scriptures were read by Rev. C. C. Vinal of Lebanon, N.H., who was pastor from 1857 to 1871. A hymn, written for the occasion by Rev. John Clifford of New York, pastor from 1871 to 1883, was sung. An address of welcome was delivered by Hon. Moses T. Stevens, after which Rev.

Charles Noyes, the present minister, delivered an historical address. The singing of a hymn written for the occasion by Rev. Hobart Clark of Plainfield, N.J., closed the morning exercises. Hon. Moses T. Stevens presided over the afternoon exercises; and addresses were made by Dr. William Everett of Quincy, Rev. S. C. Beane of Newburyport, Hollis R. Bailey of Boston, Rev. Mr. Shipman of Andover, Rev. Mr. Baldwin of Boston, Rev. Dr. Barnes of North Andover, Rev. Joseph Osgood of Cohasset, and A. P. Hegapioian of Constantinople.

ROXBURY, MASS.—All Souls' Church: The chimes of All Souls' rang merrily Sunday noon to warn the congregation within its walls that its pastor, Rev. William H. Lyon, had arrived, and would presently greet them in person after a long absence in Europe. The "Cephalonia" only landed him in time to join in the closing exercises; and he took the opportunity to express his own pleasure in meeting his people again, and to give in a rapid sketch an idea of the countries he had visited. Following the benediction, he was warmly greeted by all of the congregation, and then by the children of the Sunday-school in songs of welcome, among them an original ode written for the occasion, to which he very happily responded. The church and Sunday-school room were both beautifully decorated in anticipation of his arrival. Rev. Mr. Lyon and his family return in the best of health.

WAYLAND, MASS.—Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., preached in the Unitarian church to a large audience last Sunday. On Saturday evening Dr. Herford was tendered a reception at the residence of Mr. Theodore Bennet of Wayland.

WEST NEWTON, MASS.—A full house greeted Rev. J. C. Jaynes last Sunday morning, and listened to one of his best sermons. On Monday evening a reception was tendered Mr. and Mrs. Jaynes in the parlors of the church, and again the warmth of feeling existing between pastor and people found expression.

WEST ROXBURY, MASS.—The ordination and installation of Rev. Alfred R. Hussey as pastor of the First Parish took place October 2. The seating capacity of the church was hardly sufficient to accommodate the large number present. Invocation was offered by Rev. Richard W. Boynton of Roslindale, and immediately following this the Scripture lesson was read by Rev. F. W. Merrick of West Roxbury. The sermon was preached by Rev. Paul R. Frothingham of New Bedford. The prayer of ordination was offered by Dean C. C. Everett of the Harvard Divinity School, and the welcome from the parish by Prof. Linus Faunce of West Roxbury. Rev. James De Normandie of Roxbury delivered the charge to the pastor, and Rev. E. A. Horton extended the right hand of fellowship. The charge to the people was given by Rev. Frank W. Pratt of Deerfield, and the benediction by the pastor.

UNITARIAN WOMEN'S DAY, ATLANTA EXPOSITION.—November 18 is the date assigned Unitarian women, and their meeting will be held in a fine and suitable hall in the Women's Building. Mrs. F. C. Swift, 82 Spring Street, Atlanta, a member of the Atlanta Unitarian church, has general charge of matters relating to the meeting; and all communications relative to it may be addressed to her. The meeting will be addressed by both Northern and Southern Unitarian women, and it is hoped that the occasion may be made worthy the opportunity here presented for reaching considerable numbers of people who are not informed as to our religious views. The space allotted Unitarians in the Manufactures and Liberal Arts Building is now ready, and is very attractive in white and yellow, with gold relief. The great Methodist church south has the space on one side and a Roman Catholic institution is its other next neighbor. C. I. C.

THE SOUTH MIDDLESEX (MASS.) CONFERENCE.—The eighty-ninth regular session of the South Middlesex Conference will be held on Tuesday, October 15, in the Unitarian church, Billerica. Order of exercises: 11 A.M., devotional service, conducted by Rev. Loren B. Macdonald of Concord. 11.30 A.M., reports of committees and miscellaneous business; address by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford of Waltham, on "What has the Higher Criticism done for the Bible?" 12.40 P.M., collection for current expenses of the conference. 12.45 P.M., box-lunch, the society at Billerica providing tea and coffee. 2 P.M., roll-call of the churches; discussion of the morning subject, opened by Rev. C. W. Heizer of Wayland. Train from Union Station, Boston, at 10 A.M.; return, 3.18, 5.58 P.M.

WORCESTER LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN.—It is the custom of the League to hold the fall meeting, the first in the new year of work, in some of the country towns about Worcester. This year a delightful meeting was held at Leicester on Thursday, the 3d of October, when about one hundred and twenty-five women gathered and listened to certain selected papers given during the last winter, at the meetings in Worcester. The following delegates were chosen to represent the League at the meeting of the National Alliance: Mrs. Calvin Stebbins, Mrs. A. B. R. Sprague, and Mrs. William S. Heywood. Mrs. Sarah Theo. Brown presented briefly the general outline and aim of Alliance work, after which a paper, written by Miss Williams of Northboro, on "Church-going in the Past, Church-going To-day, Church-going in the Future: Our own Individual Duty in Reference to Church-going," was read and discussed. Adjournment for luncheon came at one o'clock; and tables were spread in the adjoining Congregational church parlors, which had courteously been opened to entertain the guests. In the afternoon the following papers were read: "The Red Cross Movement in this Country and Abroad: Clara Barton's Connection with It," by Mrs. William S. Heywood of Sterling; "Sketch of the Life of Lucy Larcom," by Mrs. William F. Abbott of Worcester; "How shall we fortify Boys against the Temptations of College and Business Life?" by Miss Julia F. Darling of Mendon. Discussion followed all the papers, and at four o'clock the exercises closed with singing.

ESSEX CONFERENCE.—The hospitality of the Unitarian parish at Marblehead was put to the test by the great company which attended the annual meeting of the Essex Conference on Thursday, October 3. The parish responded nobly, and gave a royal welcome and generous entertainment to the three hundred and fifty persons in attendance. Never before in the history of the conference were there so many ministers present from outside the churches represented as were at this session; and the whole discussion of Rev. E. A. Horton's brilliant and inspiring address on "The Relation of the Young People to the Religious Life of our Churches" was given over to them. Rev. Brooke Herford gave the brightness and cheer of his presence, and spoke a hearty word of inspiration and encouragement. Rev. J. H. Crooker of Helena, Mont., and Dr. Osgood of Cohasset also spoke. After the collation Mr. George W. Stone spoke of "The Saratoga Conference, and its Influence on our Future Work,"—a strong word, which received hearty response from Rev. A. Walkley of Brighton, Rev. Mr. Tricky of Danvers, and several members of the conference. After six years of excellent service as president of the conference, Hon. E. P. Dodge of Newburyport declined to serve longer in that office; and a heartfelt vote of thanks for his long and faithful service was passed. A committee was appointed to prepare resolutions on the death of Rev. E. B. Willson, and will report at the next session. The following officers were elected: President, Rev. S. C. Beane, D.D.; vice-president, Hon. Stephen H. Phillips; secretary and treasurer, Rev. Alfred Manchester; directors, Mr. Stephen Hathaway of Marblehead, Miss Lucy Cleveland of Salem, Mrs. Allan Rogers of Gloucester, Mr. Edward Giddings of Beverly.

CONNECTICUT VALLEY CONFERENCE.—The annual meeting of this conference, held in All Souls' Church, Greenfield, Mass., October 2 and 3, was marked by a very large attendance, delightful weather, and inspiring exercises. The session opened on Wednesday evening with a sermon by Rev. Samuel M. Crothers of Cambridge, founded on the reply of Jesus to the man who asked his arbitration in the matter of a dispute with his brother concerning property (Luke xii. 13-15). The sermon set forth the power of high principles in the solution of all human disputes and entanglements. Jesus would not decide between the brothers, but he would announce a principle which would render such disputes impossible. This is the essence of what the Church has to offer men,—an awakening of the higher moral sense, the gospel of unselfishness, issuing in the best manhood and the greatest peace. The sermon gave great pleasure to an audience completely filling the beautiful church. On Thursday the exercises began at 10.15. After some preliminary business the theme for discussion, "How to reach our Young People," was taken up. The speakers by appointment were Rev. A. A. Brooks of Greenfield, Rev. George W. Piper of Northfield, Rev. Bradley Gilman of Springfield, Rev. F. A. Hinckley of Florence, and Rev. J. W. Carney of Holyoke. This was followed by the chief address of the forenoon session, delivered by Rev. George Batchelor, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, who spoke eloquently on "The National Outlook of the Unitarian Church." He greatly delighted all who heard him by the promise and hope he discovered in the outlook.

At 12.30 the conference was invited to a collation spread in the lower rooms of the building by the ladies of All Souls' Church. The tables were beautifully laid, with profuse decorations of flowers; and the viands were tastefully served. At two o'clock the conference reassembled to listen to a most able and scholarly address by Rev. F. B. Hornbrooke of Newton, on "Reward and Punishment." It was such an address as forbids the reporter to meddle. The conference adjourned at 3.30 o'clock, and immediately thereafter a meeting of the Franklin County Branch of the Women's National Alliance was held in the same place. At this meeting the speakers were Mrs. George Dennison of Springfield, Mrs. Charles B. Peabody of Philadelphia, Mrs. Fayette Smith of Cleveland, and Mrs. Bradley of Boston.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE DELEGATES.

ADDITIONAL NAMES.

MASSACHUSETTS.

ANDOVER, NORTH—North Parish Church and Society: Rev. Charles Noyes, Hon. Moses T. Stevens, Mrs. John Elliot.
BOSTON—New South Church: F. E. Bartley, Mrs. J. H. Wiggins, Mrs. F. R. Tibbets. Alternates: Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Whitcomb, Mrs. M. E. Sparhawk.
Second Church: Charles D. Holmes, Mrs. Francis H. Brown.

South Congregational Church: Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D., George O. Carpenter, Mrs. William Howell Reed. Alternates: Mrs. J. W. Andrews, Mrs. Sarah E. Hooper.
(Brighton)—First Parish: Rev. Albert Walkley, Miss M. O. Pierce, Miss Georgia D. Livermore.
(Charlestown)—Harvard Church: Rev. C. C. Carpenter, Ernest C. Marshall, Miss Elizabeth Hurd.
(Dorchester)—First Parish: Rev. Eugene R. Shippen, J. Homer Pierce, Miss Jennie G. Moseley. Alternates: Henry F. Howe, Geo. C. Burgess.
(Dorchester)—Norfolk Unitarian Church: Rev. William H. Branigan, Samuel H. Babcock, Horace S. Fowle.
(Jamaica Plain)—First Congregational Society: Rev. Charles F. Dole, Mrs. A. Davis Weld, Miss Alice G. Morse.
(Neponset)—Church of the Unity: Rev. George Herbert Hosmer, Laban Pratt, Mrs. John W. Porter.
(Roslindale)—Unitarian Church of Roslindale: Rev. Richard W. Boynton, Miss Mary Hastings, Miss Clara Webb.
BELMONT—Congregational Society: Rev. Hilary Bygrave, J. V. Fletcher, I. H. Locke. Alternates: Miss Anne Learned, Miss Maria Livermore.
BERLIN—First Unitarian Society: Rev. and Mrs. G. F. Pratt, Hon. William Bassett.
BERNARDSTON—Congregational Unitarian Society: Rev. Francis W. Holden, Mrs. Hattie Brown, Miss Maria Sanderson.
BEVERLY—First Parish: Mr. and Mrs. James Marsters.

BRIDGEWATER—First Parish Church: Rev. Chas. A. Allen, H. M. Blackstone, Miss Martha Keith.
BROOKFIELD—First Congregational Church: Rev. William L. Walsh, Henry B. Crosby, Mrs. J. W. Livermore. Alternates: Mrs. H. L. Butterworth, Mrs. H. P. Gerald.

CAMBRIDGE—First Parish: Rev. S. M. Crothers, Rev. Joseph Henry Allen, D.D., Mrs. C. S. Gage.
CLINTON—First Unitarian Society: Rev. James C. Duncan, Mrs. Harriet A. Harris, Mrs. Christopher C. Stone.

DANVERS—Unitarian Congregational Society: Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Mr. and Mrs. John Lummus.
FALL RIVER—Unitarian Society: Rev. Arthur May Knapp, Mrs. James M. Morton, Mrs. William R. Warner.

FITCHBURG—First Parish: Rev. Walter F. Greenman, J. F. D. Garfield, Mrs. Effie M. F. Hartwell.
FLORENCE—Free Congregational Society: Rev. F. A. Hinckley, Henry B. Haven, L. F. S. Plimpton.
FRAMINGHAM—First Church: Rev. Ernest C. Smith, Thos. C. Porter, Abby S. Perry.
GARDNER—First Unitarian Society: Rev. William Channing Brown, John Sawin, William Soule.
GLOUCESTER—First Parish: Rev. L. W. Mason, Mr. and Mrs. Eben Davis.

HARVARD—First Congregational Parish: Rev. J. P. Sheafe, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Fairbank.
HUBBARDSTON—First Congregational Society: Rev. William Channing Brown, William Wheeler, Miss Clark.
LEXINGTON—First Congregational Society: Rev. Carlton A. Staples, Mr. and Mrs. George O. Davis.

LEXINGTON, EAST—Follen Church: Rev. George W. Cook, Edward T. Harrington, Alfred Pierce.
LYNN—Second Congregational Society: Rev. Samuel B. Stewart, Chas. B. Tenbets, Chas. H. Newhall.
MENDON—First Parish: Rev. Lewis G. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Julius A. George.

MIDDLEBORO—First Unitarian Society: J. Foster Tucker, Alice E. S. Eaton, Adeline V. Wood.
MONTAGUE—Second Congregational Society: Mrs. G. A. Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. Warren Bardwell.
NEW BEDFORD—First Religious Society: Rev. Samuel C. Beane, D.D., Henry B. Little, Dr. John F. Young.
NORWELL—First Parish: Rev. T. Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Willard Torrey.

PEABODY—First Unitarian Church: Rev. J. W. Hudson, Nathaniel Symonds, Charles S. Osgood.
QUINCY—First Congregational Society: Rev. E. C. Butler, Mrs. George Keyes, Franklin Faxon. Alternates: Mrs. Franklin Faxon.

RANDOLPH—Church of the Unity: Rev. Charles A. Humphreys, Mrs. Peter C. Wales, Mrs. Walter Howard. Alternates: Mr. William Porter, Mrs. Ephraim Belcher.
SCITUATE—First Parish: Rev. and Mrs. Watson Weed, George O. Allen.

TAUNTON—First Congregational Society: Rev. John P. Forbes, Dr. and Mrs. O. S. Paige. Alternates: Miss Fanny Townsend, Mrs. Henry D. Atwood.
WESTBORO—First Congregational Society: Rev. J. H. Weeks, John L. Brigham, Mrs. I. T. Swift. Alternates: Mrs. J. L. Brigham.

WINCHESTER—Winchester Unitarian Society: Rev. Arthur W. Littlefield, S. W. Twombly, G. P. Brown.

CALIFORNIA.

SAN FRANCISCO—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Horatio Stebbins, D.D., Charles M. Gorham.

CONNECTICUT.

BROOKLYN—First Ecclesiastical Society: Rev. and Mrs. James E. Locke, Charles G. Williams.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

WASHINGTON—All Souls' Church: Rev. Rush R. Shippen, Hon. Carroll D. Wright, Henry F. Blount.

ILLINOIS.

CHICAGO—First Unitarian Society: Rev. W. W. Fenn, Hon. D. L. Shorey, Mrs. Beecher. Alternates: Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Follansbee.

MARYLAND.

BALTIMORE—First Independent Christ Church: Rev. Charles R. Weld, Hon. Enoch Pratt, Judge Thomas J. Morris. Alternates: Mrs. M. N. Perry, Miss Easton.

NEBRASKA.

OMAHA—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Newton M. Mann, William Wallace, Thomas Kilpatrick.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

EXETER—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Alfred C. Nickerson, Miss Mary E. Hartwell, Miss Annabel Warren. Alternates: Miss Alice Chesley, Miss Annie Shute.

NEW YORK.

BROOKLYN—Second Unitarian Congregational Society: Rev. John W. Chadwick, Henry W. Maxwell, Sylvester Swain. Alternates: Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Wing.

NEW YORK—Church of the Messiah: Rev. Robert Collyer, Gardner I. Colton, Wm. T. Salter. Alternate: Mrs. Joseph P. Hale.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Joseph May, Miss Elizabeth Bradford, Enoch Lewis. Alternates: Miss E. C. Egne, Frank R. Tobey.

Unitarian Society of Germantown: Rev. James C. Hodgins, Mr. and Mrs. Edward W. Clark. Alternates: Mrs. John P. Hsley, Mrs. H. L. Deacon.

RHODE ISLAND.

NEWPORT—Channing Memorial Church: Rev. George W. Cutter, M.D., Mr. and Mrs. William Stevens. PROVIDENCE—First Congregational Society: Rev. Augustus M. Lord, Augustus R. Peirce, Mrs. Sydney R. Burleigh.

WASHINGTON.

SEATTLE—First Unitarian Society: Rev. J. H. Acton, D.D., Joseph Shippen, Mrs. J. H. Allen.

ASSOCIATIONS.

CHANNING CLUB OF BOSTON: Frank B. Thayer, Horace S. Sears, George Hutchison. CHILDREN'S MISSION TO THE CHILDREN OF THE DESERT: BOSTON: William H. Baldwin, Clarence W. Jones, Dr. J. Foster Bush. MINISTERS' LEAGUE FOR PRACTICAL WORK: Rev. D. M. Wilson, Rev. E. C. Headie, Rev. Pitt Dillingham. NATIONAL BUREAU OF UNITY CLUBS: Rev. Thomas Van Ness, Rev. George W. Cooke, Rev. W. H. Savage. NEW HAMPSHIRE UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION: Gen. George T. Crutt, Hon. Henry M. Baker, Col. Charles C. Danforth. NORFOLK AND MIDDLESEX MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION: Rev. Solon W. Bush. NORTH MIDDLESEX CONFERENCE: J. A. Harwood, Littleton: Thomas H. Elliot, Lowell. SUFFOLK CONFERENCE: Rev. C. R. Elliot, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, Reuben Peterson. UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY: Rev. Edward A. Horton, Richard C. Humphreys, Edwin J. Lewis, Jr. UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY: Rev. C. R. Elliot, Prof. Francis G. Peabody, D.D., Mrs. M. F. W. Homer. WORCESTER LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN: Miss Augusta F. Taft, Mrs. Mary S. Rugg, Mrs. James B. Stone.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO UNITARIAN SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY.

Contributions having been received from the churches or Sunday Schools of the following places during the past fiscal year, they are entitled to delegate representation at the Annual Meeting at Providence, R.I., October 16 and 17.

Should any errors or omissions be discovered, or any society fail to receive its notices and blank credentials, please report at once:

Alton, Ill., First Unitarian Church. Andover, N.H., Congregational Unitarian Society. Andover, No., Mass., North Parish Church and Soc'y. Arlington, Mass., First Congregational Parish. Ashby, Mass., First Parish. Athol, Mass., First Congregational Church. Second Unitarian Society. Ayer, Mass., First Unitarian Parish.

Baltimore, Md., First Independent Church. Bangor, Me., Independent Congregational Society. Baraboo, Wis., Free Congregational Society. Barnstable, Mass., Cong'l Church in East Precinct. Barre, Mass., First Parish. Bath, N.H., Independent Christian Society. Belmont, Mass., Congregational Society. Berlin, Mass., First Unitarian Society. Bernardston, Mass., Cong'l Unitarian Society. Beverly, Mass., First Parish. Billerica, Mass., First Congregational Society. Bolton, Mass., First Congregational Church. Boston, Mass.:

First Parish of Dorchester. First Church in Boston. First Religious Society in Roxbury. Second Church in Boston. First Parish, West Roxbury. Arlington-Street Church. First Congregational Society, Jamaica Plain. Third Religious Society in Dorchester. Harvard Church, Charlestown. Hawes Unitarian Church, South Boston. South Congregational Church. Barnard Memorial. Church of the Disciples. Church of Our Father, East Boston. All Souls' Unitarian Church, Roxbury. Christ Church, Harrison Square. Church of the Unity (Neponset). Church of the Unity (Neponset). New South Church. Norfolk Unitarian Church, Dorchester. Unitarian Church of Roslindale.

Brewster, Mass., First Parish. Bridgewater, East, Mass., First Parish. Brockton, Mass., Unity Church. Brookline, Mass., First Parish. Brooklyn, Conn., First Ecclesiastical Society. Brooklyn, N.Y., First Unitarian Cong'l Society. Third Unitarian Congregational Society. Buffalo, N.Y., First Cong'l Unitarian Society. Burlington, Vt., First Congregational Church.

Cambridge, Mass., Third Congregational Church. Canton, Mass., First Congregational Parish. Charlestown, S.C., Unitarian Church. Charlestown, N.H., South Parish. Chelmsford, Mass., First Congregational Society. Chelsea, Mass., First Unitarian Society. Chicopee, Mass., First Unitarian Church. Clinton, Mass., First Unitarian Society. Cohasset, Mass., First Parish. Concord, Mass., First Parish. Concord, N.H., Second Congregational Society. Sunday-School Association.

Dedham, Mass., First Parish. Dedham, West, Mass., Third Parish. Duluth, Minn., First Unitarian Church. Duxbury, Mass., First Parish.

Easton, North, Mass., Unity Church. Eastport, Me., First Congregational Society. Exeter, N.H., First Unitarian Society.

Fairhaven, Mass., Washington-St. Christian Church. Farmington, Me., The Liberal Christian Association. Fitchburg, Mass., First Parish. Framingham, Mass., First Church.

Gardner, Mass., First Unitarian Society. Greenfield, Mass., Third Congregational Society.

Hamilton, Can., First Unitarian Church. Hartford, Conn., First Unitarian Cong'l Society. Harvard, Mass., First Congregational Parish. Haverhill, Mass., First Parish. Helena, Mont., First Unitarian Society. Hingham, Mass., First Parish. Holyoke, Mass., Liberal Christian Cong'l Society. Hopedale, Mass., The Hopedale Parish. Hudson, Mass., First Unitarian Society. Hyde Park, Mass., First Unitarian Society.

Kennebunk, Me., First Congregational Parish.

Laconia, N.H., First Unitarian Society. Lancaster, Mass., First Congregational Society. Lawrence, Kan., First Unitarian Society. Lawrence, Mass., First Unitarian Society. Lebanon, N.H., First Cong'l Unitarian Society. Leicester, Mass., Second Congregational Society. Lexington, Mass., First Congregational Society. Lexington, East, Mass., The Follen Church. Littleton, Mass., First Congregational Society. Louisville, Ky., Church of the Messiah. Lynn, Mass., Second Congregational Society.

McMillin, Wash., First Unitarian Church. Madison, Wis., First Unitarian Society. Manchester, N.H., First Unitarian Society. Marlboro, Mass., Second Parish.

Marshfield, Mass., Grace Chapel. Medford, Mass., First Congregational Parish. Medford, Mass., First Parish. Melrose, Mass., Congregational Unitarian Society. Menomonic, Wis., Unitarian Society. Milford, N.H., First Unitarian Society. Millbury, Mass., First Unitarian Society. Milton, Mass., First Congregational Parish. Milwaukee, Wis., First Unitarian Society. Montpelier, Vt., Church of the Messiah.

Nashua, N.H., First Congregational Society. Natick, South, Mass., First Unitarian Parish. Needham, Mass., First Congregational Society. Newport, R.I., Channing Memorial Church. Newton, Mass., Channing Religious Society. Newton Centre, Mass., Unitarian Society. Newton, West, Mass., First Unitarian Society. New York, N.Y., Church of All Souls. Church of the Messiah. Norton, Mass., Congregational Parish. Norwell, Mass., First Parish.

Oakland, Cal., First Unitarian Church. Orange, N.J., First Unitarian Church.

Passaic, N.J., The Unitarian Society. Peabody, Mass., First Unitarian Society. Pembroke, Mass., First Church. Pepperell, Mass., First Parish. Peterboro, N.H., The Congregational Church. Petersham, Mass., First Congregational Parish. Philadelphia, Pa., First Unitarian Church. Spring Garden Unitarian Society. Pittsburg, Pa., First Unitarian Church. Plymouth, Mass., First Parish. Portland, Me., First Parish. Portland, Ore., First Unitarian Society. Portsmouth, N.H., South Parish. Providence, R.I., First Congregational Church. Westminster Congregational Society. Olney-Street Congregational Society.

Randolph, Mass., Church of the Unity. Reading, Mass., Christian Union Church. Revere, Mass., First Unitarian Society. Rochester, N.Y., First Unitarian Cong'l Society. Rockland, Mass., Unitarian Society.

Saco, Me., The Second Parish. Salem, Mass., The First Congregational Society. Independent Congregational Church. San Francisco, Cal., First Unitarian Society. Second Unitarian Society. Santa Ana, Cal., Unity Church. Santa Barbara, Cal., First Unitarian Society. Scituate, Mass., First Parish. Sharon, Mass., First Congregational Society. Sherborn, Mass., First Congregational Church. Somerville, Mass., Second Unitarian Society. Springfield, Mass., Third Congregational Society. Sterling, Mass., First Congregational Society. Stow, Mass., First Parish. Syracuse, N.Y., Unitarian Congregational Church.

Taunton, Mass., First Congregational Society. Templeton, Mass., First Parish. Turner's Falls, Mass., Unitarian Society. Tyngsboro, Mass., First Parish.

Upton, Mass., First Unitarian Society. Uxbridge, Mass., First Congregational Society.

Walpole, Mass., First Congregational Society. Waltham, Mass., First Parish. Watertown, Mass., First Congregational Society. Wellesley Hills, Mass., Unitarian Society. Westford, Mass., First Congregational Parish. Weston, Mass., First Parish. Whitman, Mass., First Unitarian Society. Wilmington, Del., First Unitarian Society. Winchendon, Mass., Church of the Unity. Winthrop, Mass., The Unitarian Association. Woburn, Mass., First Unitarian Parish. Wollaston, Mass., Unitarian Society. Worcester, Mass., The Second Parish. South Unitarian Congregational Society.

Yarmouth, Me., The Central Church. Yonkers, N.Y., First Unitarian Cong'l Society.

RICHARD C. HUMPHREYS, Treas.

Business Notices.

Not only does the Miller Lamp contain the latest improvements as regards wicking and lighting, but its beauty of design makes it an ornament to the home.

Winter Tours across the Continent.—Persons expecting to visit the Pacific Coast the coming season will be interested in Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb's announcement of their annual series of delightful winter tours to California. Every advantage that trains of superb Pullman palace vestibuled sleeping and dining cars can afford will be enjoyed by the members of these parties. The tickets give the travellers entire freedom, insure reduced hotel rates, provide for numerous side trips to points of special interest, and may be used returning independently at any time or with any one of ten parties having special escort, with a choice of three routes. The first date of departure from Boston is October 22, and the second November 19. A descriptive pamphlet will be mailed to any address by Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

Over One Hundred.—It is hard to realize that in a single furniture warehouse in this city there are now on exhibition over a hundred different wood mantels, fully erected and complete in every detail. It is still more remarkable that the establishment making this display is not a wholesale house or a firm devoting its entire attention to this one line of cabinet work, but the Paine Furniture Company, whose attention to this one branch of their business has developed it to astonishing proportions.

Christmas at Bethlehem.—On the first Christmas Day Bethlehem was visited by wise men from the East. Next Christmas the city of David will be visited by wise men from the West, a party of tourists having determined to spend Christmastide at that place, the scene of those momentous events that have made Bethlehem of Judea a familiar name through the whole world. Ladies, as well as gentlemen, are invited to participate. Of course, other places of interest in the East will be visited, among others Athens, Damascus, Jerusalem, and many places in the Holy Land connected with the sacred story, Cairo, the city of the "Arabian Nights," the Riviera, Paris, London, etc. A little illustrated pamphlet, containing information regarding the details of this tour, or Pilgrimage, as it may be termed, can be obtained, post free, from Thos. Cook & Son, 261 Broadway, New York.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Deaths.

In West Newton, 5th inst., Mrs. Harriet A. Pitts, widow of Lemuel Pitts, 75 yrs. 7 mos. In Denver, Col., 1st inst., Benj. F. Smith, son of the late Benj. F. Smith, of Kalamazoo, Mich., and formerly of Worcester, Mass.

Marriages.

In Athol, 2d inst., by Rev. Carl G. Horst, Frederick G. Livingston and Mary G. Lawrence, both of Athol. In Dorchester, 2d inst., by Rev. Benjamin A. Goodridge, Charles S. Long and Maude Fletcher, both of Dorchester. In Middleboro, 1st inst., by Rev. W. C. Litchfield, Addison E. Taylor, of Gardner, and Fannie T. Litchfield, daughter of the officiating minister. In Neponset, 2d inst., at the Church of the Unity, by Rev. George Herbert Hoamer, Ellis Hollingsworth and Elsie M. Littlefield, both of Boston.

Religious Notices.

Unitarian Sunday-School Society.

ANNUAL MEETING

—AT—

Providence, R.I., Oct. 16 and 17, 1895.

ORDER OF EXERCISES.

Wednesday, October 16. In the Westminster Church, Mathewson Street (Rev. HERBERT H. MOTT, pastor).

7.45 P.M. Platform meeting, with three addresses:— Rev. W. HANSON PULSFORD, Waltham, Mass. Subject, "Sunday-School Instruction and the New Criticism."

Rev. THOMAS VAN NESS, Second Church, Boston, Mass. Subject, "Organization in Sunday Schools."

Rev. JOHN CUCKSON, Arlington Street Church, Boston, Mass. Subject, "The Relations of the Home to the Sunday School."

Thursday, October 17. In the First Congregational Church, Benefit and Benevolent Streets (Rev. AUGUSTUS M. LORD, pastor).

FORENOON.

9.00-9.45 A.M. Devotional meeting, conducted by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE, Newton, Mass.

9.45-10.00 A.M. Opening of the Business Meeting of the Unitarian Sunday-School Society.

10.00-10.20 A.M. Reading of Directors' Annual Report.

10.20-11.00 A.M. Discussion of Directors' Report, Election of Officers, and miscellaneous business.

11.00-11.25 A.M. Address by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, D.D., London, England. Subject, "The Minister and the Sunday School."

11.25-11.50 A.M. Address by Mrs. SETH C. BEACH, Bangor, Me. Subject, "Women and the Sunday School."

11.50-12.15 P.M. Address by Mr. CHARLES N. GOODRICH, Secretary of the Congregational Sunday-School Superintendents' Union of Boston and vicinity. Subject, "Main Lines of Work in Congregational Sunday Schools."

12.15-12.45 P.M. General Discussion and Remarks. Speeches limited to five minutes each.

12.45-2.00 P.M. Intermission and Collation.

AFTERNOON.

2.00-2.30 P.M. Opening of afternoon session, transaction of unfinished business, and other matters.

2.30-3.30 P.M. Three Twenty-minute Addresses:—

1. Rev. JAMES DE NORMANDIE, Roxbury, Mass. Subject, "Bible Teaching as Illustrated by the Book of Jonah."

2. Rev. S. H. ROBLIN, Pastor of Second Universalist Church, Boston, Mass. Subject, "The Place and Function of Sunday Schools in Church Life."

3. Rev. CHARLES F. DOLE, Jamaica Plain, Mass. Subject, "The Value of Catechisms in Modern Sunday-School Training."

3.30-4.00 P.M. General Discussion and Remarks. Speeches limited to five minutes each.

4.00 P.M. Adjournment.

Those in attendance at this Annual Meeting are entertained by the following five churches and their pastors: First Congregational Church, Rev. A. M. Lord, pastor. Westminster Congregational Society, Rev. Herbert H. Mott, pastor.

Olney-Street Congregational Society, Rev. William F. Furman, pastor.

Bell-Street Chapel, Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer, pastor. Fourth Unitarian Society, Rev. Napoleon S. Hoagland, pastor.

By request of our Providence friends the hospitality of the Parishes is offered for the night of Wednesday, October 16, to all individuals who may wish to attend the sessions of this occasion, as well as to life members, delegate members from contributing churches or schools, and to pastors of said churches and schools.

Those in attendance are requested to report, on arrival, at the Westminster Church, Mathewson Street.

Churches and Sunday Schools that have contributed to the funds of this Society during the past fiscal year are entitled to three delegate members, either from the Society or from the Sunday School. These delegates are members of the Society for one year from Oct. 1, 1895, with all the voting powers and usual privileges of such membership; and they will be furnished with cards, which must be filled out and returned on Thursday forenoon, October 17, as credentials. All persons in attendance, not delegates or life members, have full privileges in the exercises except the right of discussing business and of voting.

SPECIAL DIRECTIONS.

The special attention of those wishing to avail themselves of the Providence hospitality on Wednesday evening is called to the following directions:—

1. To send their names as soon as possible, and in no case later than Monday, October 14, addressed, Secretary of Unitarian Sunday-School Conference, Providence R.I.

2. To put the proper prefix of Mr., Mrs., or Miss to their names.

Information as to Trains and Fares.

The New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Company (Old Colony System) has placed round-trip tickets, reduced rates, for sale at the following stations, good going October 15 to 17 inclusive, and returning until October 18 inclusive:—

Boston.....	$1.35	Concord Junction....	$1.65
Canton Junction.....	1.00	Fall River.....	.80
Worcester.....	1.35	Plymouth.....	1.50
Brockton.....	1.45	Middleboro.....	1.00
North Easton.....	1.10	Taunton.....	.92
Yarmouth.....	2.25	Cohasset.....	1.85
Fitchburg.....	2.30	Clinton.....	1.80
Framingham.....	1.25	New Bedford.....	1.30
Lowell.....	2.10	Newport.....	1.15

The winter schedule of trains does not go into effect until October 15. Delegates can consult official time tables for the desired information.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE

OF

Unitarian and Other Christian Churches

AT WASHINGTON, D.C.,

October 21, 22, 23, and 24.

Messrs. RAYMOND & WHITCOMB have arranged for the accommodation of delegates and others who may wish to attend the National Conference an Attractive Series of Excursions at Very Low Rates.

Parties will leave BOSTON Friday, October 18, and Monday, October 21, under special escort. A choice of routes by boat and rail.

Additional excursions to Gettysburg, Old Point Comfort, etc.

SPECIAL TRIP TO ATLANTA,

leaving Washington after the close of the Conference, and reaching Boston October 31.

Send for special circular.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,

296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

Unitarian Excursion

—TO—

WASHINGTON, D.C.

A party will leave Boston on Friday, October 18, returning Friday, October 25, using Hotel Vendome on Penn. Ave.

Drive of three hours through residential part of the city and to Arlington Heights.

Trip to Mt. Vernon.

Guide at service of the party at all times. J. HOWARD NASON, who accompanies this party, has been very successful in managing Washington Excursions, and is always at the service of the party.

Price of tickets $30.00, including all expenses.

For full information apply to

NASON & DURGIN, 228 Washington Street.

We refer by permission to Rev. GEORGE BATCHELOR, Chairman of the Council.

THE RALEIGH

Pennsylvania Avenue and Twelfth Street, N.W.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

Only two blocks from hall in which Unitarian Conference meetings are held.

The only strictly first-class hotel conducted solely upon the European plan, with its entire construction absolutely fire-proof.

No pains nor expense have been spared to make the sanitary conditions of the hotel as satisfactory as modern ideas and first-class work could make them.

Every room is heated by steam and lighted by electricity. The service and cuisine of the hotel will be maintained in accordance with the best traditions of the culinary art.

Rates for rooms are graded according to size and location.

T. J. TALTY, Manager.

The Ebbitt House

WASHINGTON, D.C.

Special rate for those attending meeting of the National Conference, $2.50 and $3.00 each per day up. Parlors and alcove parlors at equally low rates. This house is only two blocks from Metzger's Hall, where the Convention will be held.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.

Literary Lectures

—FOR—

UNITY CLUBS, WOMEN'S ALLIANCES, Etc.

By Rev. GEO. H. YOUNG

—ON—

Louisa Alcott. Charlotte Bronte. George Eliot. Jane Welsh Carlyle. Dorothea Dix. Margaret Fuller. E. B. Browning. Jane Austen. Alice and Phoebe Cary.

For circulars and terms address

LAWRENCE, MASS.

Series of attractive lectures.—Lawrence American.

Delightful lectures.—Lawrence Eagle.

Large and select audience gathered to enjoy the literary treat offered. Mr. Young is a very interesting speaker, and held the attention of his audience closely. All who listened to this lecture will be anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity offered for the remainder of the course.—Portsmouth Times.

Atlanta Exposition.

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors. Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Conveying to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.

A FRENCH TEACHER, from Paris, Unitarian, highly recommended, desires an engagement as resident or as visiting governess in a family. References and full particulars will be given. M.L.E. B., care Christian Register.

SONNET.

I think the immortal servants of mankind,
Who from their graves watch by how slow degrees
The World-Soul greathens with the centuries,
Mourn most man's barren levity of mind,—
The ear to no grave harmonies inclined,
The witless thirst for false wit's worthless lees,
The laugh mistimed in tragic presences,
The eye to all majestic meanings blind.

O prophets, martyrs, saviors, ye were great,
All truth being great to you; ye deemed Man more
Than a dull jest, God's ennui to amuse;
The world for you held purport. Life ye wore
Proudly, as kings their solemn robes of state,
And humbly, as the mightiest monarchs use.

—William Watson, in the Spectator.

The Pulpit.

JUSTICE AND CHARITY.*

BY REV. W. F. SLOCUM.

"Love is the fulfilling of the law."—ROM. xiii. 10.

This is a definition of love, and not of law. It is love, or charity, defined in terms of law, or justice. The word which is here translated "love" is elsewhere rendered "charity"; and, if the true meaning of "charity" is kept in mind, "charity" is the better translation. The fulfilling of the law is the realization of justice. So that we can render the passage, for the convenience of our thought, charity is the realization of justice. This is the theme of our discourse. It is important that we should come at the outset to some common agreement in regard to the words that we are to use. First of all, we must not consider this word "charity" in any narrow or restricted sense.

Dole-giving and charity are not synonymous terms. Almsgiving may be an expression of charity; and, again, it may be farthest removed from true charity. Whatever helps another in his higher nature is charity: whatever injures him is not charity, whatever name we may give to it.

No better illustration of true charity can be found than that of the apostle, as he stood at the Gate Beautiful, looking into the face of the pauper cripple, and said: "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee. In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk. And he took him by the right hand, and lifted him up." In other words, he made a self-respecting man of him, giving him power to bear his share of life's burdens. Charity is that passion or state of mind which leads one to help another, and to delight in helping him. By a peculiarity of language, we have come to call the act which is the expression of this passion or feeling by the same word, "charity." That is, the act of ministration is called charity, as well as the feeling which prompts it. In other words, the expression has a subjective and an objective meaning; but, primarily, it refers to the feeling of the soul itself, and that feeling or state is the desire really to help another.

Justice is fairness. It is a moral and mental quality which makes men fair or just. He who takes more than his share is unjust: he who wrongs another is unjust.

The profoundest and most satisfactory definition of justice is, "Justice is complete virtue displayed toward others." Justice is that within the soul which leads one to act rightly toward another. Both of these human passions, charity and justice, are positive, and not negative. They lead the human heart to go out toward another. They produce action: they rule and guide human life.

It remains now for us to see in what sense charity is justice, to discover if the act of charity is the act of justice. If this should prove true, we shall have learned a very practical lesson, and one which will take much of the confusion out of our problems, and also help to drive sentimentalism out of the administration of charity. There is no doubt that many good people are confused when they meet the problems that are forced upon society by the existence of our dependent and penal classes, and that many others are persisting in saying and doing things that are harmful to society and the State.

Our problems are difficult enough without the added loss of effective force for their solution arising from false opinions and the confusion of fallacious views. There are many people in the world who are willing to work, but are helpless as they are confronted with the exceedingly difficult conditions that crime and pauperism thrust upon modern society. Much certainly will be gained if we can lay hold of some broad, far-reaching principle that will enable these people and others who feel no responsibility to do something through one of the many avenues that it will open to them.

*Sermon preached before the Prison Congress, Denver, September 15.

Is, then, the administration of charity the administration of justice, and ought both to be working along the same lines? If so, then much of the feeling of almost contempt for the administration of charity from some sources and the indifference of many others will lose this power.

We must stop here to distinguish between sentimentalism and charity. Sentimentalism is untruthful; that is, it does not deal with things as they are. It blinds itself to facts, and acts from mere feeling. It is essentially unreasonable, and therefore unjust, and so wrongs some one. Sometimes it wrongs the State by a false leniency toward a criminal. It wrongs the pauper and society by unwise treatment of a beggar. It wrongs children by giving them weak ideals of character, and, instead of wholesome training, teaches them unworthy and petty conceptions of life, truth, and duty. Charity, on the other hand, recognizes every fine and noble possibility in men and women. It deals with them in the light of their higher destiny and possibilities. It discovers the nature in them that is akin to all that is best in humanity, and that which also has kinship with God. It finds the divine side of human life because it is divine. It has the majesty and tenderness of the Eternal Father in it, because it sees the deepest meaning in human life. It suffers for men, it condemns them, it pleads with them, it dies for them; but it is always truthful, it has the eternal Reasonableness within it, it can do no wrong. It is ever true and just, and lives not for the moment, but for eternity. This ideal of charity has only once been fully realized on this earth. It was made perfect by him who, when men thought to lead him into false statements in regard to public affairs, gave rather a perfect and comprehensive conception of the administration of justice when he said, "Render unto God the things that are God's, and unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." It was the same Jesus of Nazareth who loved the world with a perfect love, wept over the divine city, and with expressions of divine sweetness uttered his yearnings for its people, and also spoke words of condemnation with all the judicial quality of the judge passing sentence upon the wrong-doer. It was he who could go to his cross for men with the divine passion of his great soul upon him, but never either looked upon evil other than it was, or had one word of false sentimentalism for the sinner. No one was ever so tender as he. No one was ever so just as he. His tenderness was exalted because of his justice, and his justice because of his tenderness. It was the perfect harmony of the two that made him what he was and what he ever will be to the world. This is our ideal. The world has multitudes who are blindly swayed by their affection, and whose ideals of ministration become narrow, superficial, and weak. These often rush hither and yon with intense activity for the moment, but ultimately lose enthusiasm, if they ever really had it, and end in passing harsh and unjust judgments upon others and upon society in general.

Then there are those who are forever prating of justice and sneering at works of reform and benevolence, as if they were nothing but sentimentalisms. These, too, are harsh, narrow, and unfair. Their conception of justice is anything but just. Their reasoning is shallow and one-sided, because their opinions are formed with a narrow vision of facts; and usually their every effort to be just is an injustice, because they are so essentially one-sided. It takes courage, calmness, and great wisdom to avoid the faults of either of these. Nothing is more unattractive than the professional charity worker, who, having lost the milk of human kindness, works simply according to certain prescribed rules, regardless of the deeper facts of human nature which true love discovers. On the other hand, few things are more harmful in all work of reform than the shallow sentimentalist who tells the world that he alone understands the sorrows and needs of the poor and unfortunate, and condemns the slower and safer movements that strike at the root of society's wrongs, and seek to build up an edifice that will stand the storm of years.

Charity and justice are both founded upon that which is essentially reasonable. But does some one say love is not reasonable, and that its beauty lies in the fact that it is unreasonable; it asks no questions; it is blind, and we delight in it because of its blindness? But is this the highest ideal of love? Was this the love of the Christ? It seems to me that nothing was ever more reasonable than his love and all that flowed out of it. If we could have measured his thought, his ideals, his knowledge of this world and the next, his perception of man's destiny and the destructive powers of evil; above all, if we could have measured his power for loving and saving,—we should see that he did the most reasonable of all things when he poured out his life for this world. What was more reasonable than that he should be found preaching, talking, pleading; than that he should be by the sick, the lowly, the sorrowing, the needy; that he should seek to reach all classes and all conditions; that he should at last, moved by his divine compassion, give that life of his for the world? Nothing is more reasonable than that a noble, unselfish man should live a life which is filled with thoughts and deeds of love. It is cruelty and crime that are unreasonable. Walk through the long corridors of our penitentiaries, look into the faces of the vast army of young men who fill most of the cells,—young men with powers of noble thought and brave deeds, powers of enjoyment in society, of self-respect, and all that makes life happy and beautiful,—and, tell me, is it reasonable that they should be in these prisons?

I am not forgetting the circumstances that helped to bring them there, the false training, the poor ideals, the wretched companionships, the story of early temptation and vice; but behind all these there is the man capable of living a good life, the man with his deeper nature and its finer impulses. No crime ever had an adequate reason for its commission. No cruel, hateful deed ever could claim reasonableness as the excuse for its performance. Many a man in his hour of remorse looks into his own soul, and cries, "Fool, fool!" Then he tells the truth. There is a love that is blind and foolish, and such love loses its power and glory; but let us be careful before we say this or that act of love is unreasonable. Who can judge but he who is perfect reason and justice, and knows the end from the beginning? It is not always unreasonable to give one's life for those we love; but it is usually reasonable to live for others, true, patient, noble lives.

Justice is justice only when it is reasonable. The moment the element of reasonableness passes out of it, it ceases to be justice. Perfect justice considers all the circumstances, and looks deep into the springs of action; and, whether applied to the individual or the State, it has the same meaning. It is profoundly true that "injustice is suicidal to the State"; for justice is the order of the State and all true society, and the State is the visible embodiment of justice under the conditions of human society. "The State is the reality of which justice is the idea."

The question that both charity and justice ever ask, if they are true, is, What is right? And what is right is what is reasonable. It is right and reasonable that the State should build its insane asylums, and, according to the most scientific treatment, care for those whose mental condition makes it either impossible for them to meet the battle of life or be safe in society. It is right and reasonable that dependent children should be trained and protected by the State under certain conditions. It is right and reasonable that the criminal should be punished, improved, reformed. The very test of entrance into that kingdom which is founded upon eternal reasonableness and righteousness is that of ministration to the hungry, the thirsty, the naked, and the prisoner,—a ministration which fits men and women for the kingdom of heaven. Every act of true charity is the fulfilling of some divine law, and that is not charity at all which is not the fulfilment of some divine principle. The beauty and glory of all works of love consist in their conformity to that divine love that is ever about us, and which the lives of all true men and women have revealed. It is only as we lift all works of charity up into the light of the eternal laws of righteousness that we shall know the value of our institutions, and that which they can and ought to accomplish. The laws of God have no discord in them. The judge, pronouncing just judgment upon the wrong-doer; the lowly angel of mercy, ministering in the by-ways of the great city; the skilful physician, operating in the hospital; the chief executive, forgiving the criminal in behalf of the State, when the time is ripe for it,—all these are acting according to principles each one of which is in accord with every other. It is this that constitutes the unity of all these functions of the State and the glory of all true charity.

We may now go a step further. Charity or love, in righting the wrongs of society is simply doing what is just. More than this, justice will never be done until love has completed its work.

Did you ever walk through darkest London or darkest New York or Chicago, and look into the faces of children who have been wronged in their inheritances, wronged in their opportunities, wronged in their education, wronged in every possible way in which a child can be wronged,—wronged by the sins, the ignorance, the stupidity, of men and women? Who is to right their wrongs? Miss Addams at Hull House, Dr. Taylor in his university settlement, Oxford students at Toynbee Hall, are helping to do it. Hospitals, children's homes, kindergartens for the poor, are doing it. Every act of ministering love that tenders the cup of cold water to one of these little ones is doing it. The education of earnest, high-minded men and women to go forth to make the world better is helping to accomplish it. People never simply wrong themselves by their evil deeds: they injure others, and the divine law of compensation and adjustment is ever that of love, or true charity. If evil, however, wrong the innocent, virtue aids the weak and the unprotected; and every noble life helps to right the world's wrong and injustice. And every noble deed is the fulfilment of the law of love in one way or another.

It is, after all, charity in the form of justice that the world needs more than anything else. The working man or woman says, "I want a fair chance to earn a living." That is not only the best charity, but it is just. Something is wrong when that chance does not exist. It is the injustice that lies in the conditions of the sweatshop that rouses people against them. It is when society makes the conditions of life so hard that men and women cannot possess enough to enable them to be all that God wants them to be that society is unjust, and that love must set itself at work to right the wrong. The workingman says, "I do not want charity: I want justice." If charity is dole-giving, he is right; for then he would lose his manhood, his spirit of independence, his power to be his best and truest self. But, if we lift our word "charity" out of the degradation into which it has fallen, if we see that it is the fulfilling of the divine law of love, that it is righteousness and justice fulfilling their mission in human affairs, then he and we all need from our fellows that charity which is the realization of justice. The rich man needs it as well as the poor man. The laborer and he for whom he labors, the criminal, the pauper, the sorrowing, the helpless, the broken-hearted, the strong and the self-reliant,—these all, in this complicated economy of human life, need that which above all else rejoiceth in the truth, and

WOULD YOU HAVE THE HANDSOMEST

GLOVES?

THEN WEAR ONLY THE

GENUINE DUCHESS,

Which come in all the popular styles, dressed and undressed Kid, button and Foster lace, long and short wrists,

And cost no more than other makes.

CALL AND INSPECT, OR SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

All Gloves fitted when desired, and every pair warranted.

CHANDLER & CO.,
SOLE AGENTS,
WINTER ST. BOSTON.

Agency Dr. Jaeger Sanitary System, Woollen.

under the working of which that which is perfect comes. No one is independent of charity in this larger sense; for every man needs that justice should be done him,—needs in his own affairs, needs in his own soul, the consciousness that he toward others and others toward him are obeying that principle which is the golden rule of life, and which is the fulfilment of all law and all charity,—“Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.” This is true charity.

We may now take another step, and maintain that nothing is worthy of the name of charity that is not the realization of justice in one form or another. That which wrongs society or wrongs the individual is not charity, we all admit; but, more than this, has society any right to let men and women become untrained, morally and intellectually, diseased physically and spiritually, if it can prevent any of these ills? Is it reasonable, right, just, that there should be a darkest London or a darkest New York or a darkest Denver? Is it right that any city should so neglect a class that it will become a pauper or a criminal class? Every thoughtful, earnest person answers, No. Therefore, society stands condemned, we all stand condemned, just so far as we have not done our duty toward these classes: just so far as society is not giving men and women a fair chance to be pure and upright, there is injustice. What, however, does charity propose to do about it? What should it be doing in its reformatories, in its hospitals, in and through its institutions for the penal and dependent classes? Oh, more, what ought it to be doing through its homes, its churches, its schools? Saving these poor and unfortunate ones? Yes; but charity has not found its larger, its true mission, if it is not so purifying society that it is becoming less and less possible that there should be these classes. This is what is due humanity, and this is the inspiration of all true charity. This, too, is the larger justice which needs to be realized. The State, as I have said, should be the visible embodiment of justice under the conditions of human society. So everything that helps society to fulfil its true mission is the realization of true charity and justice. Build your homes, and build them well. Establish your schools, and in them make the moral idea dominate everything else. Rear your churches, and keep the spirit of true religion in them. Establish business enterprises according to fair business principles; and in all these let no sentimentalism enter, but rather that charity which “rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth.” Then will justice be done, and that which is perfect will surely come. The claim has now been made that charity is the realization in society of that order which is best characterized as justice. There is, however, a poverty in our national life that needs help more than much that we call by that name. The poverty of our slums is not commensurate with the narrowing spiritual poverty that is seen in large numbers who think to hide their poverty by showy equipage and extravagant living. There are in America to-day great numbers of men and women who are losing their better, their higher selves in their greed for vast wealth. They are most unjust to themselves, and are pauperizing their lives without knowing it. Never was there such need of noble gifts as to-day; and some are discovering it, as they discover the blessedness that comes best to him who gives. Passing out from the shadow of our hard times, is our nation to enter upon another great scramble for wealth, that one may possess more than another; or are we entering a new era of larger ideas for the nation and for society? Is a sense of greater privilege and opportunity coming to all classes? Just so far as the nation becomes selfish, and lust for power and personal self-aggrandizement dominate, the spirit, not only of charity, but also of justice, will pass out from the national life; and then the spiritual suicide of our nation is at hand.

A leading and representative newspaper, arguing against a plan which was devised for helping young men to help themselves in securing an education, said within a few days, “Rich men have no responsibility for other men’s sons, and no interest in them.” I know that does not represent the position of large numbers of patriotic men who hold their wealth in trust for the highest good of society; but I fear it does represent a large element in our nation and the working theory of altogether too many. The saddest side of such a view is not the loss to the young men who might be helped into valuable lives enriched for noble service, but rather the loss that comes to those who are missing their opportunity of broadening their lives by the service they might render their country in the training of its young men. It is the wrong the man does himself in shutting up his own soul that is the most painful side of such a view.

The time is at hand when America must pass out into the larger view of charity and justice, when we must recognize our mission as a nation. Questions of wealth, of self-aggrandizement, have so filled our range of vision that the principle of giving to the world an example of a nation filled with the spirit of ministration has been too poorly realized. Our literature needs new inspiration, our political and social economy needs a new saving force in it, our religious life needs something it does not possess. How shall this something come to us? The rest of the world is thinking most of standing armies and military equipments. Let America think most of its institutions for making the world better, most of how it can train the young for service, most of how it can give to the world in and through its public and private affairs an ideal of true charity, which shall be that of justice.

THE NEED OF MISSIONARY WORK.

BY REV. J. M. SCOTT.

If the sweet spirit and reality of union which made the last meeting of our National Conference at Saratoga historic and prophetic is to flower out in the fulfilment of its prophecy of richer life in our churches and enthusiastic and successful missionary enterprise, all the Unitarian peoples must realize the need there is of our gospel.

The danger to a Unitarian’s missionary enterprise is that of an amiable indifference, the semi-indolence of feeling that things are going about right, and therefore nothing to be done but to devote one’s self to one’s self, and that of imagining that the type of preaching heard in all orthodox churches is that of Phillips Brooks or Philip Moxom or Theodore Munger. We see and rejoice in the evidence of a growing liberality and sweet reasonableness in many of the orthodox circles, and therefore erroneously conclude that our work is being done by others, and that there is little need of exerting ourselves to help realize the kingdom of light and sweet reasonableness in the world of religion. In order to correct this erroneous conclusion, I wish that Mr. Stone’s suggestion could be carried out, and the sermon on “The Atonement,” preached at Pittsburg by Dr. Boothe, the Assembly’s moderator, before the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, might be published and circulated among our own people as a call to missionary work. An equally strong summons might be made to us if some of the actual sermons preached by obscure men might also be circulated among us.

I heard a sermon this summer which, if taken down as spoken, would well serve such a purpose. It was preached in an historic town where there are two educational institutions for young people. It was preached by a doctor of divinity. It was his farewell word on the eve of his vacation, and had as its text the words of Jesus, “Come ye apart awhile, and rest.” It began with the extravagant assertion that no religion but the Christian had any such idea of rest,—the usual extravagant misrepresentation of what other religions teach. He said some good things as to the wrong of overwork and the gain and righteousness of resting. But, by some antithetic association of ideas, he got his thought over to the restlessness of the wicked through the never-ending torment of conscience, and mingled with this the old and cruel grossness of material, everlasting fire-punishment for the lost, using these words, “They will be burned, boiled, and fried,” and how awful this will be, because they must suffer in their very “inwards.” He defended this gross statement by quoting what was to him a conclusive Scripture,—the one that says that in hell there is “weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth,” which must mean a physical body suffering in material fire. He also got back to the theme of his morning sermon, that only by faith in the blood of Jesus was there any salvation at all. I doubt not that to nearly every one who heard that sermon it was the very truth, and set forth just what they believed. The exception was the young physician and his wife whom I accompanied to church. And yet this is their church, the kind of preaching they must listen to, if any. They may live for years in absolute loneliness from any other kindred spirits, holding somewhat the larger faith; and yet there may be others in their community of like minds with themselves. In all probability, no successful Unitarian church movement could be made in this place. The question arises, What can we do for such,—not only for such as my two friends, but for the general benightedness that is hearing and believing such wicked falsehoods? The other week I had a letter from a physician in a certain town in which no successful Unitarian church movement could be started. He told me the sermon he had had to listen to the other Sunday from the text Matthew xxviii. 19, 20. The preacher said: “What we want is more Holy Ghost preaching. There is a clamor for preaching from Huxley. Cursed be such preaching! To the devil for such preaching. We want the preaching of the truth, of God’s truth, as found in the Bible.” My friend comments: “The poor, deluded fanatic! as though the teachings of Huxley were not God’s own truths, about which we are trying to find out more. I am sure I can read or hear of Huxley’s teachings, founded on scientific truth, and exclaim with the Psalmist, ‘How wonderful are thy works, and thy truths past finding out!’ It does seem to me remarkable that any man in this enlightened age should look on scientific truth in any other way than as the revelation of the wonder, the power, and the majesty of God.” I am certain that this man does not know of another kindred spirit in that place. If he were to boldly express himself at home as he has to me, he would no doubt be looked upon as a more dangerous man than a certain brilliant but drink-ruined lawyer about whom we conversed when I last saw him. What can we do for such countless lonely ones through all the villages and towns of our land? You answer, “Put our literature into their hands.” Yes; but how? Shall we depend simply upon what an individual can do when occasionally he learns of such cases? Shall we depend simply upon the advertisements of our “literature sent free,”—the method used by our Post-office Mission workers? I believe there is an excellent way to supplement the work we are already doing in this respect. It is to have evangelists who will go into such towns, and for several weeks, night after night, preach our truths and distribute our literature. There should be a singing and a speaking evangelist together, “two by two.” They should use every possible legitimate way to advertise their work and attract the attention of the people. Such work, wisely and enthusiastically done, would result in calling the attention of that community to the fact that there is another sweet and serious-minded interpretation of Christianity than that the pulpits are uttering. It would result in drawing together and making acquainted liberally disposed people who would never know each other’s hunger for better things but for such meetings. Such people ought to be organized into a home Sunday reading society, and urged to meet together and read to each other the newer truths, talk to each other about them, teach them to their children. This ought to open a larger field to our periodical literature. Aside from ministering to these souls, so much needing our truth, it would have its influence upon the pulpits of such places, making their darkness shine with something of sweetness and light.

I know the money difficulty of carrying on such a work, and the difficulty of getting the wise, right workers. But yet I believe somewhere a beginning could be made,—enough of a beginning to demonstrate a success, and therein call forth money for that work’s increase. In many ways it would be wise to follow up such meetings with preaching visits from our ablest and most renowned ministers.

For a forward movement along our missionary lines I am persuaded of the wisdom of three things: this that I have written about; what Mr. Jennings so recently wrote about, the putting of men in the missionary field who would devote their whole time to the establishing of churches,—as soon as they could make a place for a permanent pastor to work in, going on into a new field; and the imbuing of our young ministers with the idea of Mr. Sunderland’s little book, “The Liberal Ministry as a Field of Work for Young Men and Women,” wherein he urges that the young minister choose his field of labor as the young lawyer or physician, and, like them, stay there until he has conquered success. I am sure that working in this way, with enthusiasm, consecration, and wisdom, we should all be surprised in the results of such work and in the strength for the doing of such work to which we would rise. Wherefore let us think upon these things.

The Sunday School.

The next Channing Hall “Talk” will be held on Saturday, October 12, at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, at 2.30 P.M. Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford will address the three grades,—Primary, Intermediate, and Advanced. Subject, Lesson V., “The Mustard-seed.” All cordially invited.

The Register has contained copious extracts from Mr. Dole’s “Catechism,” which is about ready for sale. It has been decided to issue, besides the edition in cloth covers, one in paper covers, which will bring the price more within the range of those desiring to use the book in Post-office Mission work, or for purposes where a large number of copies may be required. Of course, the difference is simply in the character of the covers. Copies bound in cloth, 35 cents single copy or $3.50 per dozen; in paper covers, 20 cents single copy or $1.80 per dozen.

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—The first regular meeting, thirteenth season, 1895-96, will be held in the parlors of the Church of the Disciples, corner of Warren Avenue and West Brookline Street, Monday, October 14. Subject, “Unsolved Sunday-school Problems.” Fifteen-minute addresses will be given by Rev. Augustus M. Lord of Providence, Miss Mary E. Glidden of Neponset, Mrs. Clara Beasley of Roxbury, Rev. A. P. Record of Chelsea, Rev. Edward C. Guild of North Pembroke, Rev. B. F. McDaniel of Newton Centre. The social meeting will be held at 5 P.M., supper at 5.30, addresses at 6.30; and the meeting will be adjourned at 8.30.

We call the attention of all those interested in the coming annual meeting of the Sunday School Society to a correction in the information as to trains and fares on the circular which has been sent to all the Sunday-schools. The round-trip tickets at reduced rates will be good going from October 15 to 17 inclusive, and, returning, until October 18 inclusive. This is a correction of the announcement on the printed circular, which says that the tickets are good only from the 15th to the 16th going, and, returning, until October 17. The ministers

MUSIC

“College Songs”

Latest edition. 92 songs, including all the famous favorites. This collection is the most popular ever published, having reached its 41st edition. Over 300,000 copies sold.

“War Songs”

55 songs, 96 pages. Including all the great war songs of America. Solos for any voice. Choruses for male voices.

“Royal Four-hand Collection”

38 charming piano duets from the best sources. Easy, bright, and with abundance of variety. Good piano duets in collection form are difficult to find, and this book has proved very popular.

“Royal Reed Organ Collection”

57 of the most pleasing and excellent examples of music for the parlor organ,—waltzes, marches, operatic selections, etc.

“American Piano Collection”

The cheapest strictly high grade piano collection published. Fifty charming pieces. 215 pages. Handsome colored covers.

“Royal Collection of Instrumental Guitar Music”

80 pages, 82 pieces. Most complete and excellent instrumental guitar collection ever published for anything like the price.

“Royal Collection of Vocal Guitar Music”

80 pages, 42 songs. Uniform with the above.

EACH BOOK 50 CENTS POSTPAID

Oliver Ditson Company

453-463 Washington St., Boston

C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

and superintendents of Sunday-schools are requested to give notice of these increased facilities from the pulpit and in the Sunday-school on next Sunday. There are so many who desire to go to Providence on the morning of Thursday, returning the same day, that they need to be informed of this privilege, which they have, of reduced rates. This was intended in the first place, when arrangements were made with the railroad company; but through some oversight the dates were not correctly understood.

Literature.

HARPER'S "BOOK OF FACTS."*

A library in one volume is what we might call Harper's "Book of Facts." There is no department of science, art, history, politics, literature, and philosophy, into which it does not radiate. Turning over its pages at random, one might assume at first that there was very little unity in all this variety. But careful examination shows that it is something more than a miscellaneous scrap-bag of information. The large amount of material brought together is not merely arranged alphabetically, but is organized on a systematic plan and arranged with wise method.

The basis of the present volume is Haydn's "Dictionary of Dates," first prepared in 1841. The design which Haydn set before himself was "to attempt the compression of the greatest body of general information that has ever appeared in a single volume, and to produce a book of reference whose extensive usefulness may render its possession material to every individual." For what was comparatively a pioneer work in this direction Haydn's book was remarkably successful. It has been indispensable to every reference library. It has passed through twenty editions. But, valuable as it is, it is nevertheless marked, even in the American edition, by the provincialism which is apt to distinguish English works of that kind. History with the makers of English encyclopædias and gazeteers is apt to be the history of England or the continent. They have not discovered that we have been making history on this side of the water with a rapidity which will make up in some measure for our delay in beginning it. There has sprung up here a new nation with a history of its own; and, while it is easy for Americans to exaggerate the importance of their own history, it is just as easy for English writers to undervalue it. Taking simply the old-fashioned, though altogether false, method of estimating history as a succession of great battles, one of the greatest conflicts that ever occurred on the planet has taken place here; and the results of these battles are just as important in the history of the world as any that have preceded them. To any student of modern history the battle of Gettysburg is just as important as that of Marston Moor. Hence it is that nearly every English historical book of reference or cyclopædia must be made over if it is to be of much use to American readers. Harper's "Book of Facts" has incorporated the best part of Haydn; but it has been compiled and arranged with a different method, and presents such a greatly increased amount of material as to fairly entitle it to a distinctive name. The book has been adapted for American readers. There is danger, of course, of going to the opposite extreme, and of giving a prominence to American events which they do not deserve in a history of the world.

Some of the excellences of the work are its great range, the pains which have been taken to bring it up to date, the condensation of style and clearness of arrangement. By a system of cross-references, every page of the book becomes an index to some other page.

A book so comprehensive cannot be infallible. There are bound to be gaps here and there, and inconsistencies of arrangement, and occasional disproportion. We judge a work of this kind by what it contains, and also by what it leaves out. We have verified enough of it to be impressed with its general accuracy. Of lapses and omissions we name a few. Though the most important American colleges are mentioned, one must turn to Virginia to find any reference to William and Mary College. The notice of phonography does not recognize prominent American systems, nor is this done sufficiently under the title of "Stenography." It is odd to find the Pentateuch treated in a single line, as the "Five Books of Moses, probably written about 1452."

An inconsistency of arrangement is the description of the Methodist Episcopal Church under "Methodism"; while, under the title of "Protestant Episcopal Church," we are referred to the word "Church." "The Roman Catholic Church," on the other hand, is treated fully, but with different material, under both titles, "Roman Catholics" and "Church, Roman Catholic." In the matter of archæology the work is not so strong as in some other departments. Though Schliemann's discoveries are mentioned, Dörpfeld's discoveries seem to have been overlooked. Modern advances in Old Testament criticism are apparently ignored. The dogmatic assertion about the Pentateuch is equalled by that about the Psalms. "The Psalms of David were collected by Solomon, 1000 B.C.; others added 580 and 550 B.C." What if Dr. Briggs's persecutors should quote this against him? Though several obscure versions of the Psalms are mentioned, the "Bay Psalm Book," which has a great historic importance in New England, is not included; nor is it mentioned in the article on "Printing." There is a want sometimes of accuracy in indicating the pronunciation of names.

Of these limitations, which might be multiplied if we were to go into details, it must be said that no book of the kind could possibly be free from them; and we much prefer to judge such a work by its general merits than by special defects. Some of those we have referred to, such as belated Biblical criticism, are due to retaining features of Haydn which ought to have been revised or omitted.

The industry and care which Mr. Willsey has put into his work deserves recognition, and the volume has had the advantage of the valuable editorial judgment of Mr. Charlton T. Lewis. It is a valuable, convenient handbook of reference, covering a wide range of topics, and giving for the most part the information which the general reader is most likely to need.

"HYMNS FOR CHURCH AND HOME."*

Under the above happily chosen title the American Unitarian Association has just published a new hymn-book. It is the book published five years ago by Mary W. Tileston and Arthur Foote, then called "Hymns of the Church Universal," and now brought out with important changes and additions. Tastes differ as much, perhaps, in the matter of hymn-books as in regard to other things of use and beauty; and it is not easy to make a standard of comparison to which all will agree. One likes what another dislikes, and very often there is no more to be said. It would be for the most part useless, therefore, as well as ungracious, to try to fix the value of this new book with reference to others which have commended themselves to public favor. It will be enough to call attention to some of the merits of the work, without assuming to say that they are more or less conspicuous than the advantages which other hymn-books possess. First of all, it is undeniably a handsome book. Perhaps we may even go so far as to say that it is unusually handsome. Paper and printing are of the best; and the result is a very attractive page, which it is a pleasure to contemplate simply as a work of art. Again, turning to the table of contents, we find that the arrangement of the hymns is admirably systematized. They are so well grouped in classes under appropriate headings that the search for a hymn of particular character is much facilitated. This is a matter of no small consequence to the minister, who may wish to select hymns with reference to the topic of his sermon. When his memory is at fault, a good table of contents helps him quickly and easily to what he wants.

One sees from a brief glance over the scheme of its arrangement that this book is probably well adapted for use in Unitarian churches. More than a third of the whole book—that is to say, 189 pages—is devoted to "Hymns of the Christian Life." The next largest portion, or 111 pages, is devoted to "Worship and Praise," and to "The Presence of God in Nature and the Soul." Other smaller divisions of the book represent fairly well the amount of emphasis that is commonly laid upon the subjects of which they treat in Unitarian preaching. On the whole, from our point of view, it is a well-balanced arrangement. Especially to be commended is the provision of 24 pages of excellent chants. Churches which have adopted the liturgies recently published will find here most of the chants there appointed to be sung; and it would perhaps be a distinct gain in churches where no liturgy is used if choirs could be induced to substitute some of these chants for so-called anthems of which they are rather over-fond.

The music contained in this book ought to be good. Certainly, it has passed the inspection of a competent judge. Much of it is new. There is said to have been a great advance in the art of writing hymn-tunes. Particularly, the music of the English Church is said to have been greatly enriched in recent years in this direction. As many of these new tunes bear the names of composers who are thus accredited as good authors, it is fair to assume that we have in this book a valuable contribution of music that is new to most of our churches.

As to the literary qualities of the work, it is possible to speak with more assurance, and to say that they are unquestionably of a high order. All who know anything of Mrs. Tileston's taste in religious poetry would expect this. The rights of the authors of hymns have been scrupulously observed, and in very few instances has their original phrasing been changed. The custom of taking orthodox hymns and reading into them a new theology is to be censured on many accounts. Happily, as this book proves, there is little need to resort to that questionable practice. Many hymns, coming down to us from old days, strike a note which underlies theological differences; and our own writers have furnished much more than a scanty supply of hymns that will bear the test of frequent use. Both the old and the new are set before us in "Hymns for Church and Home." The new book, if it does not displace others, will undoubtedly find an earnest constituency of its own.

RESPONSIVE READINGS. Selected from the Bible, and arranged under Subjects for Common Worship. By Henry Van Dyke. Boston: Ginn & Co.—This book was originally prepared by request for the chapel of Harvard University, where it is now in use. It has been revised and enlarged, in the hope that it may supply a real want in the religious need of other colleges and schools, and also of churches. The selections have been made and arranged, as Dr. Van Dyke says, with the following objects in view: to give a wider range to the service by including appropriate passages for antiphonal reading from all parts of the Bible; to omit the imprecatory Psalms; to make each selection complete in itself, with a central thought, and not to attempt a mosaic of disconnected passages; to divide the verses only when it helps to make the meaning clear, and to keep the portion read by the people from being too long; to vary the length of the selections, so that it may be easy to find one to fit a short service when necessary; and to arrange the readings in relation to the great truths of religion, so that they may be instructive and helpful to faith and life. The Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creeds, and the Ten Commandments have been included in the book. Much of the value of the volume consists in the classification of selections and an indication by appropriate head-lines of the sentiment they express. The list of subjects is given in detail in the contents, and at the close there is an index of Bible passages.

FORWARD MOVEMENT LECTURES. By Brooke Herford. London: Philip Green. These lectures, which were delivered as Mr. Herford's part in a general course of simultaneous lectures on the same subjects given in the Unitarian churches throughout London, will interest many of his friends and readers in this country. A brief account of Unitarianism serves as introduction, after which Mr. Herford takes up in turn the following subjects: "The Old and the New Thought of the Bible," "The Old and the New Faith in God," "The Christ of the Gospels brought Back," "Practical Christianity the Salvation of Society," and "Heaven and Hell: Here and Hereafter." Mr. Herford treats these topics with his well-known vigor of thought and felicity of presentation; and the book will be found not only useful to those who already accept the faith which is here represented, but to many who desire to know what Unitarianism really stands for and what are the grounds of its belief.

GOD FORSAKEN. By Frederic Breton. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 50 cents.—Prof. Calvin Mortimer, one of the characters in this book, musing over the body of his dead wife, says: "I have been blind all my life, or I would never have deprived a woman of her faith in a personal God. As she herself said, she asked for bread, and I gave her a microbe." Perhaps this indicates sufficiently the plan of the novel. It shows the change in a woman's character coincident with her change from Catholicism to unbelief. She leaves her husband, for which the reader will hardly blame her, but is equally un-

Suggestions For Evening Parties

This magazine makes a feature of giving new ideas for pleasant home evenings. An entire page of new suggestions is in the October issue of

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

10 Cents: For Sale on all News-stands

The Curtis Publishing Company
Philadelphia

* HARPER'S BOOK OF FACTS. A Classified History of the World, embracing Science, Literature, and Art. Compiled by Joseph H. Willsey. Edited by Charlton T. Lewis. New York: Harper & Brothers. Sold only by subscription. Office for the New England States, 50 Bromfield Street, Boston.

* HYMNS FOR CHURCH AND HOME, WITH TUNES. Boston: American Unitarian Association.

happy with a Norwegian lover, whom she leaves in turn. For six weeks she serves as secretary to her husband during a temporary blindness, thinking herself unknown. She dies at last, and escapes her unsolved problems. The book is inconsequent and uneven.

THE WHITTIER YEAR BOOK. Passages from the Verse and Prose of John Greenleaf Whittier chosen for the Daily Food. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—It is not every poet who has written verses worthy of being read every day in the year. This is a severe test. There are poets who soar too high, beyond the range of the common mind; and there are those who drop too low to furnish daily food and inspiration. But Whittier wrote for the common heart, and he touched it because he wrote out of it. Yet it is not only the pulse of emotion and noble sentiment that we find in these extracts. There is here the glow of imagination. There are visions of beauty in these pages, apples of gold set in pictures of silver.

The Magazines.

The cheery yellow covers of the New England Magazine enclose numerous articles of interest this month. "The Boston Subway, and Others," written by F. Foxcroft, and well illustrated, is a complete and satisfactory exposition of what we may expect from the subway itself, and of the experience in other places with similar plans. R. G. F. Candage, writing of "Boston Light and the Brewsters," pays deserved tribute to the interesting history and the natural beauty of our Boston harbor. E. P. Powell tells of the settlement of the Oriskany Valley, under the title "New England in New York"; and Kate Gannett Wells relates the story of Deborah Sampson, a heroine of the American Revolution, probably an ancestor or kinswoman of her own, whose romantic experiences well deserve remembrance. There are other articles of interest in this October number.

"A Cruise on the Norfolk Breads" is the opening article in the Century Magazine for October, the leisurely, appreciative description of a sail from Wroxham to Yarmouth, brightened by an observation as quick to detect interesting points in human nature as in scenery. One of the most important criticisms on Nordau's "Degeneration" is that to be found here written by Prof. Cesare Lombroso, the "master" to whom the book is dedicated. It is interesting on account of its personal element, as well as its insight into Nordau's positions and its intelligent differing. "Glave's Career" tells the story of the explorer and his sad death. It is written by Robert Howard Russell, and Mr. Gilder adds a sonnet to the memory of one whom his friends have a right to praise. There are the usual memoirs, both of the first and the third Napoleon, and other features of more or less importance. George A. Hibbard's story, "An Earlier Manner," though light in general effect, touches on a deep truth in human nature.

We give a hearty welcome to all bright articles that encourage men and women to forsake crowded watering-places and the follies of summer hotel life for the free woods and closer communings with nature. In the current number of Harper's Magazine is a fascinating article by Henry Van Dyke, entitled "At the Sign of the Balsam Bough," which is sure to delight those who already know the camping joys whereof he writes, and to stir a vague, even if evanescent, longing in the hearts of the most confirmed seeker after crowds. "Alone in China" is a remarkable account of a marriage between a Chinese mandarin and an American, told with graphic directness by Julian Ralph. Poultney Bigelow, Richard Harding Davis, Thomas Hardy, and the author of "Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc" continue their serials. There is less attention paid to fiction in this number than usual, the two short stories being "The Coupons of Fortune," by Mary Stewart Cutting, and a tramp story by Josiah Flynt, "Jamie, the Kid." There are poems by Charles Dudley Warner and Alice Brown.

Literary Notes.

The numerous lovers of Miss Yonge will be glad to hear that Macmillan & Co. have just published her last story, "The Long Vacation," which deals with the further fortunes of the Mohuns and Merrifields and the innumerable branches of their family made familiar to the readers of Miss Yonge's earlier novels.

Macmillan & Co. will publish among their October fiction a new story by Anne E. Holdsworth, the successful author of "Joanna Traill, Spinster," under the quaint title, "The Years that the Locust hath eaten"; "Wild Rose," a tale of the Mexican frontier, by Francis Franois; and another story of adventure, called "A Son of the Plains," by Arthur Paterson, author of "A Man of his Word" and "A Daughter of the Nez Percés."

The October issue of the Quarterly Journal of Economics (published for Harvard University) will contain an article by Prof. Lexis of Göttingen on the concluding volume of Marx's "Capital," in which this posthumous publication of the great socialist is fully analyzed and criticised; an article by Prof. Bascom of Williams College, urging the retention of the gold standard as against international bimetalism; an article by Mr. G. K. Holmes of the Census Bureau, pointing out how far the people of the United States live in their homes as owners or as tenants; and a careful theoretical discussion, by Prof. Taussig of Harvard University, of the employer's place in distribution. There are also notes and memoranda on tariff history and on other subjects and the usual bibliography of current publications.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

- From Ginn & Co., Boston.
A History of Greece for Colleges and High Schools. By Philip Van Ness Meyers, L.H.D.
From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.
The Nimble Dollar, with Other Stories. By Charles Miner Thompson. Price $1.00.
Standish of Standish. A Story of the Pilgrims. By Jane Goodwin Austin. 2 volumes. Price $5.00.
The Christ of To-day. By George A. Gordon. Price $1.50.
From Lee & Shepard, Boston.
The Hazelwood Stories. "Little Daughter." By Grace Le Baron. Price 75 cents.
From Roberts Brothers, Boston.
Ernest Renan. My Sister Henrietta. With Photogravure Illustrations from Paintings by Henri Scheffer and Ary Renan. Translated by Abby L. Alger. Price $1.25.
History of People of Israel. By Ernest Renan. Price $2.50.
Don. By the author of "Miss Toosey's Mission." Price $1.00.
From Dreamland Sent. By Lillian Whiting. Price $1.25.
From D. Appleton & Co., New York.
The Red Badge of Courage. An Episode of the American Civil War. By Stephen Crane.
The Mottos and Commentaries of Friedrich Froebel's Mother Play.
From A. C. Armstrong & Son, New York.
The Book of Jeremiah. Chapters XXI-LIII. By W. H. Bennett, M.A. The Expositor's Bible.
From Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York.
Chilhowee Boys in War Time. By Sarah E. Morrison. Price $1.50.
Dr. Miller's Year Book. A Year's Daily Readings. By J. R. Miller, D.D. Price $1.25.
From the Century Company, New York.
The Horse Fair. By James Baldwin. Price $1.50.
Washington in Lincoln's Time. By Noah Brooks. Price $1.25.
From E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.
What I Told Dorcas. A Story for Mission Workers. By Mary E. Ireland.
From the American Book Company, New York.
Elements of Geometry, Plane and Solid. By John Macfie, A.M. Edited by Emerson E. White, A.M., L.L.D. Price $1.25.
From Macmillan & Co., New York.
College Sermons. By the late Benjamin Jowett, M.A. Edited by the Very Rev. the Hon. W. H. Fremantle, M.A. Price $2.00.
The Men of the Moss-hags. By S. R. Crockett. Price $1.50.
The Delectable Duchy. Stories, Studies, and Sketches. By "Q," author of "The Splendid Spur." Paper covers.
The Herons. By Helen Shipton. Price $1.00.
From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.
Mr. Midshipman Easy. By Captain Marryat. Price $2.50.
Richelieu. A Tale of France. By G. P. R. James. 2 volumes. Price $2.50.
The Red Star. By L. McManus.
At Tuxter's. By G. P. Burgin.
From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.
Tales of an Engineer. With Rhymes of the Rail. By Cy Warman. Price $1.25.
The Bachelor's Christmas, and Other Stories. By Robert Grant. Price $1.50.
Cruising among the Caribbees. Summer Days in Winter Months. By Charles Augustus Stoddard. Price $1.50.
The Kanter Girls. By Mary L. B. Branch. Price $1.50.
Constantinople. By F. Marion Crawford. Illustrated by Edwin L. Weeks. Price $1.50.

Music Received.

- From Wm. A. Pond & Co., New York.
Often when my Soul in Anguish. Words by Mrs. C. E. Burdett Taylor. Music by Mrs. A. H. Taylor.
Bear thou my Greeting. Words and music by John Lloyd Whitney.
Now I lay me down to Sleep. Song. By Mrs. A. H. Taylor.
Love's Answer. Words by E. G. Cheverton. Music by Albert W. Brown.
The Cable Car. Words and music by Spencer Palmer.
The Old Trundle Bed. Words by James Whitcomb Riley. Music by Mrs. A. H. Taylor.
A Chinese Tale. Words and music by F. Van der Stucken.
Papillon (Butterfly). By Edvard Grieg. For Piano-forte.
The King's Roses. Four-part Song for Female Voices. Words by Helen F. Lovett. Music by J. W. Parson. Price.
Rock of Ages. Hymn Anthem. Words by Aug. M. Toplady. Music by Mrs. A. H. Taylor.
Grand Polka de Concert. By Homer M. Bartlett. Revised and simplified by Carl Iverson.
The Girl for me. Song. By Mary Miller Fleming.
Devotedness. Song. By Mary Miller Fleming.
Waiting in the Twilight. English and Italian Words. Words and music by John Lloyd Whitney.

A New Evangelist!

So say devoted pastors who have used the lantern in church work. Its usefulness is proved in the conversion of thousands, and it is confidently predicted that the Stereopticon, in ten years, will be as universally used as the organ. All pastors can buy on instalment plan and hire slides very cheap.

Write for pamphlet, "Solved; or, The Sunday Evening Problem." Read its hints, and the actual experience of pastors who have tried the new plan. It is mailed for the asking. Illustrated catalogue 20 cents.

RILEY BROTHERS,

Branches: 16 Beekman St., New York.
BOSTON, 241 Washington St. CHICAGO, 196 La Salle St.
KANSAS CITY (Mo.), 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS, 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA, 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO, 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND, 411 Couch St.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh
ANCHOR, Cincinnati.
ATLANTIC, New York.
BEYMER-BAUMAN, Pittsburgh.
BRADLEY, New York.
BROOKLYN, New York.
COLLIER, St. Louis.
CORNELL, Buffalo.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS, Pittsburgh.
ECKSTEIN, Cincinnati.
FAHNESTOCK, Pittsburgh.
JEWETT, New York.
KENTUCKY, Louisville.
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS. CO. Philadelphia.
MORLEY, Cleveland.
MISSOURI, St. Louis.
RED SEAL, St. Louis.
SALEM, Salem, Mass.
SHIPMAN, Chicago.
SOUTHERN, St. Louis and Chicago.
ULSTER, New York.
UNION, "

The old saying that "goods well bought are half sold" is true of Pure White Lead. Dealers cannot afford to sell, or painters to use, unknown or inferior brands (see list genuine brands). Reputation is capital, and can only be acquired by selling or using the best materials. Responsible dealers sell, and practical painters everywhere use these brands.

Any desired shade of color may be easily produced by using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead tinting colors. Sample card of colors and pamphlet is sent free.

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,

1 Broadway, New York.

Browning in One Volume.

MESSRS. HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND COMPANY take pleasure in announcing the CAMBRIDGE BROWNING.

The Complete Poetic and Dramatic Works of Robert Browning. Cambridge Edition. In one convenient volume, printed on clear type, opaque paper, and attractively bound. With a Biographical Sketch, Notes, Indexes, a fine new portrait and engraved title-page, and a vignette of Asolo. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $3.00; half calf, gilt top, $5.00; tree calf, or full levant, $7.00.

This is a triumph of book-making, bringing within a single convenient and attractive volume the complete wonderful and voluminous product of Browning's genius.

A SINGULAR LIFE.

By ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, author of "The Gates Ajar," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

A story of remarkable power and significance, depicting the heroic career of a singularly conscientious minister among fishermen, and the sublime success he achieved.

THE LIFE OF NANCY.

By SARAH ORNE JEWETT, author of "Deep-haven," "A Native of Winby," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

A book of short stories as good as Miss Jewett has ever written, and her stories are among the finest and most attractive portions of American literature.

THE COURTSHIP OF MILES STANDISH.

A beautiful Popular Holiday Edition of LONGFELLOW's famous Pilgrim poem, with many illustrations by BOUGHTON, MERRILL, and others. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

SOBRIQUETS AND NICKNAMES.

By A. R. FREY. A new edition of this cyclopedia of information on its special theme, uniform with the volumes of the Riverside Reference Library, to which it is now added. Crown 8vo, price reduced to $2.00.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

Popular Works.

Baltimore American.—There is a tranquil, strengthening, uplifting power in these little books that makes one cherish for them, when they have been enjoyed and laid aside, the warm, grateful sentiment with which we treasure dear friends.

"As Natural as Life."

Studies of the Inner Kingdom. By Charles G. Ames, Minister of the Church of the Disciples, Boston. 109 pages.

"One of the most satisfying treatises we have ever read. The little volume is a spiritual poem, expressed in a human form called prose; but the beauty of its truth has root in the Infinite. It will prove a keen delight to the appreciative thinker."—Boston Ideas.

In Love with Love.

Four Life-Studies. By James H. West, author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," "Poems," etc. 109 pages.

"There is something singularly fresh and strong in Mr. West's way of putting things. Any one of these studies read at night would sweeten a man's slumber, and waken him in the morning to some better sense of his great opportunity."—John W. Chadwick, in the Christian Register.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as related to the Inward Life. By Marion D. Shutter, D.D., author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. 111 pages.

"One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful."—Philadelphia To-day.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, each 50 cents.

Special gift edition, full gilt, each $1.00.

 For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,

174 High Street, - - - Boston.

Now Ready.

HYMNS

FOR

CHURCH AND HOME WITH TUNES.

The Hymns edited by Mrs. MARY W. TILESTON

The Tunes edited by Mr. ARTHUR FOOTE.

As stated in the preface, "In this collection endeavor has been made to provide an ample number of hymns of thankfulness, joy, and hope, and of active service," and, in the music, "to include, so far as possible, old tunes, whose associations or musical value warrant their retention; and, when a new or unfamiliar tune is given, a more familiar one of the same metre has, if practicable, been put on the opposite page. There will be found a number of English tunes, which, although new to most of our congregations, have been tested by years of use in other branches of the Christian Church."

The book is a square 8vo, of 512 pages, contains 801 hymns, and is handsomely and substantially bound in morocco.

Price, $1.50, with a discount of 20 per cent. to societies introducing the book and to clergymen, to whom a copy will be sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1.20.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,
25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS.

The Bible: Its Origin, Growth, and Character. pp. 300. G. P. Putnam's Sons, publishers. Price $1.50.

The Liberal Ministry as a Calling. I. For Young Men. II. For Young Women. pp. 96. Geo. H. Ellis, publisher. Price 50 cents.

One Upward Look Each Day. Poems of Faith and Hope. (Compilation.) Morocco, 75 cents; cloth, 50 cents; paper, 30 cents. Special edition in morocco, containing marriage certificate, 75 cents.

What do Unitarians Believe? pp. 16. Nineteenth Thousand. Price, 10 cents a dozen; 75 cents a hundred.

Unitarianism: Its History, Present Condition, and Prospects. pp. 16. Twenty-fifth Thousand. Price, 10 cents a dozen; 75 cents a hundred.

Is the Bible Infallible? pp. 40. Tenth Thousand. Price, 5 cents a copy; $2.00 a hundred.

Mr. Sunderland's College Town Pulpit is necessarily suspended during his year abroad, but is to be resumed on his return. The next number may be expected in September, 1896. Back numbers (sermons for 1894-95) can be furnished to order. Subjects: 1. "The Soul's Cry for God"; 2. "Jesus as Humanity's Ideal"; 3. "Sectarianism: Its Causes and Cures"; 4. "The True Cross of Christ"; 5. "Was Jesus God? How did he come to be worshipped?" 6. "Loyalty to Conviction"; 7. "Is Life a Blessing?" 8. "Mr. Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible"; 9. "A Religion for a Republic"; 10. "The Surest Way of doing Good."

Price per sermon, 5 cents.

 Any of the above publications may be obtained from the publishers, or by sending orders to Miss J. S. GREGG, Ann Arbor, Mich.

Hymnal.

AMORE DEI.

This Hymnal is steadily making its way into use in a large number of churches, and in all cases gives satisfaction.

If considering a new book, send for sample copies, which will be sent subject to return, if not adopted.

PRICES:

Cloth, 90 cents; Leather, $1.35.

By the dozen, per copy,

Cloth, 75 cents; Leather, $1.10.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Four Great Questions concerning God. By M. J. SAVAGE. 86 pages, Paper 25 cents.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.

THE OLD FOLKS OF THE TOWN.

BY EDWARD N. STONE.

I remember it as yesterday, though years have rolled away,
How we gathered in the "meeting-house" each solemn Sabbath day,
How the staid New England farmers, in their "Sunday best," arrayed,
Sternly silent, sat and listened to the words the parson said,
And how from the gallery I gazed in childish wonder down
At the patriarchs of the village church, the old folks of the town.

There they sat, those white-haired pilgrims, clustered in the foremost pews,
Straining every sense to test the soundness of the preacher's views.
Orthodox were they in spirit, Puritans in name and blood,
Knowing of no middle ground betwixt the evil and the good.
They had "kept the faith" right nobly, through the ages handed down,
And the pillars of the church were still the old folks of the town.

Yet oft-times the body's weakness mocked the spirit's watchful care,
And amid the flood of doctrine slumber seized them unaware;
For the weight of threescore years and ten was mightier than their will,
And the length of orthodox discourse was far more mighty still.
And irreverent urchins giggled, spite of parents' warning frown,
When they spied a nodding head among the old folks of the town.

But when theme and prayer were ended (for all things must have an end),
And choir and congregation rose, their melodies to blend,
And bade the trumpet sound abroad to call lost sinners home,
Because the long-expected Year of Jubilee was come,
Then how thrilling was the music, which no louder notes could drown,
Of the cracked and quavering voices of the old folks of the town.

Years have come and years have vanished, and the cold New England snows
Now have drifted many a winter o'er the graves where they repose;
But those dim old eyes are gladdened now by sights we may not see,
And the quavering voices sweetly chant the Song of Jubilee,
For the Master whom they served so well has laid his golden crown
On the sainted, silvery temples of the old folks of the town.

Years have come and years have vanished and have brought me in their train
Many a bitter disappointment, much of sorrow and of pain.
I will gladly yield to others all the pomp that wealth can claim,
Leave to them the glittering prizes of power and of fame;
And I ask no higher honor when I lay life's burdens down
Than to rest at last in peace among the old folks of the town.

For the Christian Register.

A CASTAWAY.

BY ROBERT PALFREY UTTER.

"Come here, Midget, and tell me what you have been doing over at Bessy Morriss's all the afternoon." He caught the little white dress as it fluttered by, and drew her up on his knee. "Now tell me all about it," he commanded.

"Mr. Morriss told us stories," she said.

"Why, wasn't he at the office?"
"He is sick," she said. "He hurt his ankle yesterday. You mustn't laugh, papa, because Mr. Morriss is sick."

"I didn't," he said: "it was because his ankle was sick. What did he do to it?"

"He hurt it on his bicycle, but he will be all right Wednesday. Papa, why don't you stay at home and tell me stories?"

"Because I don't hurt my ankle," he replied.

"You stayed at home the day Uncle George was here," she urged.

"When you come from San Francisco to see me, I will do as much for you."

"But you might tell stories, anyway."

He laughed. "My talent does not lie that way," he said. "What did Morriss tell you about,—dragons and fairies?"

"No," she said: "the best one was about a kitten."

"A kitten!" he repeated. "Well, I do know a story about a kitten; but I don't know as it would suit you, for it is true."

"Tell it, anyway," she commanded. "Sometimes the true ones are just as good as the others."

"It was when we were out West," he began. "We were going to climb a mountain. Tom, what mountain were we on that night we slept in the snow?"

"The one north of Lone Peak," said Tom. "It didn't have any name."

"Oh, yes," he resumed. "Well, we started right after supper, so as to have the long march across the valley in the evening and morning when it wasn't hot. When we got to Mill Creek, we met a rancher with a big wagon; and he took us all in the wagon, and we rode with him until nearly nine o'clock, and got well out toward the mountains. He left us on the road that runs to Big Cottonwood Cañon, just at the beginning of the hill where the white house with the flag-staff stands. You remember it, Tom?"

"Do I?" said Tom, energetically.

"Never mind, Tom," commanded the audience. "Tell me about the kitten."

"We started up the hill," he went on; "but, before we had gone far, we heard the most piteous wailing I ever heard. Tom was sure it was a child."

"No, that was Carl," said Tom. "I said it was a cat all the time."

"So you did. Well, it was a cat, sure enough, wandering back and forth in the sage-brush, crying in the most hopeless way. It was the most pitiful sound I ever heard."

"Was it worse than when Jimmy Morriss hurt his thumb in the door?" asked the Midget.

Papa laughed. "Well, it was quite different," he said. Tom called, "Kitty, kitty, kitty!" and the little creature came running to us as though we were rescuing her from a wreck or a desert island. We could not see her very distinctly in the moonlight, but she looked to be very thin."

"What color was she?" asked the Midget.

"She was a common little gray kitten, with white marks, as nearly as I could judge. Tom stooped to pick her up as she came toward him; but she avoided his hand, and would not let any of us touch her, and ran around and around us, mewing constantly. We started on; and the kitten ran along ahead of us, sometimes almost under our feet, and always mewing and looking back to make sure we were there. Finally, I succeeded in picking her up; but she would not stay with me, so I let her go again."

"Did you give her a saucer of milk?" asked the Midget.

"No," he replied. "I didn't happen to have one in my pocket. We decided to leave the kitten at the house on the top of the hill. So, when we got to it, Tom caught her, and put her down inside the fence; and we walked on briskly. But we had not gone far before we heard the same piteous mewing, and looked back. The kitten was running after us,—a little black shadow in the road, which was white with dust and moonlight. At the next house, about quarter of a mile further on, I took the kitten, and told the boys to hurry on. When they had gone far enough, I tossed the kitten as far as I could into the yard, and ran after them. The yard was covered with alfalfa, and had a 'slat and wire' fence around it; and I thought the kitten would not be able to find her way out until we were gone. But I had not reached the boys before she was after me again."

"It was the funniest thing I ever saw," said Tom, "to see you running along with that big blanket on your back, and the tiny little kitten at your heels."

"What did you do then?" demanded the Midget.

"There was nothing to do but to let her run along with us, which she did very industriously. The next house was a mile or more away; and we decided that, when we came to it, we would tie the kitten to the fence, and leave her to the mercy of the people who might live there. So, just before we came to the house, I tied a string about her neck, and was just going to tie her up, when something came out of the weeds beside the road. What do you guess it was?"

"A kangaroo," said the Midget, promptly.

"No, it was another kitten."

"Oh!" said the Midget. "Was it your kitty's sister?"

"I should judge not by their actions. I put our kitten down; and in an instant both backs were up, and they were talking at each other in a most hostile fashion."

"Did they love each other?" asked the Midget.

"Why, no, dear. I say they were just going to fight."

"Oh!"

"We took the opportunity to run away as fast as we could, and leave our troublesome little charge. Soon we fell into a walk, and began to congratulate ourselves that we were rid of her at last, when we heard her mewing again, and knew that she was in pursuit of us once more. We hid hastily in the scrub-oak beside the road, thinking that, if she did not find us, she might turn back; but she didn't."

"What did she do?" asked the Midget.

"She ran back and forth before our hiding-place, as though she knew that we had not gone on, mewing so piteously that we had no choice but to come out and go on. She followed us bravely for several miles along the road. Finally, we began going across the open fields; and we put our hats in our pockets, and looked like a pack of hunchback goblins with our blankets on our backs, and our black shadows about our feet. Do you remember, Tom?"

"Yes," said Tom; "and the moonlight on the big white peaks and the valley! Wasn't it grand?"

"What did the kitty do?" asked the Midget.

"She got tired with hopping over the stubble of the wheat-fields, and was glad to let us carry her at last. Finally, we came to the last house before the one in the mouth of the cañon; and there we tied her to the fence, and left her."

"Then what became of her?" asked the Midget.

"I am sure I don't know," he replied.

"I have often wondered about it."

"Papa," said the Midget, suddenly twisting round and looking up at him, "you don't end it up nicely at all."

"But that's the way it did end," he said.

"I don't care: it isn't nice."

"How ought it to end?"

"Oh, you ought to take her up the mountain; and she would catch mice and birds and squirrels and rabbits and bears, and by and by she would grow up to be a big kitty, and you would bring her home, and we would always keep her." He and Tom laughed heartily.

"Run along, and fix it to suit yourself," he said, putting her down. "You can do it a great deal better than I can."

THE LITTLE HOUSE IN THE WOODS.

"O Harold, aren't you glad? I'm so happy I have to hold myself down to keep from flying! Two whole hours to play before six o'clock; and Rosie is over at grandpa's, and we can stay the whole time in our dear, dear, own little house!"

"But you don't know what I'm going to do, Marjory. You know what lots of nice, flat stones there are everywhere here? Well, I'll show you the size I want; and you c'lect 'em for me, and I'll build a little fireplace with a chimney in our house. There's plenty of good, sticky, wet clay down by the creek for mortar."

"O Harold!" Marjory could say no more; but the light in her great gray eyes and the ecstatic clasping of two brown little hands showed what she thought of the idea.

"Then, when we get the chimney made, you can c'lect dry sticks to burn while I catch some fish and clean them, and we'll cook 'em on the coals. I got a lump of salt in my pocket."

"Perhaps we ought to take the fish home for Uncle John," said Marjory, doubtfully. "He liked those so much you caught last week."

"Pshaw! Aunt Maria hates the bother of cooking them. Besides," he went on bitterly, "I don't know what they've done for us that we should bother to do anything for them after our work's done."

"Everybody thinks they're awful good to us," said conscientious Marjory.

"That's all they know about it," with a contemptuous toss of his bright curls and a defiant flash of his blue eyes.

What had Uncle John and Aunt Maria done for the penniless orphan children? Nothing, but to give them a comfortable home, good food, decent clothes, and sensible training in useful work, with a reasonable though carefully measured allowance of playthings. What had they failed to give? Fatherly tenderness, motherly petting, the sense of freedom and sympathy. They thought the children spoiled and ungrateful: the children thought them cold and hard. What a pity that they did not understand each other better, that the good people who were straitening themselves to provide for John's sister's children did not know how to bestow their gifts with graciousness, and that the warm-hearted, impulsive boy and girl became chill and constrained in the presence of their benefactors.

Uncle John and Aunt Maria did not understand what a change it was for the children to come from their town home, with its prettiness and daintiness, its schools and social pleasures, its gay, tender little mother, to the hard work, rough ways, and loneliness of the farm.

Was there nothing to bring them nearer each other? Yes: there was one bond of union. Dear little five-year-old Rose, with her sweet, dimpled, wild-rose face,—Aunt Maria's precious baby girl. Harold and Marjory both loved her and petted her. She might have made them all friends, only that the twins dared not tell her their one great, precious secret, their own little house in the woods, lest she should tell her mother. They felt a bitter conviction that Aunt Maria would instantly forbid any such foolishness, make them bring all their treasures back to the safe shelter of the house, and quite give up their one refuge.

So they only played there when Rose was asleep or gone to town with her mother, or away on one of her frequent visits to her adoring grandma.

The children had come from a prairie town, and these woods were a constant wonder and delight. They were no great, primeval forest, but open oak and walnut woods, with occasional thickets, beloved of birds and wild flowers. They were in that strange "driftless region" of Southern Wisconsin, and a narrow strip of Iowa across the river, that the learned say was an island of bare land when all the surrounding country was covered with a great ice-sheet a mile thick. There were no red granite boulders here, such as they used to see here and there on the prairie, no rounded pebbles of many colors, such as lay near the boulders, only everywhere flat, gray limestone rocks, with the marks of strange fossils on them, which puzzled the children immensely.

The flat, gray rocks, or pieces of rock, were fine for all the needs of playhouse builders; and they had used them ingeniously in their "fairy palace," as Marjory called it. Harold called it a "shanty."

It was in an out-of-the-way corner of the woods, where there was a thicket on one side of a big mass of rock, that towered up like a fragment of a ruined castle. A young oak-tree had been bent over at right angles, about five feet from the ground, by the mass of wild grape-vines that covered it. This was the roof of their house. The back of it was the big rock itself: the sides and part of the front were woven of saplings and underbrush. They had two old rubber blankets, which papa had used years before on hunting trips. One of these lined the roof: the other—rolled up when the house was in use, and tied down when they left it—made the door.

Within there were seats and table, built

FINE CLOTHING SAVED
BY
Sunlight
Soap

Nothing is so harassing to the feelings as to have beautiful clothes torn and eaten by the use of poor soaps, full of injurious acids. Not only does Sunlight Soap prevent wear and tear, it actually saves clothes. It's a labor-saver, too, because it does about all the work itself—little rubbing and no bother. Besides, it prevents woollens from shrinking.

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

of bits of board and rock, and upholstered with moss. There were also Marjory's little rocking-chair, her doll's cradle, with her doll in it, two or three little vases with wild flowers in them, and gay picture-cards fastened against the rock at the back.

It was really a cosey little playhouse, arranged with much childish taste; but to the children it was much more than that: it was a refuge and a home, in a sense that the comfortable farm-house had never been, the one bit of their old, free, happy, sheltered life left to them.

"If only Rosie could see it!" sighed Marjory, as she refilled her vases with the flowers she had gathered as she came through the woods.

What a treasure and joy the wonderful new woodland wild flowers had been! True, they missed some of their prairie friends,—the starry dog-tooth violets, like tiny white Easter lilies, the melting blue and satiny pink of the luxuriant masses of the lungwort,—bluebells, they called them,—and, later, the larkspur and wild hyacinth and pink sweet-william; but, oh! the joy and surprise of the Easter flowers, the big pale blue anemones that blossomed in March, cuddled close to the ground and wrapped in fur to keep from freezing, but smiling bravely at the bitter March wind, the rapture of the pink and blue hepaticas, the waxen white blood-root, the rose-veined spring beauty, the pale yellow lily of the bellwort, the splendid great white trillium!

Now, late in May, the scarlet columbine and blue harebells, with the tiny white stars of the rock cress, hung from every crevice in the face of their big castle rock. Marjory had gone a little out of her way, to a damp, steep, northward-facing ravine side, for an armful of shooting stars.

"They're like the pink ribbon I had on my hat one summer," she explained to Harold: "the sun fades them. Don't you remember what a pale pink they were on the prairie? And down in there, where the sun never shines, they are crimson, and so sweet. They are twice as fragrant as the prairie ones."

Harold was really very patient and polite for a boy; but he felt obliged right here to remind Marjory they must drop foolishness and get to work if their fireplace was to be built and their fish caught and cooked.

Meanwhile little Rose was having a rather dull afternoon at her grandma's. An old neighbor, who had gone to Kansas twenty years before, had come back for her first visit to her old home; and grandma did not have half the time and attention to give her baby that she usually had. So, when Rose announced that it was time for her to go home, grandma tied on the little straw hat without any protest, stuffed the apron pocket with cookies, started baby off with a kiss, and scarcely watched her through the gate before she returned to her guest, with

"Well, as I was saying, Elijah Pettibone's wife!"

Little Rose trotted bravely off by herself. It was a scant half-mile, a broad, open path through the woods; and she had been over it two or three times a week ever since she was a two-year-old. No one dreamed of any danger to the baby in passing over it at five o'clock of a warm spring afternoon.

But it was very warm. It was a tired-feeling afternoon, some way. Little Rose dragged one plump foot wearily after the other, and carried her hat on her arm.

"I wish my papa or my grandpa would come with the horses," she murmured. "I wish Margie and Harold would make a chair wiv their hands and carry me. It's so hot; and the sun isn't shining any more, eiver!" with a sudden, startled glance around her.

Crash! Heaven and earth seemed to split at once with the sound and the blinding light. A fierce wind came rushing down the road, flinging raindrops as big and hard as bullets at the defenceless baby. With a terrified scream little Rose ran into the darkening woods for shelter, ran wildly further and further from home and safety.

"Well, I should think them children were big enough to come in when it rains. Still, I s'pose they're safe enough somewhere. It came up so sudden, and they likely were ketched a good piece from home. Probably they're under a big rock or in a cave somewhere. But they'll git soaked through, coming home through the wet woods,—spoil their shoes, and ketch cold, too, like as not. I'm thankful Rose is safe at mother's. Of course, they never would let her start home with a storm coming up. Grandma would have to keep her baby to supper, anyhow. Father'll bring her home in the buggy when the shower is over."

So, for the twentieth time, Aunt Maria said, as she stepped deftly about her shining kitchen, putting a hot supper on the table, more anxious at the children's absence than she cared to confess.

The first wild fury of the storm was over. For the last fifteen minutes it had been only a steady downpour, with no thunder and little wind. The sound of a horse's feet splashing furiously through the mud and storm and a shout at the gate startled the inmates of the kitchen. Uncle John had thrown open the door before even Aunt Maria could reach it.

"Did Rose get home before the storm?" shouted Joe, grandpa's hired man.

"O God, have mercy!" moaned Aunt Maria. "My baby! my baby!" Like a lightning flash, accusing conscience smote her. "You did not feel like that about the other children," it said. "Can you pretend you loved them like a mother?" "God save my baby," cried poor Aunt Maria in her heart, "and I will be a mother to the motherless from henceforth. John Marston," sharply, "what are you standing still for? Get your hat and rain coat and a lantern, quick, while I put on my gossamer and rubbers. Joe, you ride on, and alarm the neighbors."

But before either of the men could move to obey a drenched little figure came tramping sturdily through the rain.

Aunt Maria pounced on him, breathless, and dragged him through the door, searching his face with devouring eyes.

"Rosie's safe, Aunt Maria," he hastened to say. "I heard her crying in the woods, and I found her before she got much wet,—the trees kept the rain off at first; and we took her into our little house, and Marjory took off her wet dress and shoes, and wrapped her in an old shawl of mother's she keeps there, and we had a fire, and—she's all right. I caught four minnies," he went on to say, looking wistfully at the supper table; "and we gave Rosie two of 'em, and Marjory and me had one apiece."

His listeners were weeping thankful tears, but in a moment Aunt Maria was her capable self again. With one motion, as it were, she stripped off his wet clothes, rubbed him vigorously, and had him dressed in dry garments and wrapped in an old waterproof, with a drumstick in one hand and a biscuit in the other. "Now show me the way," she commanded, filling one tin pail with bread and fried chicken and another with warm milk.

Uncle John followed, with an armful of wraps and the useless lantern; for the storm was breaking now, and the lovely May sunset beginning to shine through t rees and turn the rain to drops of gold.

Harold led the way, manfully; but his heart was heavy.

"Of course, we had to tell," he was thinking to himself. "We never could have got Rose home through the wet woods ourselves; but I wonder if Aunt Maria will let us keep our shanty!"

He led them to the cunningly built bower, and lifted the rubber door. It was warm and bright inside, with a little fire of sticks burning cheerily in the new-built fireplace. Marjory sat in her rocking-chair, singing softly to her baby cousin, sleeping in her arms, warm and rosy.

Aunt Maria restrained a wild impulse to clasp her recovered treasure, threw off her dripping gossamer, and knelt and put her arms round both little girls at once. The action and the look in her face emboldened Marjory to say:—

"May we keep the little house, aunty? I didn't bring anything out here but my very own things, and they won't get spoiled; for all this big rain never got in a bit."

"Of course you may keep your playhouse, and Rosie may come out here when you want her. And—and"—it was hard for Aunt Maria to utter sentiment, but she was determined the words should come—"I want you and Harold to feel you are my very own, just as much as Rose is. I'll be just as good a mother to you as I can."

"You dear, good aunty! I love you, and I never will be afraid of you again," sobbed Marjory, clinging round her neck.

Harold said nothing; but he looked penitent and ashamed and happy all at once, as he stood holding Uncle John's hand tight. S. W. Shoup, in the Independent.

A TROUBLESOME PLANT.

A few years ago, while on a visit to Colombia, a New Orleans man saw and admired a water hyacinth. He brought some bulbs home, and grew them in tubs in his front yard. In about two years patches of the flower appeared in the Bayou St. John, which connects New Orleans with Lake Pontchartrain. In another year the bayou was full of it, so that navigation was impeded. Now all the canals near New Orleans are overrun and covered up with the invading flower. Great masses of it are floating in the lake, rivers running into the lake are choked with it, and it has travelled a hundred miles to the westward of New Orleans. It grows enormously, spreads like rabbits in Australia, chokes all the bayous and streams it gets into, and is a tremendous nuisance, the limitations of which are not in sight. In Colombia it is a harmless, flowering plant that grows in tubs; but in Louisiana the conditions suit it, and have developed it into the most flourishing and obstinate pest.—Popular Science News.

SOME NOVEL RACES.

A London newspaper some years ago contained an account of a strange sort of contest which two noblemen once got up for their own amusement. It consisted of matching a flock of turkeys and a flock of geese for a race on the London and Norwich road, in the middle of the last century. The turkeys would insist upon flying up into the roadside trees to roost; while the geese, keeping up a steady waddle all night, reached London from Norwich two days ahead. The same journal also mentions the feats of Hon. Tom Coventry's sprinting pig. In 1803 this speedy animal was matched against a celebrated runner, and started a strong favorite on the day of the race, which she won with ease. The pig had been trained to run the distance each day for its dinner. Another strange contest of this time took place between two sporting noblemen, who raced against each other on a windy day on Hampstead Heath, one running backwards in jack-boots, and the other holding up an open umbrella, and running forwards.—Selected.

ASK Your Grocer for

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

Two Mince Pies, equal to our Grandmother's, from each package of None-Such Mince Meat, without the worry and work. For sale by all Grocers.

MERRELL-SOULE CO., Syracuse, N. Y.

“A BRIGHT HOME MAKES A MERRY HEART.” JOY TRAVELS ALONG WITH

SAPOLIO

Diphtheria

★ Less Fatal.

If the patient's strength can be maintained, and the great vital centres of the body "kept up" to the performance of their natural functions, they will thus dispel the disease germs that impregnate the entire body, and if sufficient vitality is experienced, the fatality of this dreaded disease is lessened a hundred-fold.

Bovinine

that greatest raw food, is a wonderful creator of new flesh and nerve tissue, is indispensable in the treatment of this malady, as it gives strength to the patient with the least effort on the part of the digestive organs, and in addition, being itself a germicide, it antidotes the existing microbes of the disease. The ease with which it can be taken when the lesions of the throat preclude the use of other foods, makes it an additional necessity for the sufferer's recovery.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every library and reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,
50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.
Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

New York, N.Y., 11 West 86th St. (adj. Central Park). A
THE JACOTOT SCHOOL. Boarding & Day School for Girls. Mlle. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Fall term begins Oct. 1. Kindergarten begins Oct. 15.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL
FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.
Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.
SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

MASSACHUSETTS, Springfield.
MR. and MRS. JOHN McDUFFIE'S School For Girls. Formerly Miss Howard's. All grades. Illustrated Catalogue.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.
Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS
in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION
for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

MONEY WANTED.
I want to borrow money to increase my dairy business on paying lines and improve a good farm. I can give good, safe real estate security, and pay interest promptly. Property steadily rising in value. Address "P. J. N.," in care of GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston, to whom I am at liberty to refer.

WANTED— A little boy or girl, delicate or otherwise, or an infant from birth, requiring a mother's care, to bring up in a Unitarian minister's family, the members of which are thoroughly domesticated and musical. House in full view of the Atlantic Ocean and beautiful scenery of the harbor, only four miles from Boston. Abundance of new milk and fresh laid eggs. References: Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D., and Rev. E. A. Horton, Boston. Address "X. Y. Z.," Christian Register Office, Boston.

For the Christian Register.
TO SLEEP.

BY THOMAS I. HOGAN.

Dear mistress of my purer, better part,
Come swiftly with thy soft compelling eye,
Dim shining; fold me closely to thy heart;
With rarest tenderness of touch and look,
And mild insistence, child of deepest love,
My sick brain nurture, and embalm my sigh
In essence of soft sighings, till forsook
Of each wild brooding, ev'ry darkening lie,
My soul will in its native freedom move.
Sweet mistress, come!

Thou only, queen of all the middle land,
Hast empire absolute; o'er death and life
Alike thou rulest in a life more grand
In high communing, soul enchantment sweet
As sweetest sadness, loftier bliss replete,
Than if realities of waking hopes were rife,
And daylight dreams complete. With lover's hand
Come lead me swift through ever-fading light
Of flesh, unto the soul's immortal sight.
Dear mistress, come!

ROBERT BEVERLY HALE.

The Boston Transcript of Monday, October 7, contains the following notice of Robert Beverly Hale:—

The entire community will sympathize deeply with Dr. Hale in the loss of his youngest son, at a time when he is in such serious anxiety, also, as to the issue of Mrs. Hale's critical illness. But the death of Robert Beverly Hale is more than a private loss. Although but twenty-six years old, he had already done notable literary work, earning him recognition as one of the most promising of the younger writers of Boston. He was clearly at the beginning of a brilliant career, and people were turning their eyes to him with pride and great expectations. The stories from his pen which have appeared in recent months in the Atlantic Monthly, the New England Magazine, and elsewhere, are stories of no common kind. They revealed an ingenuity, a humor, an originality, and always a human warmth which have led many to feel that Dr. Hale's own literary genius was to be perpetuated peculiarly in this son. The strong sonnet upon Francis Parkman, which appeared in the last number of the New England Magazine, shows, also, his genuine and noteworthy poetic talent. He was a man of rare versatility, of close application, and of high purpose. He united in himself, like his father, the literary instinct with the instincts of the man of progress and the reformer. He was a member of the Municipal League; and at the time when he was struck down by illness he was deeply interested with other young men in plans for a new social settlement which is about to be established in Boston, and which he was to join. This settlement will have a new consecration from his interest in it; and the city, while it mourns his early death, knows itself better because he has lived.

Spiritual Life.

Our life is neither complete nor healthful save as it is blended with the common life of our fellow-beings.—Philip S. Moxom.

For whatever happens to me each day is my daily bread, provided I do not refuse to take it from Thy hand, and so feed upon it. Fénelon.

Do not let any of us complain that our circumstances are making us evil. Let us manfully confess, one and all, that the evil lies in us, not in them.—F. D. Maurice.

Duty stands for the most part close at hand, unobscured, simple, immediate. If any man has the will to hear her voice, to him is she willing to enter and to be his ready guest.—Francis Peabody.

We are never without help. We have no right to say of any good work, it is too hard for me to do, or of any sorrow, it is too hard for me to bear, or of any sinful habit, it is too hard for me to overcome.—Elizabeth Charles.

Through making us hope for immortality, God has made us a promise of it. If faith is the evidence of things not seen, hope is the certainty of them. The morrow of the world is a purpose in the mind of God, and so is the great to-morrow of my soul.—William Mountford.

Be not afraid of those trials which God may see fit to send upon thee. It is with the wind and storm of tribulation that God separates the true wheat from the chaff. Always remember, therefore, that God comes to thee as truly in thy sorrows as in thy joys.—M. Molinos.

God speaks to us most directly in that which is nearest to us. Straining out to find him in the remote, the extraordinary, the supernatural, however it may pass for piety, is, after all, the very reverse of true piety. There is no higher manifestation of Divinity that we can know anything about than that which appears in the processes of human development. God is revealed to us, in men and women and little children, full of grace and truth.—H. W. Thomas.

Education.

HAMPTON INSTITUTE.—The Hampton Institute for the normal, industrial, and agricultural training of the Negro and the Indian began its twenty-eighth session on the 3d inst., with a larger number and from a better class of students than ever before. There were many more applicants, both Negro and Indian, than the school can accommodate; and a larger number than it can well keep has been admitted, expecting that the weeding-out process of the next few weeks will reduce the number to the usual six hundred and fifty. During the vacation months the Indian students have been scattered about on farms in New England, where their services are in demand, and are well paid. About forty new Indians have come from the various reservations, and many more have begged the privilege. A larger number of Indian girls have applied than can be accommodated. This is a most hopeful sign of progress on the reservations. With nearly five hundred and fifty Negro students and one hundred and forty-five Indians enrolled as boarders and three hundred primary day scholars, the number being daily taught on the school grounds is about one thousand. A well-appointed gymnasium has been added to the academic department, and the girls are to receive special attention along the lines of physical culture. Heretofore the school's manual training has been that of actual apprenticeship to the trades. Now, more than ever, the effort is being made to give each pupil, by class-room drill under competent instructors, such knowledge of the use of tools, patterns, and drawing as shall best prepare him for his trade later on. The Normal Department opens well, with every promise of success. Gen. Armstrong's faith that the country would not let Hampton go down has been abundantly rewarded in the increased prosperity of his great work.

Here and There.

The British Museum has secured for the small sum of $720 a unique collection of editions of "The Imitation of Christ," including six manuscripts and 1,199 printed editions. The institution already had some 500 editions, and now owns considerably more than one-half of the three thousand—more or less—editions which have been issued.

Close to the little village of Anadol, in Bessarabia, a very valuable and interesting discovery of old coins has been made. In one place alone ten pounds of gold coin were found, mostly belonging to the reigns of Alexander the Great and his father, Philip of Macedonia. Most of these coins are in perfect preservation, and have been selling for as much as fifty rubles each on the spot.

The new bridge which is to connect New York City with the New Jersey suburbs is to be completed in 1900, and is to cost $36,000,000. It will be 7,340 feet long, and its span will be 155 feet above high-water mark. The Brooklyn Bridge required 10,890 tons of steel, but this will require 132,349 tons. The cables are to consist of steel wire in the form of loops or links connected with steel pins.

It is said that the Seckel pear, like the tomato, was long despised as an inferior article of diet, until Lawrence Seckel, from whom the fruit takes its name, experimented with it. On his estate near Philadelphia, afterward the property of Stephen Girard, an old tree that bore the insignificant pears in quantities had stood for years, and its fruit was fed to the goats and cows. One day Mr. Seckel chanced to taste one of the pears, and the flavor pleased him so greatly that he became aware that he had made a discovery almost as important as that of Charles Lamb's hero who first burned his fingers with roast pig.

Look Carefully

when buying silver polish either at the store or your own door; see that the full name

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

is on the box and also the figure of a woman cleaning silver, printed in RED. None other is genuine.

We do not employ Peddlers or agents. If in doubt send to us for trial quantity.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

GLENWOOD RANGES AND

HEATERS
MAKE HOUSEKEEPING EASY.

TWO GOLD MEDALS.

Made by WEIR STOVE CO., Taunton, Mass.

Lectures and Sermons

BY

WILLIAM J. POTTER

With a Biographical Sketch

BY

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

IMPORTANT WORKS BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE

The Peak in Darien: With Some Other Inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and Body. An Octave of Essays. 266 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"Vigorous in thought and style. We have read the volume through from preface to the end, and enjoyed it."—Watchman.

Darwinism in Morals, and Other Essays. 422 pages. Cloth, $2.00.

Some of the chapters: Darwinism in Morals; Hereditary Piety; The Religion of Childhood; Prehistoric Religion; The Religions of the World; The Religions of the East; The Religion and Literature of India; Unconscious Cerebration; Dreams; The Evolution of Morals and Religion.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"The profoundest, wisest, purest, noblest book in principle, aim, and tone yet written upon the true position of woman in society."

The Scientific Spirit of the Age, and Other Pleas and Discussions. 243 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Religious Duty. 311 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A Faithless World. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites
many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods
in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus,
love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR OCTOBER.

The Glory of the Present Hour. Rev. Frank L. Phalen.
Perhaps To-day. Rachel B. MacMullin.
Salvation: What it is and is not. H. W. Crosskey, LL.D., F.G.S.

Hidden Treasures. Maud L. Cotton.
Savonarola: A Sketch. I. S. Fletcher Williams.
Somewhere. Philip Falconar Deane.
The Vision of Rabbi Zeb. E. L. R.
Praying to Christ. Martha Perry Lowe.
Toleration in Religion. Edwin Burt Beckwith.
Passing Joy. Elizabeth Hill.
The Growth of Religion.
A Vacation Glimpse of England. J. T. Sunderland.
An Epitaph. C. Leech.
Divinity in Humanity. W. H. Fish, Sr.
The Shrewd Layman.
Types of the Spirit. William M. Bicknell.
The Mist. Hattie Tyng Griswold.
The National Conference.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women; Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work, Christopher R. Eliot; Literary Notes.

Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William L. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Stimson. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. O. O. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.

141 Franklin Street, Boston.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The Massachusetts Association opposed to the Extension of Suffrage to Women was formed by women who believe that a more systematic resistance should be made to the appeals and claims of woman suffragists. At a meeting held in Boston last May a standing committee of one hundred chose an executive committee for active work. We urge on all women interested in the welfare of their State the clear and imperative duty of helping to form public opinion on this important question. To those of doubtful mind we recommend our pamphlets and leaflets by Francis Parkman, Judge Lowell, Richard H. Dana, Prof. W. W. Goodwin, George G. Crocker, Mrs. Clara T. Leonard, Mrs. J. H. Robbins, Mrs. K. G. Wells, and Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, all of Massachusetts; Francis M. Scott, Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer, Mrs. Richard Watson Gilder, and from the Outlook, New York; Prof. E. D. Cope of Pennsylvania; and other writers. For sale at W. B. Clarke's, 340 Washington Street, and the "Old Corner Bookstore."

Women of twenty-one years of age and over who desire to join our association are requested to send their names and addresses to our secretary, Mrs. Guild, or to any of the undersigned members of the standing committee. We have no membership fee; but subscriptions, whether annually or as donations, will be gratefully received by our treasurer, Mr. Laurence Minot, 39 Court Street, Boston.

Mrs. James M. Codman, Brookline, Mass.; Miss Sarah H. Crocker, Boston, Mass.; Mrs. James C. Fisk, Cambridge, Mass.; Mrs. Charles E. Guild, Secretary, Edgehill Road, Brookline, Mass.; Miss E. H. Houghton, Cambridge, Mass.; Miss Elise Johnson, Weymouth, Mass.; Mrs. Francis C. Lowell, Boston, Mass.; Mrs. Oliver W. Peabody, Boston, Mass.; Mrs. Philip H. Sears, Boston, Mass.; Mrs. William T. Sedgwick, Boston, Mass.; Mrs. G. H. Shaw, Boston, Mass.; Miss E. P. Sohler, Boston, Mass.; Mrs. Henry M. Whitney, Brookline, Mass.; Mrs. Clara T. Leonard, Springfield, Mass.; Miss Anna L. Dawes, Pittsfield, Mass.; Mrs. Nathaniel Paine, Worcester, Mass.; Mrs. Charles T. Hubbard, Taunton, Mass.; Miss Julia Delano, New Bedford, Mass.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE LITERATURE.

The Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association, of which Mrs. Livermore is the president and Mrs. Julia Ward Howe vice-president, invites both men and women in sympathy with its principles to join the association by sending $1 to the treasurer, Mr. F. J. Garrison, 4 Park Street, Boston.

To doubters the association recommends woman suffrage tracts by George William Curtis, Hon. George F. Hoar, James Freeman Clarke, Wendell Phillips, Ralph Waldo Emerson, William Lloyd Garrison, Phillips Brooks, Florence Nightingale, Lucy Stone, Clara Barton, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Mrs. Livermore, Frances Power Cobbe, Ednah D. Cheney, John Stuart Mill, and many others. All these can be obtained at the office of the Massachusetts Woman's Suffrage Association, 3 Park Street, Boston.

Temperance.

Twenty-one temperance associations have been formed in India during the past winter, with an enrolment of two thousand new members.

In launching a ship at Bath, Me., the other day, the young lady who officiated at the christening used a bouquet of sweet peas in place of the customary bottle of champagne.

The farmers around Sacred Heart, Minn., evidenced their desire for no-license in that town by pledging themselves not to sell grain nor buy supplies there if the village went for license.

The Canadian Pacific Railroad for years past has refused to sell its lands immediately joining its stations except upon conditions which preclude the sale of intoxicating liquors thereon.

A national conference of the English clerical advocates of the Gothenburg system will be held in November. The Fabian Society is about to issue a tract advocating the municipalization of the liquor traffic.

Siberia has a temperance society which pledges its members to total abstinence on every day of the year but one, September 2, the pledge, taken every year September 1, binding them to abstain for a whole year from the morrow.

The Catholic Temperance Union of Boston will celebrate Father Mathew's birthday at the Boston Theatre next Sunday evening, October 13. Rev. P. A. McKenna of Marlboro will deliver a lecture; and there will be an elaborate musical programme, under the direction of Prof. Alfred de Seve.

The Spectator is urging the necessity of temperance reform in England. The British Weekly says, "The British people will not see the publicans in a perpetual riot of triumph"; and it urges that the Gothenburg system be adopted without any compensation save a lengthened notice of termination.

"Alcoholic Anæsthesia, a Factor in Crime," was described by Dr. I. N. Quimby at the great meeting of the Medico-Legal Society in New York. Dr. Quimby asserted that the old idea that alcohol is a life-sustaining substance was long ago abandoned by experts, who now look upon it as an anæsthetic.

Personals.

Rev. Joseph Osgood, D.D., now in the fifty-third year of his ministry at Cohasset, had a pleasant meeting of the Plymouth and Bay Association at his house on his eightieth birthday, September 23. One of his parishioners presented him with eighty dollars in gold; while, among other expressions of friendly interest, was a vase with eighty beautiful roses.

In a junior examination of the medical department of the University of Michigan, two Chinese girls from Kiukiang, China, took the highest stand. It is probable that they are the only Chinese girls in a coeducational institution in this country, and at Ann Arbor they are noted for their brilliancy and scholarship. Miss Howe, a missionary from Ann Arbor, induced them to come to this country three years ago. At that time they knew scarcely a word of English.—Exchange.

Jean Ingelow is now a venerable woman of seventy-four. She spends the most of the year at her quiet home in Kensington, alternating her time with a sojourn each season at Nice. In both places she is surrounded by her household pets, and in this life of quiet domesticity she passes her time, saying little of her work unless urged to do so. She is described as "a sweet-faced, gray haired woman in a cap," with nothing romantic or suggestive of her profession in her appearance.

The Dowager Empress of China has had a more romantic life than usually happens to ladies of such exalted rank. It seems that she was the child of poor parents who dwelt in the neighborhood of Canton, and a beauty "beyond compare." Once, when starvation threatened her parents, she suggested that they sell her as a slave. A famous general was found as a purchaser who eventually became so pleased with her grace and beauty that he adopted her. On the occasion of the general's next visit to Peking, he took his daughter with him, and offered her to the emperor. Her beauty, wit, and intelligence so fascinated the emperor that he made her his wife, and marked the general with many favors. When the emperor died, the empress took the reins of government, and directed the national affairs better than most of her predecessors. She is considered one of the world's great women.—The Independent.

Many people who know Mrs. Ormiston Chant as a public speaker and preacher will be surprised to learn that she is one of the most domesticated women in London. Her last interviewer found her a few mornings since in the middle of spring cleaning. She had just washed nine pairs of woollen stockings, and had further devoted her morning to superintending the charring, looking after a hundred and one small matters, seeing two interviewers, and doing a good deal of other business. Mrs. Chant is, moreover, a cyclist and a billiard-player. For the former she would "get up at six any morning," and the latter presents to her an ever-growing attraction. We learn from the Lady Cyclist that Mrs. Chant is chairwoman of the Mowbray House Cycling Club, and that she prefers the bicycle to the tricycle. She does not wear "breeks," because, as she preaches in many pulpits, she is fearful of doing anything that might prejudice those she most wishes to win over. "Anything," she says, "is better than skirts on a cycle. My daughters will certainly wear the rational dress."—Selected.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,

The Largest Manufacturers of

PURE, HIGH GRADE

COCOAS and CHOCOLATES

On this Continent, have received from the great

HIGHEST AWARDS

Industrial and Food

EXPOSITIONS

IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

Caution: In view of the labels and wrappers on our goods, consumers should make sure that our place of manufacture, namely, Dorchester, Mass. is printed on each package.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.

WALTER BAKER & CO. LTD. DORCHESTER, MASS.

OVER ONE HUNDRED.

Some pieces of furniture you can domesticate: some are barbaric. Of all pieces that attach themselves to you there is none that comes closer than a wood mantel.

It frames the fire, which is warmth and light and cheer, all combined. It lends an atmosphere of space to the smallest apartment; it decorates the dingiest interior; it feeds the fancy; it makes the dullest room seem like home.

In no class of ready-made furniture is there so great a diversity of choice as in mantels. The possibilities are almost infinite. You should insist upon seeing different styles and designs before settling upon any one pattern.

We lead the whole country with an exhibition of over one hundred Mantels, all erected complete in our warerooms. In this collection are some notable examples of the Renaissance, Byzantine, Louis XVI., Rococo, and Colonial orders. Lowest prices in this city.

If you cannot call in person, send for our 96-page Catalogue, enclosing four cents postage.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

Spiritual Life.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troublous, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star! The Star!"

"Afterglow," like Gannett's "Wrestling and Blessing," is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged."—Christian Register.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Important Works.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

Kindling Thoughts. By ELIZABETH P. CHANNING. 315 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

Contains fifty-seven brief essays, such as Devotion upon the heart; The angel in the shadow; A disappointed life; Plain living and high thinking; The spiritual tangle; The charm of the old; Accepting ourselves as we are; etc., etc.

It is a long time since anything so brightly refreshing as these Kindling Thoughts has come to us. They are full of that best cheer which comes from the deepest, clearest springs of faith.—Unitarian.

Seeing and Being, and Other Sermons. By JOHN W. CHADWICK. 234 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Great Hopes for Great Souls; "A Mere Man"; The Constructive Achievements of the Higher Criticism; Templed of God; The Price of Moral Freedom; Orthodoxy, what is it? Morality and Religion; The Conversion of Energy; Two Meanings of Religion; The Undiscovered Country; Samuel Longfellow; The Old, Old Story; The Fulness of Time; The Unbridled Tongue; Immortality; Seeing and Being.

Gems of the Orient. Selections from Eastern Wit and Wisdom. By Rev. C. D. B. MILLS. 238 pages. Cloth, full gilt, $1.50.

"The choicest gems of thought and expression from the literatures of the ages; the really fresh and living utterances of truth and the law of excellence, scattered along the different centuries of human history." "Full of invigorating and uplifting power."

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

JAMES KAY APPLEBEE

is open to engagements for PREACHING or LECTURING. Address: ALLSTON, MASS.

TO LET. The desirable house, 113 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

12. PROOFS OF EVOLUTION: From geology, morphology, embryology, metamorphosis, rudimentary organs, geographical distribution, etc. By NELSON C. PARSHALL.
13. EVOLUTION AS RELATED TO RELIGIOUS THOUGHT: The Unknowable; design; miracle. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
14. THE PHILOSOPHY OF EVOLUTION: Relation of the doctrine to prevailing philosophical systems. By STARR HOYT NICHOLS.
15. THE EFFECTS OF EVOLUTION ON THE COMING CIVILIZATION: Plans for social regeneration as tested by evolution. By REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE.
16. THE SCOPE AND PRINCIPLES OF THE EVOLUTION PHILOSOPHY: Agnosticism, materialism, idealism, practical problems. By DR. LEWIS G. JONES.
17. THE MORAL AND RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF HERBERT SPENCER'S PHILOSOPHY: The relation of religion to morality. By SYLVAN DREY.
18. THE RELATIVITY OF KNOWLEDGE: The nature of sense-perception; sight, sound, taste, smell, feeling; the doctrine of the Unknowable. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.
19. A STUDY OF MATTER AND MOTION: An excellent digest of a much vexed question, with quotations from many authorities. By Hon. A. N. ADAMS.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

"Unity Pulpit"

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents.

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.
2. God in the City.
3. Reaping Time.

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

Now ready:—

1. The Public Service of Religion.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Rooms To Let.

Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at 36 RUTLAND SQUARE.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

Pleasantries.

When was Mrs. Humphry Ward like Solomon? When she made David Grieve. Pacific Unitarian.

A child seeing a bill on a telegraph post: "O mamma, look! A message has fallen down!"—Primary Education.

His First View of an Elephant.—Elder brother: "Look at his tail, Jimmy,—look at his tail!" Jimmy: "Which one, Bob,—de one before or de one behind?"—Harper's Round Table.

Small Margery had just been stung by a wasp. "I wouldn't a-minded its walking all over my hand," she said, between her sobs, "if—if it hadn't sat down so hard."—New York Evening Sun.

"What makes the baby cry so?" asked Willy. "He's cutting his teeth," said the nurse. "Why do you let him do it?" asked Willy. "You won't even let me cut my own nails."—Harper's Round Table.

When Fogg was asked what he thought of Mahlstick, a scraggly-headed painter, he replied, "I should think better of him if he would use his brushes on his hair instead of upon his canvases."—Transcript.

Mrs. Joanes: "How do you do, Mr. Brown? Flossie, this is Mr. Brown; he thinks everything of little girls." Flossie: "Funny, but there's a man who lives in our street with the same colored name as you." Transcript.

Frank comes into the house in a sorry plight. "Mercy on us!" exclaims his father. "How you look! You are soaked." "Please, papa, I fell into the canal." "What! with your new trousers on?" "Yes, papa, I didn't have time to take them off."—Omaha Bee.

They were telling of books that they had read, and the man with the high forehead asked what the other thought of the "Origin of Species." The other said he hadn't read it. "In fact," he added, "I'm not interested in financial subjects."—Boston Transcript.

"It is wonderful what progress has been made in the way of machinery," remarked Mr. Figg. "I see that there has been a machine invented that can make a complete pair of shoes in sixteen minutes. Why, that is faster than Temmy can wear them out."—Indianapolis Journal.

"My tooth aches awful," said Willie. "Don't you think I'd better not go to school to-day?" "No, you needn't go to school. I'll take you to the dentist instead," said his mother. "I think—I guess I—l'd better go to school, after all," rejoined Willie. "The tooth aches, but—it doesn't hurt any."—Harper's Round Table.

Miss R. was telling her Sunday-school class of small boys about the Shut-in Society, whose members are persons confined with illness to their beds or rooms. "Whom can we think of," said she, "that would have had great sympathy for these that are so shut in?" "I know," said a little boy. "Some one in the Bible, ain't it, teacher?" "Yes; and who, Johnnie?" "Jonah," was the spirited answer.—Selected.

Two little ones who had been told to remain near the house one morning were quite discontented, and begged to go across the way with their playmates. "You are not properly dressed for visiting to-day," said the mother, "and Robert's face is not clean." "Oh, never mind," exclaimed the child: "it will be all right. They are playing house, and I can be the hired girl, and Robert can be a tramp that I let in." Youth's Companion.

The commercial enterprise of most of the religious papers is quite remarkable, and the secular appearance of their advertisements is noticeable. But the climax of this sort of thing seems to be capped by a letter seen recently. It was addressed to a business man by the manager of a religious weekly, and it solicited an advertisement on the ground that the paper "not only had a very large circulation, but a very credulous class of readers."—The Transcript.

"Miss, you can't bring dogs into the car," said a Third Avenue conductor to a young woman who tenderly held a wriggling little object wrapped up in a shawl. "Tain't a dog," snapped the young woman; and the discomfited conductor retreated to the rear platform. He studied the case for a few minutes, and then, returning to the young woman, said, "Miss, you can't bring cats in, neither." "Tain't a cat," said the young woman: "it's a rabbit," and the long ears emerged in confirmation of her assertion. At this the conductor looked puzzled for a moment, and then said: "Well, that's accordin' to the rules of the company. Dogs is dogs, and cats is dogs; but rabbits is insects. So you can stay."—N.Y. Star.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder
ABSOLUTELY PURE

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.
ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

A WINTER IN CALIFORNIA.

Parties will leave Boston in Elegant Trains of Palace Vestibuled Sleeping and Dining Cars, Tuesdays, October 22, November 19, and December 10 for Los Angeles, San Diego, etc., by way of Chicago, Kansas City, and Santa Fe. The tickets cover every expense of travel both ways, and give the holder entire freedom on the Pacific Coast. They may be used returning on Any Regular Train until July, 1896, or with Parties under personal escort, with Choice of Three Different Routes.
Tours to Atlanta Oct. 8, 14, 16, 22, 28, and 30; Nov. 5, 11, 13, 19, 25, and 27; and Dec. 3, 9, 11, and 17.
Additional California Tours, Jan. 7, Feb. 11, and Mar. 3, via New Orleans, and Jan. 23, Feb. 13, and Mar. 5, via Chicago, Kansas City, and Santa Fe.
Tours to Mexico January 23 and February 13.
Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines; also Steamship Tickets to all points.
Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular trip desired.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,
296 Washington Street (opposite School St.), Boston.

COOK'S TOURS.
ESTABLISHED 1841.
HOLYLAND TOURS.

All Travelling Expenses Included.
Parties under Personal Escort will leave New York, Nov. 6 per S.S. Augusta Victoria. A Special Tour spending Christmas at Jerusalem and Bethlehem. Jan. 8 per S.S. Normania; Jan. 22 per S.S. Kaiser Wilhelm II.; Feb. 12 per S.S. Fulda; Feb. 19 per S.S. Normania; Feb. 29 per S.S. Werra.
Fares range from $675 to $1,225. Illustrated descriptive pamphlet free on application.

COOK'S NILE STEAMERS
will leave Cairo
Rameses III.....Nov. 12 | Rameses III.....Dec. 10
Rameses Great.....Nov. 26 | Rameses Great.....Dec. 24
and weekly thereafter.
Dahabeahs and Special Steamers for private parties. Programme of European Tours. Season 1896 on application.
THOS. COOK & SON,
New York, 261 and 1225 Broadway; Boston, 332 Washington St.; Philadelphia, 824 Chestnut St.; Chicago, 231 South Clark St.
Official Ticket Agents for all Trunk Lines.

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM DANVILLE,
New York

Established in 1858.
A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON, EUROPEAN PLAN, J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.
ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
W.M. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.
LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES
of Copper and Tin.
BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

IVERS & POND PIANOS on easy payments

If no dealer sells our pianos in your vicinity, write us. Our Easy Payment Plan is simple, easy and fair. Let us mail you an explanation of it. Three years to pay for your piano, if desired. Slightly used pianos at reduced prices. Catalogue and full information sent promptly (free). Before buying elsewhere write us and save money.

IVERS & POND PIANO CO.,

183 Tremont St. (Masonic Temple), BOSTON, MASS.

The MAGEE RANGES ARE THE BEST

Examine the patent OVEN THERMOMETER, Pronounced by ALL COOKS to be the GREATEST IMPROVEMENT of modern times. No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost over any others on the market. The name MAGEE carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use. Descriptive Circulars Free. FOR SALE BY LEADING DEALERS EVERYWHERE. MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY, Boston. New York. Chicago.

Says Miss Parloa of the American Cooking School.
Mrs Wm E Loy Oct 93

CHURCH CARPETS

AT MANUFACTURERS' PRICES. 658 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.
JOHN H. PRAY, SONS & Co., CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY.

GEO. H. ELLIS,
Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.
BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job
Printing.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1895.

NUMBER 42.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; Unitarianism To-day; Lake Mohonk Conference,	657
A Pullman Edict; Economy as a Fine Art,	658
MUSINGS,	658
BREVITIES,	658
PRO AND CON.
Hymn Books Wanted,	659
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Universities and Workingmen, by Rev. F. G. Peabody, D.D.; A Young People's Organization, by Rev. George W. Cooke,	659
American Unitarian Association,	660
Boston Unitarian Club; Conference Notes; Conference Programme,	661
List of Delegates,	662
Lake Mohonk Platform,	670
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	661
THE PULPIT.
George W. Briggs, D.D., A Memorial Discourse, by Rev. W. H. Johnson,	664
Additional Tributes,	665
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.
Unitarian Sunday School Society,	665
LITERATURE.
"Studies in Theologic Definition"; Other Book Notices,	666
Magazines; Literary Notes; Books Received,	667
THE HOME.
Ray's Birthday, by Annie Rogers; A Day at Aunt Harriet's,	668
Grandma's Playmates; Snowballs and Oranges; An Order of Merit,	669
POETRY.
The Vision, by Mary Woodward Weatherbee,	659
Weathercock, by Henrietta R. Elliot,	668
An Anniversary Hymn, by John Codman,	670
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	670
HERE AND THERE,	670
EDUCATION,	671
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	671
TEMPERANCE,	671
SCIENCE,	671
PLEASANTRIES,	672

SPECIMEN COPIES of the Christian Register will be sent free for four weeks to any one wishing to examine it. Application should be made with address in full to

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Editorial.

BOTH Gov. Greenhalge and Lieut. Gov. Wolcott in the present political campaign in Massachusetts have spoken out very strongly against the intolerance of the A. P. A. None who know them could doubt their position on a question of religious toleration. The A. P. A. tried to capture the Republican convention in Massachusetts, but made but a small showing when it came to the vote. It conducts most of its work in the dark, and it is not work which would very well stand the light. Whatever temporary success the movement may have, it is destined to disappear before a better conception of Americanism and a better illustration of religious toleration.

At the meeting of the Boston Unitarian Club last week the president, Lieut. Gov. Roger Wolcott, referred to the visit of the athletes of Cambridge University, England, and of the agreeable and delightful impression they made. "I was pleased to be told," he added, "by the captain of the team, Mr. Horan, that among the athletes who came over here there were many who had won remarkable distinction in scholarly attainments. Of one man he said that he had got a 'classic first': another had won high honors in mathematics. It seems to me that we Americans, especially those who have anything to do with active college and university life to-day, should bear it in mind that athletics should minister to and aid intellectual development, and should never be allowed to become a substitute for it." Mr. Wolcott's remarks were greeted with applause; and, as most of his hearers were college graduates, this was significant. It may be because the English athletes devoted so much time to their studies that they did not carry off as many honors as the Americans. It would be interesting to know just what was the standing in college of the Americans who won prizes, and perhaps some of the sporting reporters will hunt it up.

It is not always convenient for ministers to preach sermons on particular Sundays on topics assigned them. There are often reasons, local or general, why some other topic would be more timely. The fourth Sunday in this month is the day fixed upon by the National Association of Prison Chaplains as "Prisoners' Sunday"; and ministers throughout the country are urged to preach sermons on the causes, prevention, and treatment of crime, the restoration of the criminal, and the duty of the State and community toward those who have broken the law. We suspect that a good many Unitarian ministers who return to their pulpits October 27 will naturally want to preach on the Washington Conference, and orthodox Congregational ministers may be moved to preach on the American Board. But, if ministers cannot use the 27th of October in that way, there is no reason why they should not use some other Sunday in the year to speak on the various aspects of this broad subject of the prevention of crime and the reformation of the criminal. In Massachusetts, for example, there are 100,000 arrests for crime annually, and more than 26,000 commitments. On the first day of October there were 7,610 confined in penal institutions. When we think of this vast number of arrests and commitments, and the fact that nearly 100 discharged convicts go out into the community every week, that the expense of supporting prisons is more than $900,000, and the cost of the police and courts is more than $2,000,000, in this one of the best States in the Union, we may ask whether the magnitude of this subject ought not to command the attention of every church in the community. We trust, therefore, that ministers who are not able to devote October 27 to this subject will call the attention of their people to it on some other Sunday during the year.

It is urged by the opponents of woman suffrage that women may exert enough influence in politics indirectly without wielding the ballot. In support of this argument they might point to the influence which women have had in the recent English elections. This is brought out very distinctly in an article in the North American Review for October by Lady Jeune. The Primrose League is an organization of conservative women formed in memory of Disraeli, and to propagate Tory principles. During the last election it sent out an army of women workers, canvassers, and clerks, besides those who spoke at meetings. No less than 5,613 members were added to the league in July; and Lady Jeune says, "There is little doubt that the Primrose League dames contributed largely to the success of the conservative party." In answer to questions by an English weekly journal Lord Valentia says, "I can only speak for my own constituency, and have no hesitation in saying that the aid contributed by ladies both in clerical work and canvassing has been of the greatest possible value." Another M.P. says: "The ladies gave me great help. On the other hand, my opponent's wife was of great value to her husband by her clever and lively speeches." Another M.P. thinks the power of women in this direction is immense, but does not like to have them speak in public; and another accuses them of all sorts of political unfairness.

It is curious to note that this activity in electioneering was shown very strongly on the conservative side. The women who did not believe in voting themselves were willing to canvass personally, speak in public, and run the whole machinery of a political campaign. In order to do this, they had to become as thoroughly informed in regard to the issues of the election and the means necessary for success as if they had cast the ballot themselves. It may seem curiously inconsistent that women who do not believe in woman suffrage should work with such immense activity in a campaign where woman suffrage was not one of the issues. So far as the dreaded influence of the ballot on woman itself is concerned, it is apparent that, if in addition they had cast the ballot, they would not have been any less or more womanly than they were. It is clearly evident that, while women in England may, with property qualifications, have municipal suffrage, they are not content with this limitation of political privilege, but have organized extensively for work on national issues, and have succeeded greatly in influencing the result of a national campaign. There is a fact and a logic involved in all this. The fact is that the women who are educating male voters are getting an education themselves; and the logic is that their grateful husbands, brothers, and friends will by and by insist that they shall vote also, and it will be extremely difficult then to find a good reason why they should not.

UNITARIANISM TO-DAY.

The National Unitarian Conference which is to be held in Washington next week will, in its varied and interesting programme, be an exposition of modern Unitarianism. It will not be an occasion for mere retrospect, however useful this might be. If its historic relations are brought out, it will be that its present position may be more fully understood. At this Conference Unitarianism will be seen both as an organized agency and as a free spiritual influence. Its accumulation of power as a moral, intellectual, and spiritual force in this age has been remarkable. It has never patented its ideas, and it has done far less to extend them than it ought to have done. But somehow they have had a wonderfully sustained power of self-extension. Like a sweet odor, a breath of air, a glow of sunlight, they have spread far and wide and diffused themselves in the church, in the home, in literature and society.

It has not been so easy for Unitarianism to put up its sign and advertise its roots and seed. But, gradually, it has grown more and more in organic power and efficiency, until to-day it is better equipped for its work than ever; and we suspect that at Washington it will be seen that the machinery is pretty well oiled.

Another thing will be clearly evident,—that it does not exist for the sake of its machinery, any more than an electric current exists for the sake of the motor which helps to direct and diffuse it. So what we shall be most impressed with at Washington will not be the rattle and jar of mechanism, but the light and radiation of those conceptions and emotions of love to God and love to man, immortal hope, social duty, and devout worship which Unitarianism holds with faith and gladness at this close of the nineteenth century.

THE LAKE MOHONK CONFERENCE.

The annual conference on behalf of the Indian, held under the patronage of Mr. Albert K. Smiley, at Lake Mohonk, N.Y., took place last week. A large number of government officials, teachers, missionaries, editors, and other friends of the Indian were present. The meeting held six sessions, averaging two hours and a half each.

Among the subjects discussed were the working of the severalty law, the need of special advisers for Indians taking up allotments, the leasing of allotted lands, the iniquitous state of affairs in the Indian Territory, the absolute necessity of more zeal in missionary work, and the introduction of Young Men's Christian Associations among the tribes. Aside from the report of Dr. Heilmann, the efficient superintendent of Indian schools, on the work of the past year, little attention was paid to the matter of schooling. That part of the work is in such good hands that it goes on smoothly. More children are enrolled than ever before, but there are still some thousands for whom no schools are yet provided. The experiment of persuading States to enroll the Indian children within their limits in the public schools of the State has resulted in measurable success, and several hundred are thus receiving their schooling. If the Indians paid taxes, there would be less trouble. This exemption from taxation on the part of Indians holding allotted lands has worked no end of trouble in every direction. It is a great pity that this could not have been foreseen by the framers of the severalty bill. But the truth is there was no thought at that time that the land would be allotted in hot haste to whole tribes at a time. It was supposed that here and there an Indian might be found progressive enough to want to take up land, and he was to be free from the burden of taxes till he should be able to stand on his own feet. But, now that whole townships are allotted, the States in which they lie are justified in demanding money from some source to pay for roads, schools, and courts in these new communities. It is an unfair burden to throw upon their white neighbors. Hence more stress than ever was laid upon the need of some provision by Congress to meet this lack of taxes, either from Indian funds in the hands of the government or, failing these, from the national treasury.

A ringing speech on the impossibility of alienating the legislative authority which the United States holds over all the people in the land was made by Dr. Lyman Abbott after hearing Senator Dawes's account of the scandalous state of affairs in that pest-hole of iniquity, the Indian Territory. Professedly an Indian Territory, it contains only about thirty-four thousand Indians, while there are more than three hundred thousand whites! These white people have no law, no public schools, no flag. It is the snug harbor and the factory of criminals of every kind, and every year makes the matter worse. It is a difficult problem but one that must be met and conquered, no matter what it costs. This is strongly put in the "Platform" which is given in another column.

One of the most interesting pieces of work undertaken of late is the establishment of Young Men's Christian Associations among the Indians. This branch of practical work has been under the charge of Dr. Charles Eastman, an educated and devoted gentleman of the Sioux nation. He has organized more than forty in many different tribes, so that now at least two thousand young Indian men are thus banded together for physical, mental, and moral training. This work so quickly commends itself as a wise and hopeful thing that it seems strange it has never been presented before.

Other practical measures that were heartily commenced were the employment of more field matrons and a rapid introduction of reindeer into Alaska. The herds have thriven wonderfully; and the increase has been as much as could be expected, but at the present rate it will be nearly twenty-five years before there will be enough reindeer to distribute to the thousands of natives whose food supply has been destroyed, and who are half starved and miserable. Here would be a chance for some lover both of humanity and of animals to help stock Alaska with these most useful creatures, that are to the dwellers in arctic regions what the palm is to the dweller in the tropics, the source of food, shelter, clothing, and defence.

A PULLMAN EDIOT.

The question whether corporations have souls or not would probably have been decided in the negative if the vote of the passengers in a Pullman sleeper could have been taken a few weeks ago. A Western train was passing through Nebraska during the intense heat of September, when the mercury stood at ninety-eight in the cars. A clergyman brought an invalid daughter on the train at Lincoln, to take her into Iowa, a few hours' ride by daylight. A bed in a lower berth was arranged, and the invalid was placed upon it. The upper berth, however, was pulled down. It was stifling hot in the car, and the girl was gasping for breath. Two physicians happened to be on the train, one of them a woman. Both offered their services, and sought to promote her circulation by chafing her hands and by massage. They asked that the upper berth might be closed, so that they could work to better advantage, and that the invalid might have more air. The porter said that he had no power to do it. Appeals were then made to the conductor by several disinterested passengers. The answer was that the upper berth could not be shut unless the full price was paid for the whole section. "It is the law of the company," was the only reply; and, as the scant purse of the clergyman could afford no such luxury, the sick girl had to lie and pant in the lower berth and the physicians had to work at great inconvenience.

The directors of the Pullman Company undoubtedly believe that the law they have made that the upper berths shall always be pulled down unless the whole section is paid for is necessary for their business. It will be hard for them to convince many people that such is the case. As it stands and as it is enforced, it is certainly an ungenerous rule, in strong contrast with the usage of railroads in England and on the continent. A traveller in an English or continental coach pays for one seat; and, if there are enough people to fill the compartment, that is all he is entitled to. But, if he is the only passenger, he can occupy the whole cab if he wishes. It would be easy for the foreign companies to put up fixed arms or divisions between the seats, so that a passenger could only occupy one seat at a time; but, on the contrary, passengers may lie at full length on the seats by day or by night if they are not occupied by other passengers, and this is a great comfort in foreign travel. The European railroads seem to have assumed that it is worth while to let their passengers be just as comfortable as the extent of the traffic will permit. They would smile if told that they lost anything by treating the public with any such consideration. The Pullman rule that no person shall occupy the whole section if there are other passengers wanting berths is a fair one; but why, when a car is only half full, the company should not be willing that the passengers should have the advantage of the extra space over their heads it is not easy to see. There seems to be a superstitious notion that the pulling down of the upper berth will compel other passengers to get aboard, or, if not, that those who have already bought tickets should be punished. It is not as if the property of the company were to be injured by not enforcing this rule. It is not possible for a passenger to occupy an upper berth and a lower one at the same time. No harm comes to the upper berth if it is shut. On the contrary, the passenger is less likely to ram his head against it when he is trying to get up in the morning. The rule is simply an illustration of cold, wilful disregard of public comfort.

But, even if such a rule were generally necessary, there is no reason why it should be enforced with invariable despotic cruelty, as in the case mentioned. The porter and the conductor were not without souls: they were simply the agents of a soul-less authority. It might have cost them their situations to have violated the rule. Their own fear of this authority was shown in the literalness of their interpretation. It was afternoon. In letting a bed to the invalid at the regular price, they had sacrificed two seats. No other passenger could occupy that section. As the girl occupied the whole of the section longitudinally, it does not appear why she should not have had the rest of it vertically. As enforced, the rule was simply an act of coercion to make a poor man pay double fare. There was not a passenger on the train, unless riding on a free pass, who did not think that the rule of the company, thus cruelly and arbitrarily enforced against a poor invalid girl when the thermometer was at ninety-eight, was altogether a heartless one, as well as a bad business policy.

It is such a soul-less rule as this which gives a boost to socialism, and leads many people to ask the question whether they could not travel a little more comfortably if they took things in their own hands and managed the railroads for the good of the community instead of for the profits of a few.

ECONOMY AS A FINE ART.

There are few families in the large middle class of American society who are strangers to the word "economy." The workingman with his weekly wage, the clerk with his few hundreds, the business or professional man who is dependent on his salary for a suitable living,—all know the necessity of fitting their desires to their incomes; and to do this requires economy in one form or another. As a man's income increases, the necessities of his family increase, also, only apparently in geometric ratio. Until a man is practically sure of his bread and butter, whatever happens, economy is only a hard, grinding necessity in which there can come no lapses, and about which there is no room for discussion. So long as a week's illness, for instance, with its accompanying loss of income and unexpected expenses, means literal disaster, the element of choice does not enter into the problem at all; and without this element of choice there is no possibility of regarding economy as a fine art. On the other hand, the man who has money for every passing fancy, and with whom the most lavish expenditure threatens no diminution of resources, knows no more of the pleasures of economy than does a blind man of painting. It is when a little saving here may mean an unwonted indulgence there that economy assumes its proper dignity. When self-denial in a Sunday dinner may mean the purchase of a new book, when a ticket for the symphony concerts must be balanced against the easy-chair we have been wanting, when an evening with Irving means extra work on some Saturday afternoon, then it is that the new book or the concerts or the theatre come with a rare zest of enjoyment, and assume a value unknown to him to whom all these things are a matter of course, to be taken at the proper time, like his three meals a day. Economy as a fine art demands a certain sense of proportion and an understanding of the things one really wants most. It can be no haphazard affair, depending on momentary impulse or friendly coercion or fashionable inducements for its exercise. It must follow long lines of conviction, quick to recognize genuine advantages, cheerful in decisions. There is an economy that narrows the life and cramps the affections. There is also an economy which merely adds the flavor of appreciation to the pleasures it sanctions. It is based on no "cold-scrag-of-mutton sophistry," but on the solid law of compensations. It is a friend to be cultivated while one is young and cheery and independently inclined.

There is no way in which a man is more sure to reap what he sows than in this matter of economy. "The gods sell all things at a fair price"; and a man betrays himself as soon as he shows where he draws the line between necessities and luxuries, between the things for which he is willing to economize and those which may be reckoned among the superfluities, if need be. The early Massachusetts colonists could economize painfully in household matters, and it was even difficult to raise among them a paltry sum for a palisade as defence against the Indians; but they gave freely for the sake of education. They seem to have considered it of comparatively small consequence whether or not they had variety of provisions, but they could not exist without schools and a college. Gov. Winthrop wrote, "Howsoever our fare be but coarse in respect to what we formerly had, yet He makes it sweet and wholesome to us, that I may truly say I desire no better." Many an economy is "sweet and wholesome" when it is for the sake of something we really care about.

Economy considered as a fine art is as far removed from parsimony as it is from wastefulness itself. It plans for certain expenses of the higher life as regularly as for light and fuel. Church, for instance, is no luxury to be put aside with the least possible contribution, given grudgingly, but a legitimate demand on one's time, his money, and his interest. When this economy gives, it gives royally, not as if led by some unhappy accident of circumstances. It scorns to be the handmaid of a false pretence, saving here for the sake of useless show somewhere else; but it exults in the careful consideration that can afford to help on the truest interests of life, or serve a fellow-creature at need, or spend for the increase of faith and freedom and true brotherhood in the world.

Musings.

I WAS pained to find the other day that a gentleman friend of mine had lost four toes on each foot. The deformity was covered over by a patent leather shoe. I noticed that several other friends had suffered in the same way, and wondered what general accident had succeeded in chopping off their toes. I expressed my sympathy to these crippled friends, and asked how the accident had occurred. I found, however, that, instead of looking for sympathy, they were merely posing for admiration. Having waked up some morning to discover that the Lord had made them with five toes instead of one, they had jammed their feet into leather toothpicks, by courtesy called shoes, and were going about to create the impression that the shoes were made to fit, and that they were even beautiful to look at. In the old juvenile readers it used to be said that the peacock was proud of his tail, but his pride fell when he looked down at his feet. So it has seemed to me that these fashionable young peacocks ought to be humiliated when they look down at their feet. The coat-tail is an appendage which could stand such treatment without involving physical deformity. A dress-coat is indeed an ugly thing, because the tail has been clipped without any reference to lines of beauty; but it does not interfere with the circulation or the physical structure of the wearer. When you come, however, to jam a man's five toes into a space which is not more than large enough for one or two, the inevitable result is malformation. The Chinese have reduced this business of foot-cramping to a science, and begin in childhood, just as the flat-headed Indians do at the other end, in seeking to force their skulls out of shape. And I have seen some of these toothpick shoes for children, which showed that the last-makers and shoemakers had determined to imitate the Chinese by beginning early in their efforts to torture the human foot into the shape of a narrow keel on each leg, as if a man were made for a catamaran! What would be the result of the long-continued compression and suppression of the four toes out of five? It would result in a one-toed, or one-hoofed, race. The horse, in prehistoric ages, had several toes; but, by not taking care to preserve their individuality, they have grown together into a single hoof. This one-toed race seems to be the ideal of the shoemakers and their deluded customers. How vulgar the Greeks were, when such of their artists as Praxiteles, Phidias, and others ventured to put the human foot into marble, just as it was in the flesh! What a curious delinquency we should have had in Greek sculpture if they had made the Greek foot according to a modern last of the toothpick variety! Would it have been possible for Du Maurier to have obtained any such success with "Trilby" if the modern shoemaker, instead of Little Billee, had drawn the foot? Dr. Waldstein, the professor of archæology in Cambridge, England, who has dug up in Greece enough marble hands, feet, legs, etc., including the beautiful Hera head, to stock several museums, had a Greek foot which had walked off some Greek statue lying in his room; and, when I asked him if it belonged to a Greek Trilby, he said, with mock indignation, that the Trilby foot was altogether a poor piece of work. But how much poorer would it have been if the artist had been a shoemaker, or a shoemaker the artist!

WHAT if some future historian of the human race, tracing its various stages of physical evolution, should write the history of the human foot from such foot-gears as he might find in modern museums or shoe stores. If, in his ignorance, he assumed that the shoe was made to fit the foot instead of the foot made to fit the shoe, he would be led to describe a race of men in the Elizabethan period whose preternaturally lengthened big toe curved away over on to the instep, like the trunk of an elephant when it is thrown back over its head. He would find a tribe with a foot cut square across at the end. He could trace variations in length, breadth, and shape every year, until eventually he reached the toothpick foot. There is no reason to suppose that he would have to stop here. The fear we may have of the one-toed race is groundless. Fashion is fortunately as fickle as she is foolish. She cannot stay of one mind very long; and it is doubtful if the "toothpick," or "razor," will last over another season. A distinguished authority in the shoe business told me the other day that a large firm engaged in manufacturing India-rubbers had received an order for several thousand cases of narrow-toed rubbers, but they were afraid to fill it lest the fashion might change before retailers had disposed of the goods. My friend assured me that he thought the "London toe" would be the next thing in shoes. The "London toe," of which I saw a good many abroad, is a sort of compromise between the natural toe and the American "toothpick." But the shoe-dealers must have something to stimulate their business; and, though the "London toe" may be an alleviation, there is no certainty that some worse folly in the shape of an elongated heel may not follow it. It is not often that we announce the coming fashions in this or any other column; but, in the interest of a suffering humanity, it seems to be a philanthropic duty to herald even such a mitigation as the "London toe." For myself, I have a physiological last at Mr. P. J. Hinckley's, 101½ Charles Street, Boston; and, when I want a pair of shoes, I drop him a postal card, and do not have to visit the chiropodist in consequence.

Brevities.

A Noachian rain in New England last Sunday.

That admirable institution, the New England Hospital for Women and Children, will hold its anniversary this year in Copley Hall, Boston, October 29. Noted speakers will be present.

The President has returned to Washington in time to attend the National Unitarian Conference. Without regard to party, Unitarians will approve of the President's judgment in this matter.

The Lake Mohonk Conference expressed a tender spirit of sympathy with Dr. Hale in a telegram sent to him; but the yellow scrap of paper could tell little of the genuine heart sorrow felt and spoken by every one.

To say that Mohonk was more beautiful than ever this year means not only that the hand of man has added to its charms, but that the beauty of association grows deeper and dearer. The halo about the kind host's head shines brighter, and the gentleness of the cordial little wife grows yet tenderer. All felt it good to be there, and were quite ready to echo the witty words of Mr. McElroy: "I am not sure in the last analysis but Mr. and Mrs. Smiley do more for us than we do for the Indians."

One of the most earnest and able of the new apostles of Unitarianism is Rev. William M. Brundage of Albany, who came into the Unitarian church recently from the Methodist body. The Unitarian society in Albany has just issued in pamphlet form seven sermons by Mr. Brundage under the general title "Some Things for which the Unitarian Church stands." These sermons are excellent for missionary work; and, with this in view, the Albany society printed a large edition, and is now able to offer a thousand of them to Post-office Mission workers at the low rate of $5 per hundred. This excellent opportunity ought to be seized. Orders for the same may be sent to Mary E. Hawley, 158 Elm Street, Albany, N. Y.

The review of "Hymns for the Church and Home," published in last week's number of the Register, failed to state that the book called "Hymns of the Church Universal" was published from a compilation of hymns left by Henry W. Foote. No doubt all who have used this latter book are so well aware of their indebtedness to Mr. Foote that the correction hardly needs to be made on their account. But, for the benefit of others, our review of the later work should have said more exactly that Mrs. Tileston and Mr. Arthur Foote were simply editors of "Hymns of the Church Universal." The new book is, however, to all intents and purposes, a new collection, one hundred and thirty-five hymns having been omitted, and nearly three hundred hymns, together with over one hundred tunes, having been added, to make up the collection now published under the title "Hymns for Church and Home."

The Greeks have taken to modern journalism as ducks take to water. Perhaps it is owing to the influence of their early heritage. Athens has probably more papers in proportion to its population than any city in Europe; and, wherever the Greeks go, they must have their newspaper. So it is not strange that in New York we should find a Greek paper called Atlantis, which is published weekly at 5 cents a number, or $3 a year. It is printed on excellent paper and with good type, and takes up all the questions of the day at home and abroad, whether the Armenian question, Corinthian currents, Bulgarian affairs, the Olympian games, or other matters. It contains many items of interest about the Old World and the New, notices of new books, and a page of advertisements. The proprietor is Mr. Solon Vlasti, president of the New York Greek Society. College students who wish to become familiar with modern Greek will find the Atlantis of much help.

Mr. Booker T. Washington has pointed out that, industrially, the Negro has a much better chance in the South than he has at the North. This fact was strongly set forth about a year ago by another colored man, Mr. Thomas J. Bell, a graduate of Atlanta University. In an article in the Bulletin of that institution Mr. Bell said: "The colored man in the South must work for small wages because money is so cheap there. But he is not debarred from work because he is a colored man; but in all the ordinary lines of labor he can enter in and work right along with white men, and there is nothing said about it. Colored contractors often have working under them both white and colored men. But in the North, where one would expect that things would be open and free for all, if anywhere, where they claim to have no 'color line,' but where every man is supposed to be considered free so long as he behaves himself and attends to his business, I must say that things are otherwise. Here only very few lines of labor are open to the colored man. Pains are taken that he does not enter into competition with the white man. He can work in hotels, clean offices, wash out spittoons, black boots, and do other work in that line; but that is about as far as he can go. He feels it, he knows it; and so it always happens, when he applies for a position, the question he asks himself is not whether he can do the work, but whether they will employ him."

Pro and Con.

HYMN BOOKS WANTED.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

Our liberal movement in Carthage, Mo., is in need of second-hand copies of the "Hymn, Tune, and Service Book, Revised Edition." Any society which has discarded copies, and wishes to make them do good, will confer a favor by corresponding with Mr. F. M. Bennett, 1111 South Maple Street, Carthage, Mo. E. A. H.

THE VISION.

For the Christian Register.
BY MARY WOODWARD WEATHERBEE.

Strange flowers in cluster, creamy white,
I gathered, and brought to the candle light,—
Flowers of a day, with the sun's fond kiss
Now warm on the cheek of the face of this,
That seemed too pure to be born of mould,
With the germ of wings, in its crepey fold.

They were stranger blooms, in a garb so fair,
For fear that the evening's candle glare
Might tarnish and rust, I laid them away,
Only to find at the break of the day
The spirit had vanished, only leaving instead
A crumpled cere-cloth that folded the dead.

Oh, vision of beauty! this bloom of a day,
It speaks to my soul in a silent way,
And I almost think that the legend's true:
That souls reincarnate; that in splendid view
I have seen some dweller from far away
That came on love's vision, for just a day.

And my soul is reborn into newer light,
For just this vision supremely bright:
That the dead are alive, and perforce, to win
Some soul from the toils of care and sin,
They come in the guise of a little flower
To transform the heart by this living power.

UNIVERSITIES AND WORKINGMEN.

BY REV. F. G. PEABODY, D.D.

One of the most remarkable aspects of the "social movement" of our time is its relation to the universities. A generation ago no two social classes stood farther apart than the universities and the workingmen. The life of the universities was absorbed in literary self-culture; and scarcely a trace of social responsibility, or even of intellectual interest, in the practical problems of modern society could have been found.

To-day the universities, more than any other body of men, are recognizing both the pathos and the peril of the industrial situation. The last and best method of philanthropy—the method of residence among the poor and of the contagion of the better life—is a movement begun at the universities, maintained by university men and women, bearing the name, both in Great Britain and this country, of "University Settlements." The universities within the last half-dozen years have competed with each other in establishing courses of instruction on "The Condition of the Workingman," "The Ethics of Modern Society," "Pauperism and Charity," "Socialism and Communism," not to speak of the more academic lectures on economics and sociology. Thousands of young men are now graduating each year from the American colleges, with a sympathetic understanding of the position and need of the American workingman, such as would have seemed to the graduate of the last generation no part of a liberal education.

This remarkable change has been brought about by two causes. First, it has been in some degree forced upon the universities by the tremendous activity and progress of the workingman.

GROWTH OF INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY.

The growth in power and resources and capacity for self-help on the part of the hand-workers is, of course, the most important characteristic of the time; and thoughtful people must take account of it, whether they will or no. But, on the other hand, this new growth of industrial democracy has been met, among the universities, by a new philosophy. The philosophy of individualism has had a great part in history, and dominated the English world and thought since the time of Locke. But a new conception of life and duty is supplanting it. "Society is an organism" is its maxim. "We are members one of another" is its religious expression. The life of the individual finding its significance only in the service of the whole,—that is the doctrine with which the university student now faces the world.

STUDY OF LABOR PROBLEMS.

Among all the extraordinary changes of the modern life, its new inventions and processes, its cheapening of necessities and its multiplication of luxuries, its transition from the age of steam to the age of electricity, there is, after all, nothing of such significance or permanent effect as this change in philosophy from the self-centred to the organic creed. It has given a new motive and scope to economic study: it has practically re-created ethics. It gives a new meaning to the Christian religion, and it is making a new kind of college man.

The college man of the past was given to self-culture for its own sake, and expected his education to separate him somewhat from the common lot of the world. The new college graduate regards his education as a tool to use for the service of his own time. He recognizes that the social problems now presenting themselves are not to be solved by sentimentalism or passion or enthusiasm, but need, first of all, wisdom; and so he gives himself to study for the sake of its social utility. And, as he thus seriously turns to sociological studies, he finds himself in a new companionship. He discovers that one other body of men and women, with much of the same patience, though with far less opportunity, are trying to understand in some philosophical way the social situation. It is not the employer class, with many notable exceptions: they are absorbed in business affairs. It is the working people. The simple fact is that an amount of hard study is going on in many a workingman's home, and a kind of literature is to be found by many a hand-worker's evening lamp, of which the prosperous classes have, for the most part, no conception. And so the young university man and the workingman naturally meet. Each has its limitations. The inexperienced youth is sometimes more enthusiastic than he is wise, and the workingman is often crude and impracticable. But this, at least, is true, that these two types meet and know each other, and are beginning to believe in each other. What could be better for either type than this mutual understanding and respect?

A WORKINGMEN'S COLLEGE.

Lest some reader should think this statement of relations visionary, I shall cite one case of such practical intimacy. Harvard University lies about a mile from a considerable working-class population; and three years ago a few students of the university undertook to meet some young workingmen scholars of Cambridgeport, and give to them, as scholars, the instruction which they, the students, had just received. They transmitted, that is to say, the university courses, the student now becoming teacher, and handing on the knowledge freshly acquired. From this modest beginning has grown a workingman's college, with a faculty of eighty student teachers and a membership roll of from seven hundred to eight hundred workingmen. It is a beautiful thing to find in these classes youths of luxurious training happily and heartily at work with men from the compositor's desk or the carpenter's bench. Both teachers and scholars are learning much more than the lessons assigned. They are coming to understand each other. The college boy is learning that there are other ways of education than his, and the hand-worker is learning that many a well-dressed youth is neither a fool nor a snob. They meet to study the elements of mathematics or French, but they are learning together the doctrine of the organic life of man.

Cambridge, Mass.

A YOUNG PEOPLE'S ORGANIZATION.

BY REV. GEORGE W. COOKE.

By way of suggestion, I wish to present some ideas on the subject of the more efficient organization of our young people. It is a subject to which I have given much thought, and what I am able to present may be helpful in bringing this important question definitely to the attention of others. It has seemed to me that what we wish to accomplish may be stated under four heads:

1. We wish to take our young people from the Sunday-school into the church. To effect this result, we need a young people's organization, officered and managed by them. It should be distinctly religious, and hold stated devotional meetings.

2. We wish to train our young men and women in a knowledge and appreciation of our own religion. To do that, it must be made attractive, and adapted to the needs of the young mind and heart. It is not enough to say that the church is always open to the young. We must make it thoroughly congenial to them. We must win them by giving them something to do, some part in the church, some place which they can fill to their own advantage and to the advantage of others.

3. We need to keep the young people of our churches loyal to the local churches, and loyal to the spirit of the liberal faith.

To do that, we must invite them into an active co-operation in the work of the denomination. There is absolutely no other way in which from the start to make them loyal Unitarians.

4. Not only must the young of each local church be banded together for fellowship and co-operation in the religious life, but the fellowship should extend throughout the denomination, and draw together into one active brotherhood the young people of all our churches.

If these propositions approve themselves to the judgment of those interested, it would seem not to be difficult to hit upon what is approximately the best thing to do. We must remember, however, that we have to deal with young people, and that we should thoroughly adapt our organization to their tastes, capacities, and needs. In the Sunday-school the children can be guided; but in such an organization as we now propose, the young people must largely guide themselves. What is adapted to the needs and tastes of the older members of our congregations may not attract the young, and may even repulse them. Let us remember that the externals of religion—its ritual, music, sensuous expression, and enthusiasms—appeal to the young as they do not to the adult members of our churches. Pure thought and refined spiritual convictions mature minds appreciate, but the young do not.

With this preface, let me say at once that we need in every one of our churches a young people's religious society. Such a society should have for its cardinal object to hold devotional meetings, which shall be adapted throughout to the needs of the young. They should be spirited, simple in method, devout in aim, and inspired by the earnestness and enthusiasm of youth. In organizing such a society, I believe the Epworth League offers the best model. It is that of a society intimately connected with the church, under its motherly care, and subject to its general supervision. Around the central object of the devotional meeting, held on Sunday afternoon or evening, are gathered all the other interests of the church in which the young can take part. The several interests of the society are in charge of committees, such as social, musical, financial, philanthropic, fellowship, and literary. Those of a musical taste can have charge of the music of the society. Another group can lend a hand in helping others, and keep before the society the true work of charity. The Fellowship Committee can seek out new members, see that the members know each other, visit sick members, and in other ways help to make the society a genuine brotherhood. The Literary Committee can provide speakers from abroad, give courses of lectures, or provide study classes where these are desirable.

I am convinced, by much observation and experience, that this breadth of method is indispensable to permanent success. Without question the religious aim and the devotional meeting must be central and vital in the whole scheme; but, given these, numberless interests must be at hand to attract and hold all whom we desire to reach. While the central aim should never be weakened by the collateral interests, we should not forget for one moment that the liberal conception of religion makes it co-extensive with life and all its true purposes. We wish to have the young taught that amusements, morals, literature, daily life, are in vital relation with religion; that devotion is a right spirit within every form of activity.

Such a society as we propose should be a young people's society, with its members and officers drawn from their number, and with its work done by their efforts and direction. At the same time it should be the young people's society of the church with which it is connected, and it should be thoroughly loyal to that church. Very important is it that it should not withdraw the young people from the church, to regard their society as an end in itself. From the first, and throughout, it should have as its aim to help the church, to draw the young into it, and to make its individual members helpers of the church in every possible way. To this end it should be definitely stated in the constitution and by-laws that the society is a branch of the church. The members should pledge themselves to a loyal interest in the church, and to attend upon its services at least once every Sunday when it is possible for them to do so.

Given the local societies, it needs no extended argument to prove that they will be more effective if banded together to promote their common objects. Here is where an efficient organization will be of the greatest service in giving strength and a wise purpose to the whole movement. We can wisely follow the Christian Endeavor and the Christian Union societies by adopting their method of having a national organization, subordinate State and county organizations, and a uniform organization and methods for the local societies. There may be objections to such a scheme of uniformity, but the advantages will far outweigh the limitations. The chief advantage will be that we shall have an army, and not a guerilla squad.

For myself, I should be glad if we could affiliate with the Universalist young people, by adopting their name of the "Young People's Christian Union," and by following their methods of organization so far as we can adapt them to our needs. Why should there not be a general organization of the youth of the liberal churches of the country, as there is of the evangelical? Following the model of the national Endeavor organization, each denomination can do its own work in its own way; but the affiliated societies could work together for those ends they have in common. Certainly, it is desirable that we should band our young people together into an active and strong organization if we would keep them with us. We need not be afraid of cramping them or of making them think that religion is synonymous with routine. There is not the slightest danger of our taking from them the spirit of liberty; but we need to organize them for the sake of having them come into full possession of the liberties to which they are entitled, and which they now miss for the most part.

I wish to suggest right here that the evangelical people have succeeded because they have applied common sense to the work of interesting the young. In themselves badges, banners, society songs, and the other equipments of a successful Endeavor meeting are of no value; but they have much of influence upon the young, and may be wisely employed for what they are worth. Should we consent to use some of these showy but inoffensive methods, we should find that we had gained very much in our power to interest the young. I seriously propose, therefore, that we use these methods. Let it be done discreetly and æsthetically, if we will; but let it be done for the sake of what it will enable us to accomplish by means of other and more important methods.

Our conferences, Unitarian Clubs, Alliance quarterly meetings, and other gatherings serve to interest the men and women of our churches in the general work of the denomination. Why should not the young be interested by similar meetings held to promote the general interests of their societies? Various objections will be raised; but these have been overcome by the Christian Union societies, and, in spite of school and other duties of the young people, they are able to hold large and successful meetings. Such gatherings would put new life into the local societies, and they would develop that spirit of fellowship which is essential to the success of such an organization.

Another way of drawing together the local societies and of giving a common purpose to their activities is to have them take in hand some work which they will carry on in common. Let every member of each local society contribute two cents each week, this money to go into the treasury of the national organization, to be spent by its officers for missionary purposes. If each of our four hundred churches had a young people's society of thirty members, the sum realized in forty Sundays would be $10,000, and in fifty-two Sundays over $12,000. The gathering of this money and the spending of it would give a purpose to the proposed society which would be of great importance to its permanent success. I am convinced that some such object is necessary in order to hold the societies together for the growth in religion which they primarily have in view. This collateral object will not interfere with the main one, but will facilitate it, and make it more impressive. The chief purpose of such a method of work, however, would be to educate our young people into a real knowledge of our denominational life, its missionary enterprises, and its spirit of humanitarian service. Were our young people thus educated and taught to give each week a mite for missionary work, when they came into the church pews as men and women, the American Unitarian Association would have no difficulty in getting from every church according to its real capacity to give.

One other suggestion I wish to make. The Endeavor and Christian Union societies not only have a uniform organization, but they have in all their local societies the same subjects for consideration at each of their meetings. Would it not be wise to adopt a somewhat similar method for our young people's societies? A schedule of topics could be prepared at the beginning of the year, some of the topics to be optional, and others to be made use of by all of the societies on the same dates. In this way something of uniformity could be secured, while freedom would be left for local enterprise and preference. Such a method would enable us to bring forward such topics and to make use of such special days as would conduce to the growth of interest in the liberal faith. By such a method, too, it would not be difficult to make our young people understand their own belief and why they accept it. Without teaching them to be sectarian or dogmatic, we could give them a faith vital with life, truth, and love.

I can readily anticipate most of the objections which will be raised against the propositions I have put forward in this paper. I am sure none of these objections are in themselves important, and they ought not to stand in the way of an effort from which so much of good will result. The objection made by those who wish to keep the young people's meetings strictly devotional in their character, that spiritual growth will be lost sight of, would be a conclusive one, were it not true, as proven by abundant experience, that the plan here outlined really increases the interest in religion on the part of the young people.

To love the church to which they belong, to feel an earnest interest in the denomination of which they are a part, assuredly will not lessen the devotional spirit of the young people's society. Nor can one think that the interest growing out of a weekly contribution to missionary work, or that of meeting in conference with other young people, or that of considering with others, on the same evening throughout the country, some problem of good government, right living, or high thinking, will in any degree lessen the worshipful purpose of the society.

The religion in which we believe teaches us that, if we would find ourselves, we must lose ourselves. The religion our young people must be taught is one which bids them live for interests larger than their own. Good as a young people's devotional meeting may be, it will soon starve to death if its interest is centred in itself. The young people need a common interest, an interest which joins them heart and hand with the older people, and an interest which will give them the Christian spirit of self-sacrifice.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The treasurer was so much occupied last week with other matters that the weekly notes for the Register were overlooked until it was too late, and Brother Barrows had closed the door. It is hardly important enough to call for an apology; but, nevertheless, we will try to remember it in time hereafter.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

The new hymn and tune book, called "Hymns for Church and Home, with Tunes," is now ready. This is a square 8vo, of 512 pages, and contains 801 hymns. The hymns were edited by Mrs. Mary W. Tileston, and the tunes by Mr. Arthur Foote. The collection contains a large number of the old hymns and tunes and many new ones. It will, no doubt, have a large sale. Price $1.50; discount to societies and to ministers of 20 per cent. The seventeenth volume of "Unity Pulpit," containing the sermons of Rev. M. J. Savage, began September 27. "Unity Pulpit" is published weekly by Geo. H. Ellis, 141 Franklin Street, Boston. Price for season, $1.50; single copies, 5 cents. The First Parish of Cambridge has begun the publication of the sermons of Rev. S. M. Crothers. The first one—subject, "Catholicity"—is on our table now for sale. Subscription price for these sermons, $1 per annum; single copies, 5 cents. Subscriptions should be sent to Dr. J. T. G. Nichols, 63 Brattle Street, Cambridge, Mass.

Among the books we have the following new ones: "Responsive Readings," by Henry Van Dyke, was originally prepared for the chapel of Harvard University, where it is now in use. This is a revised and enlarged edition prepared for general use in churches and elsewhere. Price 75 cents. "The Preacher and his Place," the Lyman Beecher Course of Lectures at Yale University, delivered last spring by Rev. David H. Greer, D.D., rector of St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, contains eight lectures in all. Price 94 cents.

The death of Robert Beverly Hale has called out a very earnest expression of sympathy for Dr. Hale and his family from all our Unitarian friends who have called at these rooms. The continued illness of Mrs. Hale is a further source of anxiety to our beloved friend. Dr. Hale will surely have the sympathy of all who know him in his prolonged trial.

The notes of preparation for the National Conference at Washington are sounding louder and louder. It certainly looks now as if we should have the greatest meeting we have ever yet held. Let us hope that it will leave its mark on the history of our Unitarian thought, and that it will widen and deepen our influence in the nation. Surely, we have the religion best adapted to the needs of the day. The two great commandments ought to be great enough to cover all the religion, even of this great people.

VISITS.

October 2, in the evening, visited the Unitarian Club of Watertown. This is the first club of men formed in our churches. The meeting was held in the fine parish house, and it was a pleasure to look in the faces of about sixty men that seemed to know what they were in the world for. We expect to hear from these men in their work hereafter. Next day, October 3, "Essex Conference," in that curious-looking old town of Marblehead, with its corkscrew streets, its big rocks, and its hospitable people. The old meeting-house was well filled, and the exercises of the conference indicated that Unitarianism in Essex was going ahead. Sunday morning, October 6, Portland, Me., in the old First Parish, with its solid-looking granite church, its fine Sunday-school room, and, what was specially delightful to the treasurer, the privilege of hearing its celebrated organist, Kotschmar, the author of some of our best church music. This old church is rich in historic associations, and it maintains the traditions of Unitarianism with dignity and power. In the evening of the same day at Kennebunk, a fine old country parish, active and prosperous, with a library of about fifteen hundred volumes, which might be, and I hope will be, made to help convert the town to Unitarianism. The missionary spirit seems to be active in this old parish, and no doubt we shall hear a good report from them when the offering day arrives. Monday, October 7, monthly meetings of the committees of the board. Tuesday, October 8, monthly meeting of the American Unitarian Association Board, the report of which Mr. Batchelor makes in another column. There is no lack of interest in these meetings. The problem how to make $1 do the work of $3 is somewhat exciting in its character, especially when a noble army of critics, nearly every one of whom firmly believes he or she could do it, looks on with eyes that slumber not in sleep. The question uppermost in the minds of the board is which enterprise will die if we don't help it? If our Unitarians only knew how much the missionary work is suffering for money, I do believe that there would be a reaching out for check-books that would make my official bank account good for the drafts Mr. Batchelor would like to draw on me to pay for good missionary work.

Wednesday, October 9, North Middlesex Conference at Littleton, Mass. Another autumn meeting up in Beaver Brook Valley, in the old white meeting-house, with its modern-looking neighbor, the town hall, just across the way, and its artistic library building, "spick-and-span new," just down the street, waiting for its books. The hospitality of the First Congregational Society was hearty. They endured our discourse with patience, and then rewarded us with solids and liquids more than sufficient to build up the tissue lost in their service. We had some papers read at this conference from the young people of its churches that were admirable in their spirit and style. When we get our National Young People's Association, we shall expect to have a large delegation from North Middlesex.

Sunday, October 13, at Unity Church, Worcester, Mass., was practically lost, so far as public services were concerned. The rains descended and the floods came, and beat upon the church: it stood the rains and the floods, but the people came not. It was one of the heaviest rains of the year. We shall try again so far as Worcester is concerned. The Unitarians there cannot escape.

Monday evening, October 14, at the Unitarian Club of Taunton Mr. Batchelor gave a rousing speech, and the treasurer applauded with the rest. Taunton is getting ready to be heard from, evidently.

The South Middlesex Club next, then the Dorchester Club, and then all aboard for Washington.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

Directors' Meeting.

The board of directors of the American Unitarian Association held their regular monthly meeting at their rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Tuesday, October 8. There were present Mrs. Wells and Messrs. Batchelor, Brown, Butler, Dole, S. A. Eliot, Fox, Hosmer, Howe, Little, and Lyman, Mr. Lyman in the chair.

The treasurer made a report, of which the following is the substance: the expenditures of the Association from September 1 to October 1 have been $8,686.78; cash on hand, $417.64; received from churches, $858.82; from other sources, income from funds, books, etc., $1,778.97, leaving to provide for by temporary loan, $6,466.63. The business of the New England States had the precedence. It was "Voted, That $2,500 be appropriated, with travelling expenses, to pay for the services of Rev. D. M. Wilson as superintendent for the New England States, for the year beginning Nov. 1, 1895, all sums received for preaching to be credited to the Association." $250 was appropriated for typewriting, etc., for the New England department.

On recommendation of the New England Committee the following appropriations were made for the year beginning Nov. 1, 1895: to the First Unitarian Church, Littleton, N.H., $200; to the Unitarian Society, Windsor, Vt., $225; to the First Congregational Society, Castine, Me., $150; to the Second Congregational Society, Montague, Mass., $50; to the First Unitarian Society, Middleboro, Mass., $300; to the First Church of Christ, Sandwich, Mass., $150; to the First Unitarian Society, Exeter, N.H., $250; to Rev. John B. Green, St. John, N.B., $100 to aid him in moving; for the ministry-at-large and general missionary work in the New England States, at the discretion of the secretary and the superintendent of that department, $500. It was also voted that $500 be appropriated for missionary services of Rev. S. R. Free in Willimantic, Conn., for the year beginning Nov. 1, 1895, and that $175 be appropriated for missionary work in Stowe and Middlesex, Vt., at the discretion of the secretary and the New England superintendent.

The Finance Committee reported the receipt of a legacy from the late Miss Sophia J. Snow of Brunswick, Me., of $5,000, "for the support of preaching to destitute societies"; and by vote of the directors it was added to the general fund.

Also, on recommendation of the Finance Committee, it was "Voted, That a special committee, consisting of the treasurer and Messrs. Lyman and Little, be authorized to take such action in regard to the signs on this building as they may consider wise."

"Voted, That the treasurer be authorized to provide a bulletin board for the lower hall and a register for visitors."

On recommendation of the Publication Committee the following votes were passed:

"Voted, That Unitarian books be furnished, at the discretion of the secretary, to the Fogg Memorial Library, South Berwick, Me., to Midland College, Atchison, Kan., and to the public library at Santa Ana, Cal."

"Voted, That the secretary, in conference with the Publication Committee, be authorized to publish the Year Book for 1896, at an expense not exceeding $600, and a copy be sent without charge to each member of the Association, and that, in preparing the list of ministers, the aid of the Fellowship Committee of the National Conference be availed of, as in previous years."

On recommendation of the Middle and Southern States Committee the case of the church at Chattanooga, Tenn., was considered. Owing to the financial disasters which have destroyed the power of self-support in this church, an appeal was made to the Association to pay the salary of the minister for the coming year, the church having ability only to meet its obligations to creditors and to pay its local expenses. After an earnest discussion the directors "Voted, That $1,500 be appropriated to Rev. Moore Sanborn for services at Chattanooga, for the year beginning Nov. 1, 1895."

After preaching a month at Chattanooga, great confidence has been created that Mr. Sanborn would be able to carry the parish through its troubles well on its way toward self-support; and, with this understanding, this large appropriation is made for one year only.

It was "Voted, That $200 be appropriated for the ministry-at-large in the Southern States, at the discretion of the secretary and superintendent of that department."

"Voted, That $200 be appropriated for the ministry-at-large in the Middle States, at the discretion of the secretary and superintendent of that department."

On recommendation of the Executive and Finance Committees, certain amendments to the by-laws were accepted, defining the duties of the new treasurer.

Heretofore the secretary of the Association has been its executive officer and ex-officio chairman of all committees. By the new rules the treasurer is made ex-officio chairman of the Finance Committee, which also shall have charge of the property and the direction of the business of the Association which is carried on in its building.

No change was made in defining the duties of the secretary, because the new duties of the treasurer had never been formally assigned to the secretary. A new article was added:—

"ARTICLE XV.—The Treasurer shall have the custody of the corporate seal and of the funds of the Association; shall receive moneys and make disbursements as directed, and shall be the custodian of the deeds, bonds, certificates of stock, agreements, business papers, and all other personal property of the Association. He shall sign, execute, and deliver all deeds and other instruments of conveyance, assignment, or transfer, in the name of the American Unitarian Association, which shall be under the seal of the corporation. In addition to his other duties, he shall be especially charged with the duty of raising money for the use of the Association; and for this purpose he shall visit churches, conferences, and individuals whenever it seems advisable to him to do so.

The Montana Indian School has been transferred to the United States government, which took possession July 1, and paid $2,444.57 for the building, equipment, etc. The rule providing for the annual appointment of the committee on this work was therefore omitted.

The Committee on Resolutions, in memory of Mrs. S. H. Bullard and the nomination of her successor, asked for further time to consider the nomination, and offered the following resolution:—

"Voted, That the directors of the American Unitarian Association, in session Oct. 8, 1895, hereby put on record a testimonial in memory of their late colleague and friend, Mrs. Stephen H. Bullard.

"Having the culture and traditions of a Unitarian ancestry, a quick intelligence, and a lively interest in new movements of thought and life, her willingness to serve made her almost an ideal director. She was decided in action, wise in counsel, and devoted to the public service, both of the church of which she was a member and of the Association, of which she was a faithful and active director."

A letter from Rev. S. M. Crothers, applying for aid to secure real estate at St. Anthony Park, Minn., was referred to the Finance Committee.

On motion of Mr. Dole the attention of societies asking aid of the Association was called to a resolution adopted at the annual meeting:—

"Voted, That the board of directors are requested to take action, with due reference to special conditions and the time required for change of method, to recommend the free system for the use of the churches which have the benefit of the missionary money of the Association."

Adjourned.

GEORGE BATCHELOR, Sec'y.

BOSTON UNITARIAN CLUB.

The Unitarian Club held its first meeting for the season on the evening of Wednesday, October 9, Hon. Roger Wolcott, the president of the club, in the chair. At the beginning of the evening the proceedings were suspended, upon motion of the secretary; while the large company gave expression, by a silent and a rising vote, to their tender and respectful sympathy with Dr. Hale in the great anxieties and sorrow that had come upon him.

In introducing Mr. Brooke Herford, D.D., Mr. Wolcott spoke of the pleasure he recently had in welcoming the English athletes in Cambridge to this country, and then added: "There is an Englishman present here to-night who has had the somewhat unusual experience of having been domesticated in two continents. After a residence of many years in the great and enterprising Western city of Chicago, and then after a residence of many years here in Boston, where he made so many friends, he seemed such a part of us that we were unwilling when he felt that a call of higher duty summoned him back to England to render good service to the cause of liberal Christianity. He has come back, as we told those other Englishmen that we hoped they would come back; though we did not promise to give them any more laurels than they take this time. Dr. Brooke Herford has come back; and, gentlemen, I ask you to give him a cordial Boston welcome." [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF DR. HERFORD.

Mr. Chairman and my dear old Boston Friends.—If I cannot say much, and if I say it rather hesitatingly, it is not because I have not much that is in my heart, but rather by the very fullness of the heart, which cannot always speak. But I wish that I could tell you all that your welcome, and the welcome that I have had so many a time in this room, has been to me and is to me now. Your chairman spoke of me as having been a part of you: I am a part of you still! [Applause.] A part in a work which is also a work of the athletes; and I claim to be one of the English athletes, though growing, perhaps, a little out of the best athletic form in outward things. [Laughter.] These men who came over from England to be handsomely whipped—though it was pleasant to hear that they had taken in Niagara—are the young athletes of English life; and I and those with whom I work there are as truly engaged in a great struggle in which there are not many laurels. I found more laurels on this side than on the other. You do give your laurels handsomely to those who you feel are with you in heart and in work. It is a joy to me to stand here among the men who were so long my neighbors, my helpers, my fellow-workers, in the great cause of liberal Christianity on this side, to look them once more in the face, and take as many of them as one can by the hand, and feel that here I renew that spirit and feeling of belonging with them that was always so strong in me while I was living here.

I must not waste the very few precious minutes that I dare take, when one whom it was worth crossing the Atlantic to hear [applause] is going to speak to you one of those words which, like the words that he has published in late years, have made the work of every liberal minister—I think of every minister in all the Protestant world—stronger and more confident than it had been for years before. [Applause.] I know that those two works, "The Idea of God" and "The Destiny of Man," have been felt by many as giving them something more of a confident tone in putting these things before the world, not as mere hypotheses or pleasant balancing of possibilities or hopes, but as the great realities of which he is going to speak to us again to-night. I want to say just this hopeful and encouraging word,—that, as I look back upon the twenty years that have passed since I first landed in this country, and since I began to look out upon the life, and especially the younger life, of America, I can see a real and, I think, a steady progress in that younger life, a steady growth toward a nobler public spirit, a finer interest in public questions, a more earnest manhood in all that makes good citizens. And I trust that this very club is at once the evidence and the fostering means of turning something of that growing manhood of the younger generation into the channel of a manly, free, liberal religion. The life of the country, the higher patriotism in the country, can rest upon no foundations that do not reach down to the very eternities of God and righteousness and immortality. At least, that is my strong conviction; and I only trust that, as years go by, you and the churches represented by this club will find your work growing stronger, the young men rising up to take their places more earnestly in it, and so that all will prosper with you as it seems to me to have been doing during these three years in which I have not been feeling the pulse through my old church here, though reading with such great joy of its continued strength and activity under my dear friend, John Cuckson. One of the best testimonies, perhaps, to the growing depth of his work I may speak of, in the fact that even some of my dearest old friends there, while they are telling me how irreparable was the loss, address me casually as "Mr. Cuckson." [Laughter.] That has happened once or twice or half a dozen times; and I only hope that Mr. Cuckson and I may so get mixed up together in the minds and hearts of our friends here that we may hardly know which is which. And, when he comes to England, we will try to give him some of the welcome that I have been having for these three weeks past.

But I am keeping you from the great business of life; and I simply close by thanking you for this opportunity, which was one of the privileges I chiefly counted upon in coming over to this side, and in wishing for your club and the work it represents continued and ever nobler prosperity. [Applause.]

Prof. John Fiske of Cambridge then delivered a noble address on "The Everlasting Reality of Religion," which we shall shortly give in full to our readers, and therefore refrain from giving an abstract here.

CONFERENCE NOTES.

Is it necessary to call the attention of the readers of the Christian Register to the fact that the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches will begin its sessions in Washington on next Monday evening, October 21? All the arrangements for the meeting of the Conference are now completed; and it only remains for the representatives of our churches from all parts of the country to assemble themselves at our national capital, in order to begin a meeting which, judging from present indications, promises to be one of the most important in our history.

The secretary notices that some societies have sent a list of their delegates to the office of the Christian Register, to be added there to the printed list, and that they have not at the same time sent their credentials to him, at 104 East 20th Street, New York City. He wishes to call the attention of these societies to the fact that it is not publication in the Register, but the sending of the credentials of their delegates to the secretary, to be deposited with the Committee on Credentials at Washington, that will entitle them to a vote in the Conference. The credentials should in all cases be sent first to the secretary.

The following additional boarding-houses are highly recommended by the local Washington Committee to delegates to the Conference who prefer the accommodations of a private house: Mrs. Keech, 1817 Thirteenth Street; Mrs. Sarah C. Murdock, 1201 "Q" Street, N.W.; Mrs. Pegram, 1345 "L" Street, N.W.; Mrs. Offley, 1335-37-39 "L" Street, N.W.; Mrs. A. R. Story, 218 New Jersey Avenue. Rates from $1.50 to $2 per day.

The secretary desires to remind all those who are to address the Conference, and who have not already sent an abstract of their paper or address to him, that it is very important they should hand it to him immediately after their arrival in Washington, in order that full press reports may be prepared.

It is very important that all persons who come to Washington with railroad certificates entitling them to a return ticket at a reduced rate should turn these certificates over, on the first day of the Conference, to the assistant secretary, who will be appointed to take charge of them and fill them out in preparation for the signature of the special agent of the railroads. Nothing causes more annoyance to the delegates themselves, and also to the assistant secretary, than the withholding of the certificates until the last moment.

At the meeting in Saratoga last year a great many withheld their delegate tickets until the last day of the Conference. Inasmuch as the voting list is made up from the delegate tickets, it will be seen that it is of the first importance that these should be handed to the secretary at the opening of the Conference.

A bureau of information will be established at Metzerott Hall during the Conference meetings. This will be in charge of a competent person, who will give to inquirers all necessary information about the points of interest in and near Washington, as well as in regard to matters pertaining to the affairs of the Conference itself.

The committee on the current support and endowment of the New World, appointed by the last National Conference, will meet at the Arlington Hotel, Washington, D.C., on Tuesday, October 22, at five o'clock P.M. N. P. Gilman, Secretary pro tem.

CONFERENCE PROGRAMME.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 21.

4 P.M. Meeting of the Council at "The Arlington."
8 P.M. Sermon, "Our Gospel," Rev. Minot J. Savage, Boston.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 22.

9 A.M. Communion Service, conducted by Rev. Robert Collyer of New York.
10 A.M. Address of Welcome by Hon. Carroll D. Wright, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of All Souls' Church, Washington. Response by the President. Appointment of Committees, etc.
10.30 A.M. Address by Rev. George Batchelor, Cambridge, Mass., Chairman of the Council and Secretary of the American Unitarian Association.
11.10 A.M. Address by Mrs. Emily A. Fifield, Boston, Secretary of the National Alliance of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Women.
11.30 A.M. Address by Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., London, representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.
12.10 P.M. Introduction of new business.
12.30 P.M. Report of the Business Committee.
2.30 P.M. Side Hall, Metzerott. A meeting to consider the proposed consolidation of Guilds, Unity Clubs, and other Young People's Societies.

3 P.M. "The Church and the Masses," a paper by Rev. John Cuckson, Boston, Mass.

3.30 P.M. "Our Congregational Polity," a paper by Rev. Edward E. Hale, D.D., Boston, Mass.

4 P.M. Discussion, to be led by Rev. Frederick L. Hosmer, St. Louis, Mo.

7.45 P.M. "Our Young People: Their Relations to Church, Denomination, and Life at Large." Opening remarks by Rev. Edward A. Horton, Boston, the Chairman of the evening. Prof. G. Stanley Hall, President of Clark University, Worcester, Mass., will speak on "Pedagogical Methods in Sunday-school Work." Rev. Benjamin R. Bulkeley, Chicago, Ill., "Cultivation of the Spiritual Nature" (Guilds); Rev. Ida C. Hultin, Moline, Ill., "Religious Development through Intellectual Leadings" (Unity Clubs); Rev. Thomas R. Slicer, Buffalo, N.Y., "Character and Citizenship through the Sunday-school"; Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D., Boston, Mass., "Enthusiasm for Humanity" (Lend a Hand Clubs, etc.).

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 23.

9 A.M. Devotional Meeting, to be conducted by Rev. Stephen H. Camp, Brooklyn, N.Y.

10 A.M. "Church Extension." Addresses, twenty minutes each, by Rev. Messrs. D. M. Wilson, D. W. Morehouse, George L. Chaney, T. B. Forbush, A. W. Gould, and C. W. Wendte.

12 M. Report of the Business Committee.

2.30 P.M. Meeting of the National Alliance of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Women. At this meeting Vice-Presidents and Directors will be elected, and a Nominating Committee and Committee on Credentials appointed.

Reports of Secretaries and Standing Committees will be presented, and matters of general interest considered.

3.30 P.M. Public Meeting, under the auspices of the Unitarian Temperance Society, in All Souls' Church, 14th and L Streets, upon "Modern Methods in Temperance Reform." Addresses will be made by Prof. Francis G. Peabody, D.D., Secretary of the Committee of Fifty for the Investigation of the Liquor Problem; Rev. A. P. Doyle, General Secretary of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America; and Rev. D. N. Beach of Cambridge, Mass., who will speak upon "The Righteousness of the Norwegian Principle and Paramount Importance of its Application in Temperance Reform."

4 P.M. Meeting of the Unitarian Temperance Society.

8 P.M. "The Origins of Liberal Thought in America," a paper by John Fiske, LL.D., Cambridge, Mass.

9 P.M. "Our Unitarian Theology," a paper by Charles Carroll Everett, D.D., LL.D., Dean and Bussey Professor of Theology, Harvard University.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 24.

9 A.M. Devotional Meeting, to be conducted by Rev. Edward Hale of Orange, N.J.

10 A.M. Four papers, twenty-five minutes each, as follows: "The Holy Spirit," by Rev. Howard N. Brown, Boston; "Incarnation," by Rev. William C. Gannett, Rochester, N.Y.; "Atonement," by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, Waltham, Mass.; "Forgiveness," by Rev. Mary A. Safford, Sioux City, Ia.

11.45 A.M. "The Japan Mission," by Rev. W. I. Lawrence.

12 M. Report of the Business Committee.

12.15 P.M. Election of Officers.

3 P.M. "The History and Principles of the Unitarian Church in Relation to Social Problems," a paper by Prof. Francis G. Peabody, D.D., Cambridge, Mass.

3.30 P.M. "The Modern Applications of these Principles," a paper by Anna Garlin Spencer, Providence, R.I.

4 P.M. Discussion, to be led by Rev. Joseph H. Crooker, Helena, Mont., and Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, New Bedford, Mass.

4 to 7 P.M. The officers of the Alliance will hold a public reception in the parlor of the Arlington. All members of the Alliance and all attending the National Conference are most cordially invited to be present.

8 P.M. Platform Meeting. Subject, "The Outlook." Rev. Rush R. Shippen, Washington, D.C., will preside. Addresses are expected from Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D., Boston; J. Harsen Rhoades, New York; Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., London; Horace G. Wadlin, Reading, Mass.; Rev. Minot J. Savage, Boston; and others.

Religious Intelligence.

THE report of the Channing Conference was received too late for insertion this week.

THE Ministerial Union will meet in Channing Hall, Monday, October 28, at 10.30 A.M. Rev. Charles F. Dole will give the address. Subject, "Truth, and How we know it." The public are invited.

REV. C. W. WENDTE of Oakland, Cal., superintendent of the American Unitarian Association for the Pacific Coast, will attend the National Conference at Washington, and will visit Boston, where he will remain from October 27 to November 1, on business connected with the Pacific Coast. He may be found at the Unitarian Building during that time.

A BUST OF DR. PRIESTLEY.—It will interest the lover of Unitarian traditions to know that the beautiful mural monument to Rev. Joseph Priestley, erected some years ago in the First Unitarian Church of Philadelphia by the Unitarians of America, is to receive the bust of its subject, which was a part of its design. The bust is given by friends and members of the church, among them some of the descendants of Dr. Priestley and their connections. It will be of bronze, of size proportioned to the monument, and will be made by Mr. John J. Boyle of Philadelphia, a sculptor, whose skill was shown in some excellent work at the World's Fair, and who has been especially known for his very striking statue, "The Stone Age," on Fairmount Park. It is intended that the bust shall be ready for its unveiling as a part of the ceremonies incident to the celebration of the centenary of the church in the early summer of 1896. It was largely owing to the encouragement and advice of Dr. Priestley that the society was organized. It is remarkable that during almost a century it has had but two clerical pastors, Rev. William H. Furness, D.D., who retired in 1875, and Rev. Joseph May, who was installed in 1876. But for twenty-nine years (from 1796 to 1825) it lived and prospered under the ministrations of its own lay members, and even built its first church, in which it worshipped for some twelve years before it had a clerical head. This is an example which might wisely be followed, in some cases, to-day.

ANDOVER, N.H.—Rev. S. C. Beane, D.D., of Newburyport, Mass., delivered an interesting and instructive historical address to the students and friends of Proctor Academy on the evening of October 9, the subject being "Some of the Makings of New England."

BLOOMINGTON, ILL.—The First Unitarian Church of this place has been put in thorough repair during the summer vacation; and a large congregation greeted the pastor, Rev. J. H. Müller, when it opened the first Sunday in September. The church is in a flourishing condition, the congregation having increased steadily during Mr. Müller's pastorate.

BROOKLINE, MASS.—First Parish Church: Rev. C. T. Billings will preach on Sunday, October 20.

CHELSEA, MASS.—The order of service at the ordination and installation of Mr. Augustus P. Reccord as pastor of the First Unitarian Church, which was observed on Wednesday, October 9, was, together with organ voluntary, anthem, and hymns, as follows: invocation, by Rev. Samuel B. Stewart of Lynn, Mass.; reading of the Scriptures, Rev. W. S. Key, Winthrop, Mass.; sermon, Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, Cambridge, Mass.; ordaining prayer, Rev. Edward D. Towle, Salem, Mass.; welcome to the city, Rev. R. Perry Bush of the Universalist church, Chelsea, Mass.; charge to the pastor, Prof. C. C. Everett, D.D., Harvard University; right hand of fellowship, Rev. Alfred Manchester, Salem, Mass.; charge to the people, by Rev. Edward A. Horton, Boston, Mass. A reception will be tendered to the pastor under the auspices of the Unity Club on Wednesday, October 16.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.—Rev. George R. Gebauer has accepted the unanimous call of Unity Church. Mr. Gebauer has been supplying the pulpit since September 1.

EVANSTON, ILL.—The Women's Alliance of the Evanston, Ill., Unitarian Church wish to thank the friends who have subscribed through them for the Ladies' Home Journal, and beg to announce that they will continue to receive subscriptions at the usual rate, $1 a year. In addition to this, they will receive new subscriptions to all the leading magazines, the commission realized therefrom to be applied to the Church Building Fund. Address Mrs. Hubert W. Brough, 720 Madison Street, Evanston, Ill.

FALL RIVER, MASS.—The late Rev. George W. Briggs, D.D., was first settled at Fall River, Mass. It was therefore eminently appropriate that a memorial service should be held in the Fall River Unitarian church. It was conducted by Rev. Arthur M. Knapp, who paid a just and able tribute to the memory of Dr. Briggs; and the service was interesting and impressive.

MELROSE, MASS.—Rev. Thomas W. Brown, who is in the fourth year of his pastorate of the Unitarian church of Melrose, was tendered, together with Mrs. Brown, a pastoral reception in the spacious parlor of his church on last Thursday evening, the 10th inst. The occasion was a very pleasant and successful one, and was the second of the kind which the society has tendered its present minister.

ROCK RAPIDS, IA.—The ladies of Unity Society, Rock Rapids, Ia., gratefully acknowledge the contributions for their annual Thanksgiving sales in years that are past, and again solicit for the same this year. As they contemplate building next summer, contributions will be especially acceptable, gratefully received, and judiciously appropriated. Mrs. T. K. Bradley, Secretary.

SOMERVILLE, MASS.—The new Unitarian church, costing, with its furnishing and appurtenances, something over $80,000, was dedicated Thursday evening, October 10. The church was crowded to overflowing, and a fine and eloquent sermon was given by Mr. Horton. A dedication service was read by the pastor, and Rev. Mary T. Whitney and Rev. H. C. De Long also took part.

THE NEW ENGLAND FIELD.—Rev. J. A. Chase has received and accepted a call extended by the church in Houlton, Me. He was the first and only candidate. A like compliment has been paid Miss Emeline Harrington. She was the first candidate for the pulpit of the Pepperell church; and the people were so well satisfied they did not care to hear any others, and chose her. Rev. L. D. Cochrane has accepted the call extended him by the church in Bar Harbor, and will at once enter upon his duties there. Mr. C. H. Porter, Jr., of the Cambridge Divinity School, is to take a year of active life in the ministry before completing his course. He will be with Rev. S. A. Eliot in his church in Brooklyn, N.Y. Rev. W. H. Ramsey of Farmington, Me., gets out about forty people, to say nothing of the children in the Sunday-school, at his preaching station in Fairbanks. The New England superintendent began service in New London, Conn., last Sunday, and, in spite of the storm, had a congregation of eighty to hear him. Rev. Albert Walkley will preach in this place next Sunday. In all the drenching storm of last Sunday Rev. Mr. Crothers of Cambridge went to Melrose Highlands to fill an engagement made to that church to deliver a sermon. He and the chairman of the committee were the only persons who ventured out. In Northampton next Sunday they are to have special services. In the morning Rev. J. H. Crooker will preach; and in the evening there will be a platform meeting, at which addresses will be delivered by Mr. Crooker, Mr. S. M. Crothers, and Mr. Archibald M. Howe. Rev. L. M. Burrington has been conducting services all summer in Stockton Springs, Me. It is the only church in town, and it is the hope that an independent or free church may be organized broad enough to include all the people in the community. D. M. W.

WORCESTER (MASS.) CONFERENCE.—The Worcester Conference of Unitarian Churches held its autumn session with the church at West Upton, October 9 and 10, opening on the evening of the 9th with a service and sermon by Rev. Samuel A. Eliot of Brooklyn, a strong word fitly spoken. The session of the 10th began with a devotional service, led by Rev. W. Channing Brown of Gardner, who made "Enthusiasm" the topic and the spirit of the hour. It being customary to devote the autumn meeting of the conference to the interests of the Sunday-school, the special business of the day began with an essay by Rev. G. M. Bodge of Leominster upon "The Relation of the Church and the Sunday-school One to the Other," the essay prompting as spirited and profitable a discussion as its own treatment of the subject had been. The afternoon was devoted to a Sunday-school experience meeting, an account being given by the representatives of over twenty Sunday-schools of methods pursued, experiments made, interest secured, and good things yet to be desired. The president of the conference, Mr. Charles H. Blood, of Fitchburg, himself a Sunday-school superintendent, summed up the general experience, pointing out that it showed an unexpected and most encouraging increase of attendance and interest on the part of the children, an emphatic need of that inseparable union of church and Sunday-school which the essay of the morning had so strongly urged, and a clear demand upon the church to begin this union by its adult members becoming as loyal to the Sunday-school as they wished the children to become to the church. Mrs. J. B. Stone of Worcester, as representative of the Worcester League of Unitarian Women, closed the conference with a discriminating and inspiring address upon the use of methods in the Sunday-school adapted to the needs and the natures of the children, not as we heedlessly guess they are or guess they ought to be, but as they reveal themselves to us when we carefully and faithfully study them. Beautiful autumn weather, bountiful provision, and the most cordial and thoughtful hospitality combined with the good work done to make the conference at West Upton a most successful one.

THE WISCONSIN CONFERENCE.—The nineteenth annual meeting of the Wisconsin Conference of Unitarian and Independent Societies was held in the Unitarian church of Madison, October 1-3. There was an unusually complete representation. Rev. W. D. Simonds of Madison gave a hearty welcome, to which Rev. H. T. Secrist of Milwaukee responded. Rev. H. M. Simmonds of Minneapolis gave one of his characteristic, scholarly sermons on "The Growth of Morality." The business session showed the conference to be in a healthy state of activity. Much time was given to the discussion of the new plan of missionary co-operation in the West; and the following resolution, proposed by Rev. Mr. Secrist, was adopted, with one or two dissenting votes:—

"It is the opinion of this conference that the plan of missionary co-operation proposed with reference to the American Unitarian Association, the Western Unitarian Conference, and the State conferences is impracticable; and we must therefore give it our disapproval. Nevertheless, we believe that some plan can be devised by which the unity now existing very generally among the Unitarian churches of the West may find expression and be realized in practical co-operation. And we desire to work toward such an end."

The following resolution was also adopted: "Inasmuch as there is no general paper centred in the West which represents our Unitarian Church, it is the wish of this conference that such a paper be established, or, preferably, that one of the existing Unitarian periodicals be transferred to this section."

The second evening was devoted to a platform meeting on the general subject of "Unitarianism as related to Religious Progress in America." Fifteen-minute addresses were given by Rev. C. F. Niles, Rev. H. T. Secrist, Rev. V. E. Southworth, Prof. D. B. Frankenburg, and Rev. T. B. Forbush. The ministers' meeting Thursday morning was led by Rev. A. W. Gould, the general topic being "Demands of the Age upon Teachers of Religion." In the afternoon practical "Parish Problems" were discussed. Rev. Alice Ball Loomis, Richland Centre, spoke of "How the Woman's Society shall be Most Helpful to the Church." Rev. Mr. Simonds and Hon. H. M. Lewis each gave an impromptu talk on "How to reach the Men." "Young People's Societies" was discussed by Rev. C. F. Niles of Menominee; and Rev. Mr. Gould gave a talk on the Sunday-school, with an outline of the nature studies for children now being issued by the Western Sunday School Society. Rev. T. B. Forbush of Chicago gave the closing sermon on "Our Liberal Gospel." The old officers were re-elected. The meetings were largely attended by the people of Madison, and the papers gave full reports. Robert C. Douthitt, Secretary.

THE NORTH MIDDLESEX CONFERENCE.—The annual meeting of the North Middlesex (Mass.) Unitarian Conference was held with the Littleton society on Wednesday, October 9. The weather was favorable, the attendance large, the church beautifully decorated. At ten o'clock a devotional meeting was led by Rev. W. Brown of Tyngsboro. The business session was presided over by Vice-president Thomas H. Elliott of Lowell, the office of president being vacant since the death of its honored occupant, Col. Daniel Needham of Groton. Prayer was offered by Rev. Enoch Powell of Nashua. Rev. George E. Littlefield, secretary, read his report of the June meeting at Nashua. Rev. George C. Wright spoke briefly upon church work in Lowell. It was voted that the secretary ascertain from certain societies in lower New Hampshire whether they desire to join the conference, and that the secretary and Rev. George C. Wright prepare and transmit to Rev. E. E. Hale a letter of condolence upon his recent great bereavement. The need of supplying preaching at Townsend Harbor was presented by the secretary. Mr. George W. Stone, treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, next gave an effective address upon "Organization." Miss Nettie B. Roe of Ayer read a bright and suggestive paper upon "The Pansy Club." "Our Unitarian Young People" was a thoughtful essay by Miss Nettie Stevens of Chelmsford, read by Miss Edith W. Emerson. Miss Helen M. Bissell of Peterboro spoke briefly in the same line of thought.

At noon a substantial repast was served in the town hall by the Littleton society. At the afternoon session the roll-call of the churches showed nearly two hundred delegates present, not including the local society. Treasurer Charles H. Coburn read his report, showing a small balance in the treasury. The Nominating Committee made their report, and the following officers and committees were unanimously elected: president, Thomas H. Elliott, Lowell; vice-presidents, A. W. Sawyer, Littleton, J. Tyler Stevens, Lowell; secretary, Rev. George C. Wright, Lowell; treasurer, Charles H. Coburn, Lowell; Prudential Committee, Rev. Enoch Powell, Nashua, Rev. Granville Pierce, Chelmsford, Hon. Solomon Spaulding, Nashua, J. P. Hazen, Shirley, Rev. John C. Mitchell, Wilton; Committee on Sunday-school Work, Miss Georgiana Boutwell, Groton, Miss Hannah Prescott, Nashua, Rev. J. W. Roberts, Ayer; missionary work, Rev. George E. Littlefield, Peterboro, Rev. I. F. Porter, Littleton, Rev. E. Powell, Nashua, Mr. H. A. Brown, Ayer, Mr. Herbert J. Harwood, Littleton. Rev. George E. Littlefield, the retiring secretary, received a vote of thanks for his efficient services the past four years. Voted to refer the needs of the Townsend Harbor field to the Missionary Committee with full powers.

Rev. Thomas Van Ness of the Second

Church, Boston, held the close attention of the audience by an address upon "How far can we adopt Mrs. Humphry Ward's Suggestions to Unitarians?" There is no need, said he, to tell you who Mrs. Ward is. He referred to her first prominent work, "Robert Elsmere," which touched the reconstruction of religion. The fashionable world of London was greatly surprised by her identification with Unitarianism: she comes from Episcopalianism. She says that European thought to-day is Unitarian. Her suggestions to the denomination are: First, that Unitarianism shows a certain indecision, a vagueness, as she infers from the tone of our sermons, prayers, and hymns, as if we are not wholly freed from old-time associations and teachings. The Puritan in his day stood boldly for the truth. In one sense, he was an iconoclast, a tradition-breaker. His utterance was, "We are the Lord's free people. Puritanism then was mighty, for it was simply a pursuit of truth. "Is Unitarianism to-day," says Mrs. Ward, "standing for this as it ought?" She thinks we are carrying over many things from the past which do not truly represent our belief. Leave these outgrown things: learn to apply the mediocrity of Christ in new ways, but serve him not with coldness. Second, the tendency of Unitarianism in England is to stand outside the national life. That defect was shown in Boston during the recent great Christian Endeavor convulse, when only two of our Unitarian churches were open. It is time these barriers were thrown down. Episcopacy is striving to become the national Church. Give them our opportunities, and they would sweep the country. Why should we not unite with other liberal churches in some grand, progressive movement? Let us feel that we are a part of the national life. Mrs. Ward also criticises our cold, bare form of worship. Our church music was contrasted unfavorably with that of the Methodists, whose hymns and music are "singable" and catch the popular heart. In the Catholic Church, too, are finely rendered the grand compositions of the great masters in the realm of music. We need more of the beautiful adornment which characterizes the interior of our Catholic churches, and appeals to the emotional nature. A uniform and dignified garb for the clergy was suggested. Her views, which met the speaker's approval, may be thus summed up: to stand for the truth; to enter more fully into the national life; to make our churches more attractive; to have a uniform responsive service, or liturgy.

"The Social Obligations of the Church" was the theme of Rev. John C. Mitchell of Wilton, N.H. An invitation was received from the Lowell society to hold its next session in that city. The customary vote of thanks was tendered the local society for its hospitality and to speakers and the choir for their services. The closing hour was given to five-minute addresses.

LIST OF DELEGATES.

Reported as appointed to the Sixteenth Meeting of the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches, to be held at Washington, D.C., Oct. 21-24, 1895.

MASSACHUSETTS.

ANDOVER, NORTH.—North Parish Church and Society: Rev. Charles Noyes, Hon. Moses T. Stevens, Mrs. John Elliot. ASHBY.—First Parish: Rev. George S. Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Shelden. ATHOL.—First Congregational Church: Rev. S. W. Sutton, Mr. and Mrs. Leander B. Morse. Second Unitarian Society: Rev. Carl G. Horst, Mr. and Mrs. Lucien Lord. BARNSTABLE.—Congregational Church and Society: Rev. John A. Bevington, Miss Desire E. Hinckley, Miss Abbie L. Hinckley. BEACHMONT.—Church of the Unity: Rev. Eber R. Butler, Horace Tobey, Mrs. C. J. Shaw. BEDFORD.—First Parish: Rev. O. J. Fairfield, Mrs. Carrie L. Bacon, Mrs. George R. Blinn. BELMONT.—Congregational Society: Rev. Hilary Bygrave, J. V. Fletcher, I. H. Locke. Alternates: Miss Anne Learned, Miss Maria Livermore. BERLIN.—First Unitarian Society: Rev. and Mrs. G. F. Pratt, Hon. William Bassett.

WOULD YOU HAVE THE HANDSOMEST

GLOVES?

THEN WEAR ONLY THE

GENUINE DUCHESSE,

Which come in all the popular styles, dressed and undressed Kid, button and Foster lace, long and short wrists,

And cost no more than other makes.

CALL AND INSPECT, OR SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

All Gloves fitted when desired, and every pair warranted.

CHANDLER & CO.,
SOLE AGENTS,
WINTER ST., BOSTON.

Agency Dr. Jaeger Sanitary Woollen System.

BERNARDSTON—Congregational Unitarian Society: Rev. Francis W. Holden, Mrs. Hattie Brown, Miss Maria Sanderson.
BEVERLY—First Parish—Rev. William B. Geoghegan, James A. Marsters, Mrs. Nancy C. Marsters.
BOLTON—First Congregational Church: Rev. William J. Leonard, Mrs. Julia A. Woodbury, Miss Lucy H. Sawyer.
BOSTON—Arlington Street Church: Rev. John Cuckson, Mrs. James B. Case, Mrs. Henry S. Grew.
Church of the Unity: Rev. Minot J. Savage, Henry F. Miller, James N. North. Alternates: Alfred Ewer, Frank R. Thayer.
New South Church: F. E. Bartley, Mrs. J. H. Wiggin, Mrs. F. R. Tibbets. Alternates Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Whitcomb, Mrs. M. E. Sparhawk.
Second Church: Rev. Thomas Van Ness, Charles W. Holmes, Mrs. Francis H. Brown.
South Congregational Church: Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D., George O. Carpenter, Mrs. William Howell Reed. Alternates: Mrs. J. W. Andrews, Mrs. Sarah E. Hooper.
(Brighton)—First Parish: Rev. Albert Walkley, Miss M. O. Pierce, Miss Georgia D. Livermore.
(Charlestown)—Harvard Church: Rev. C. C. Carpenter, Ernest C. Marshall, Miss Elizabeth Hurd.
(Dorchester)—First Parish: Rev. Eugene R. Shippen, J. Homer Pierce, Miss Jennie G. Moseley. Alternates: Henry F. Howe, Geo. C. Burgess.
(Dorchester)—Third Religious Society: Rev. Frederick B. Mott, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Eddy.
(Dorchester)—Norfolk Unitarian Church: Rev. William H. Branigan, Samuel H. Babcock, Horace S. Fowle.
(Dorchester)—Society of Christ Church: Rev. B. A. Goodridge, Josiah H. Carter, Mrs. Frank B. Lethrop.
(East Boston)—The Church of our Father: Rev. Richmond Fiske, D.D., Henry Peterson, Arthur D. Rogers.
(Jamaica Plain)—First Congregational Society: Rev. Charles F. Dole, Mrs. A. Davis Weld, Miss Alice G. Morse.
(Neponset)—Church of the Unity: Rev. George Herbert Hosmer, Laban Pratt, Mrs. John W. Porter.
(Roslindale)—Unitarian Church of Roslindale: Rev. Richard W. Boynton, Miss Mary Hastings, Miss Clara Webb.
(Roxbury)—All Souls' Church: Rev. W. H. Lyon, Henry S. Bean, Mrs. Charles Newhall.
BREWSTER—First Parish: Rev. Thomas Daves, Captain and Mrs. J. Henry Sears. Alternate: Mrs. Mary D. Newell.
BRIDGEWATER—First Congregational Society: Rev. Charles A. Allen, Hollis M. Blackstone, Miss Martha Keith.
First Parish Church: Rev. Chas. A. Allen, H. M. Blackstone, Miss Martha Keith.
BRIDGEWATER, EAST—First Parish: Rev. John W. Quinby, Mrs. Susan M. Keith, Charles F. Mann.
BRIDGEWATER, WEST—First Congregational Society: Rev. E. B. Maglathlin, Francis E. Howard, Mary P. Whitman.
BROCKTON—Unity Church: Mrs. Minerva H. Bird, Miss Mary Hayward.
BROOKFIELD—First Congregational Church: Rev. William L. Walsh, Henry B. Crosby, Mrs. J. W. Livermore. Alternates: Mrs. H. L. Butterworth, Mrs. H. P. Gerald.
BROOKLINE—First Parish: Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Stearns.
CAMBRIDGE—First Parish: Rev. S. M. Crothers, Rev. Joseph Henry Allen, D.D., Mrs. C. S. Gage.
CAMBRIDGEPORT—Third Congregational Society: Rev. and Mrs. William H. Johnson, Mrs. Chas. L. Jones.
CANTON—First Congregational Parish: Rev. Henry F. Jenks, Charles H. French, William O. Chapman.
CHELMSFORD—First Congregational Society: Rev. Granville Pierce, Mrs. Lucy Fletcher, Mrs. F. A. Adams.
CLINTON—First Unitarian Society: Rev. James C. Duncan, Mrs. Harriet A. Harris, Mrs. Christopher C. Stone.
COHASSET—Rev. Joseph Osgood, D.D., Mr. and Mrs. Edward E. Tower.
CONCORD—First Parish: Mr. Harvey Wheeler, Miss Angelina Ball. Alternates: Prescott Keyes, Mrs. William Wheeler.
DANVERS—Unitarian Congregational Society: Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Mr. and Mrs. John Lummus.
DEDHAM—First Parish: Rev. William H. Fish, Jr., Miss Ellen H. Crehore, Mrs. Mary Cole.
Third Parish: Rev. Obed Eldridge, Mrs. Reuben Colburn, Miss Elizabeth Fisher. Alternates: Mrs. William Colburn, Miss Anna Colburn.
DIGHTON—Pedobaptist Congregational Society: Rev. Mary L. Leggett, Mrs. Nancy Baxter, F. Waldron. Alternates: Mrs. E. Horton, Mrs. J. Standish.
DOVER—First Parish: Rev. Obed Eldridge, Mrs. Sarah Smith, Frank Smith. Alternates: George D. Burrage, Mrs. Mary Smith.
FALL RIVER—Unitarian Society: Rev. Arthur May Knapp, Mrs. James M. Morton, Mrs. William E. Warner.
FITCHBURG—First Parish: Rev. Walter F. Greenman, J. F. D. Garfield, Mrs. Effie M. F. Hartwell.
FLORENCE—Free Congregational Society: Rev. F. A. Hinkley, Henry B. Haven, L. F. S. Plimpton.
FRAMINGHAM—First Church: Rev. Ernest C. Smith, Thos. C. Porter, Abby S. Perry.
GARDNER—First Unitarian Society: Rev. William Channing Brown, John Sawin, William Soule.
GLOUCESTER—First Parish: Rev. L. W. Mason, Mr. and Mrs. Ebed Dris.
GREENFIELD—Third Congregational Society: Rev. Arthur A. Brooks, Mrs. George E. Lyons, Mrs. Charles B. Peabody.
GROTON—First Parish: Rev. Joshua Young, D.D., Miss Georgiana A. Boutwell, Mrs. Daniel Needham.
HARVARD—First Congregational Parish: Rev. J. P. Sheafe, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Fairbank.
HINGHAM—First Parish: Rev. John W. Day, Ebed L. Ripley, Wilmon W. Blackmar.
Third Congregational Society: Rev. C. T. Billings, Major B. F. Meserve, Mrs. H. A. Miles.
HINGHAM, SOUTH—Second Parish: Rev. Charles T. Billings, Joseph Jacobs, David Cushing.
HOLYOKE—Liberal Christian Congregational Society: Rev. J. W. Carney, Mr. and Mrs. J. N. Thayer.
HOPEDALE—The Hopedale Parish: Rev. Lewis G. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. William Welch.
HUBBARDSTON—First Congregational Society: Rev. William Channing Brown, William Wheeler, Miss Clark.
HUDSON—First Unitarian Society: Rev. John Mills Wilson, James L. Harriman, Edmund M. Stowe.
HYDE PARK—First Unitarian Society: Rev. A. G. Pettingill, Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Rich.
LANCASTER—First Congregational Society: Rev. George M. Bartol, D.D., William A. Kilburn, Miss Mary W. Fuller.
LAWRENCE—First Unitarian Society: Rev. George H. Young, Mr. and Mrs. William T. MacAlpine.
LEOMINSTER—First Congregational Society: Rev. and Mrs. George M. Bodge, Miss Alvina E. Johnson. Alternates: Miss E. P. Grout, Mrs. Mary E. Goss.
LEXINGTON—First Congregational Society: Rev. Carlton A. Staples, Mr. and Mrs. George O. Davis.
LEXINGTON, EAST—Follen Church: George W. Cook, Edward T. Harrington, Alfred Pierce.
LINCOLN—Unitarian Congregational Society: Miss Cook, Miss Hula Howes, Miss Jennie Pierce.
LITTLETON—First Congregational Society: Rev. Isaac F. Porter, Mrs. Mary J. Priest, D. G. Houghton.
LOWELL—First Unitarian Society: Charles H. Coburn, Mrs. C. F. Blanchard, H. C. Guild.
LYNN—Second Congregational Society: Rev. Samuel B. Stewart, Chas. B. Tebbets, Chas. H. Newhall.
MALDEN—First Congregational Unitarian Society: Rev. Benjamin H. Bailey, Miss Sophia W. Sargent, Miss Charlotte A. Jones.
MARBLEHEAD—Second Congregational Society: Rev. Henry C. MacDougall, William L. Hooper, Miss Mary H. Fabens.
MARLBORO—Second Parish: Rev. Edward F. Hayward, Mrs. Loren Arnold, John L. Stone.
MENFIEL—First Congregational Church: Rev. John A. Savage, Henry E. Marshall, Mrs. William Marshall.
MENDON—First Parish: Rev. Lewis G. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Julius A. George.
MIDDLEBORO—First Unitarian Society: J. Foster Tucker, Alice E. S. Eaton, Adeline V. Wood.
MILTON—First Congregational Parish: Rev. Roderick Stebbins, Miss Joanna Rotch, Mrs. John B. Tileston.
MONTAGUE—Second Congregational Society: Mrs. G. A. Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. Warren Bardwell.
NATICK—South—First Unitarian Parish: Rev. Lev-erett R. Daniels, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Perry. Alternates: Mrs. Harriet J. Daniels.
NEEDHAM—First Congregational Society: Rev. Philip S. Thacher, Mrs. Caroline G. Mills, George K. Clarke.
NEW BEDFORD—First Congregational Society: Rev. Paul R. Frothingham, Mrs. William J. Rotch, Frederick Grinnell.
NEWBURYPORT—First Religious Society: Rev. Sam-uel C. Beane, D.D., Henry B. Little, Dr. John F. Young.
NORTHAMPTON—First Congregational Church and So-ciety: Miss Ella Seely, Mrs. L. F. Stratton.
NORTHFIELD—First Congregational Society: Rev. George F. Piper, Miss Eliza Belcher, Miss Fannie M. Piper.
NORTHAMPTON—Second Congregational Society: T. M. Shepherd, Miss Sarah Todd, Miss Ella I. Edwards.
NORTON—Congregational Parish: Rev. and Mrs. C. A. Young, E. C. White.
NORWELL—First Parish: Rev. T. Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Willard Torrey.

PEABODY—First Unitarian Church: Rev. J. W. Hud-son, Nathaniel Symonds, Charles S. Osgood.
PENACOOK—First Church: Rev. E. C. Guild, Mrs. Tison, Mrs. Litchfield.
PLYMOUTH—First Parish: Rev. C. P. Lombard, Arthur Lord, William S. Kyle.
QUINCY—First Congregational Society: Rev. E. C. Butler, Mrs. George Keyes, Franklin Faxon. Alter-nate: Mrs. Franklin Faxon.
RANDOLPH—Church of the Unity: Rev. Charles A. Humphreys, Mrs. Peter C. Wales, Mrs. Walter Howard. Alternates: Mrs. William Porter, Mrs. Ephraim Belcher.
REVER—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Eber R. But-ler, John Y. Pratt, Mrs. C. M. Butler.
ROCKLAND—The Unitarian Society: Rev. Frederick O. MacCartney, Charles A. Townsend, Miss Angela W. Collins.
ROWE—First Congregational Church: Rev. Herman Haugerud, Mrs. Julia F. Browning, Frederick A. Brownling.
SALEM—Independent Congregational Church in Bar-ton Square: Rev. Alfred Manchester, Walter C. Harris, Miss Ada E. Deland.
The North Society: Rev. Geo. D. Latimer, Mrs. Charles Hoffman, Mrs. James Braden.
SCITUATE—First Parish: Rev. and Mrs. Watson Weed, George O. Allen.
SHERBORN—First Congregational Church: Rev. L. R. Daniels, Mrs. Martha A. Clark, Miss C. L. Leland.
SHIRLEY—First Congregational Society: Mr. and Mrs. Thomas L. Hazen, Miss Laura King.
STONEHAM—First Unitarian Church: Rev. J. Herman Whitmore, Mrs. Charles S. Jewett, Miss Laura J. Nowlin.
STOW—First Parish: Rev. J. S. Moulton, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Stevens.
STURBRIDGE—Unitarian Congregational Society: E. L. Bates, Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Nichols.
TAUNTON—First Congregational Society: Rev. John P. Forbes, Dr. and Mrs. O. S. Paige. Alternates: Miss Fanny Townsend, Mrs. Henry D. Atwood.
TEMPLETON—First Parish: Rev. J. M. W. Pratt, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Lord.
TURNER'S FALLS—Unitarian Society: Rev. and Mrs. Alfred Free, Mrs. Daniel P. Abercrombie.
TYNGSBORO—First Parish: Rev. William Brown, Miss Mary E. Bennett, Miss Ellen F. Perham.
UPTON—First Unitarian Society: Rev. T. E. Chappell, Rev. and Mrs. George S. Ball. Alternates: Mrs. Emily Harris, Miss Lizzie Ball.
WALTHAM—First Parish: Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, Mrs. John E. Soper, Miss Mabel B. Soper.
WESTBORO—First Congregational Society: Rev. J. H. Weeks, John L. Brigham, Mrs. I. T. Swift. Alternates: Mrs. J. L. Brigham.
WESTFORD—Westford Church: Miss Eliza T. Babbitt, Mrs. John P. Barnard.
WEST TOWNSEND—Liberal Christian Society: Rev. George S. Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. Morton Barrett.
WINCHENDON—Church of the Unity: Rev. A. J. Culp, D. H. Barnes, J. N. Richardson.
WINCHESTER—Winchester Unitarian Society: Rev. Arthur W. Littlefield, S. W. Twombly, G. P. Brown.
WOLLASTON—Unitarian Society: Rev. James E. Bag-ley, Mrs. Charles T. Baker, Mrs. George W. Bennett, Alternate: Charles S. Cummings.
WORCESTER—Church of the Unity: Rev. Calvin Steb-bins, Hon. George F. Hoar, Cyrus G. Wood.
Second Parish: Mrs. Phineas Ball, Mrs. J. B. Stone, Mrs. Theodore Brown.
CALIFORNIA.
OAKLAND—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Charles W. Wendte, Mr. and Mrs. A. D. Wilson.
SAN FRANCISCO—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Horatio Stebbins, D.D., Charles M. Gorham.
CANADA.
HAMILTON—First Unitarian Church: Rev. J. H. Long, Peter Bertram, J. W. Millard. Alternates: Mrs. J. H. Long, D. S. Thompson.
COLORADO.
GREELEY—First Unitarian Society: Rev. C. Howard Wilson, Oscar B. Hawes.
CONNECTICUT.
BROOKLYN—First Ecclesiastical Society: Rev. and Mrs. James E. Locke, Charles G. Williams.
HARTFORD—First Unitarian Congregational Society: Rev. Joseph Waite, William Francis, Horace Cornwall.
DELAWARE.
WILMINGTON—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Alexan-der T. Bowser, Mrs. Eli Garrett, Miss Helen S. Garrett. Alternates: Daniel W. Taylor, G. G. Cameron.
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.
WASHINGTON—All Souls' Church: Rev. Rush R. Shippen, Hon. Carroll D. Wright, Henry F. Blount.
GEORGIA.
ATLANTA—Church of Our Father: George H. Crafts, Mrs. Fanny C. Swift. Alternates: John C. Pick, Mrs. Minnie E. Owen.
ILLINOIS.
CHICAGO—First Unitarian Society: Rev. W. W. Fenn, Hon. D. L. Shorey, Mrs. Beecher. Alternates: Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Follansbee.
Unity Church: Rev. B. R. Bulkeley, Mrs. T. F. Gane, Mrs. C. A. Tinkham.
GENESEO—Unitarian Society: Rev. John B. Bidwell, Miss C. M. Allen.
IOWA.
SIoux CITY—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Mary A. Safford, J. C. C. Hoskins, Mrs. E. H. Bucknam.
KANSAS.
LAWRENCE—First Unitarian Society: Rev. C. G. Howland, B. W. Woodward, Tracy Learvard.
KENTUCKY.
LOUISVILLE—Church of the Messiah: Rev. Charles J. K. Jones, Mrs. William H. Smith, Mrs. Caroline Thompson. Alternates: A. G. Munn, F. N. Hartwell.
LOUISIANA.
NEW ORLEANS—First Unitarian Church: Rev. and Mrs. Walter C. Pierce.
MAINE.
BELEFAST—First Parish: Rev. and Mrs. James M. Leighton, Mrs. David Alexander.
EASTPORT—First Congregational Society: Rev. Has-ket D. Catlin, Mrs. S. B. Hume, Miss A. A. Milliken.
PORTLAND—First Parish: Rev. John C. Perkins, Hon. and Mrs. Selden Connor.
MARYLAND.
BALTIMORE—First Independent Christ Church: Rev. Charles R. Weld, Hon. Enoch Pratt, Judge Thomas J. Morris. Alternates: Mrs. M. N. Perry, Miss Eaton.
MONTANA.
HELENA—First Unitarian Society: Rev. J. H. Crooker, Hon. Henry M. Blake, A. D. Edger.
NEBRASKA.
OMAHA—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Newton M. Mann, William Wallace, Thomas Kilpatrick.
NEW HAMPSHIRE.
ANDOVER—Congregational Unitarian Society: Rev. Lyman Clark, Walter S. Carr, Mrs. Maria Carr.
CONCORD—Second Congregational Society: Rev. Frank L. Phalen, Mr. and Mrs. George L. Stratton.
DOVER—First Unitarian Society of Christians: Rev. Duren J. H. Ward, Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Worthen.
DUBLIN—First Congregational Society: Rev. George Patten, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Gowing.
EXETER—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Alfred C. Nickerson, Miss Mary E. Hartwell, Miss Annabel War-ren. Alternates: Miss Alice Chesley, Miss Annie Shute.
LEBANON—First Congregational Unitarian Society: Rev. Charles C. Vinal, C. D. Smith, Mrs. J. E. Lincoln.
LITTLETON—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Leroy Fletcher Snapp, Gen. George T. Cruft, Mrs. T. E. Parker.
MILFORD—First Unitarian Society: Rev. A. Judson Rich, Mrs. William Richardson, Miss E. A. Livermore.
NASHUA—First Congregational Society: Rev. E. Powell, Miss Henrietta Prescott, Miss Kate Thayer.
PETERBORO—Congregational Church: Rev. George E. Littlefield, Mrs. Mary J. Littlefield, Eben W. Jones.
WILTON—Liberal Christian Church: Rev. John O. Mitchell, Dr. and Mrs. Frank M. Pevey.
WILTON CENTRE—First Congregational Church and Society: Rev. John G. Mitchell, Mr. and Mrs. Dwight Abbott.
NEW JERSEY.
ORANGE—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Edward Hale, Mrs. R. C. Browning, Mrs. Chandler Sexton.
PASSAIC—Unitarian Society: Rev. Frank S. C. Wicks, Mr. and Mrs. Warren B. Hutchinson.
PLAINFIELD—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Hobart Clark, Mrs. W. F. Adams, Miss Bessie Reynolds.

NEW YORK.
ALBANY—First Unitarian Society: Rev. W. M. Brun-dage, Mrs. M. A. Clayton, Miss Mary E. Hawley.
BABCOCK—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, William Dodsworth, Mrs. W. J. Russell. Alter-nates: Isaac H. Cary, W. C. Gardner.
Second Unitarian Congregational Society: Rev. John W. Chadwick, Henry W. Maxwell, Sylvester Swain. Alternates: Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Wing.
Third Unitarian Congregational Society: Rev. Ste-phen H. Camp, W. P. Dunwoody, Mrs. J. P. Leach. Alternates: F. E. Southard, Mrs. N. J. Bishoprick.
Willow Place Chapel: Rev. Lincoln E. Brown, George C. Brackett, Mrs. Augustus Weddigen.
NEW YORK—Church of the Messiah: Rev. Robert Collyer, Gardiner L. Colton, Wm. T. Balter. Alternate: Mrs. Joseph P. Hale.
OHIO.
CINCINNATI—First Congregational Unitarian Church: Rev. George A. Thayer Joseph W. Wayne, Albert G. Corrie.
OREGON.
PORTLAND—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Earl M. Wilbur, Mrs. R. S. Greenleaf, Mrs. W. A. Buckanam. Alternates: Miss Margaret Burrell, Mrs. Lee Hoffman.
PENNSYLVANIA.
MEADVILLE—Rev. W. I. Lawrance, Mrs. C. B. Law-rance, Miss Martha S. Cullum.
PHILADELPHIA—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Joseph May, Miss Elizabeth Bradford, Enoch Lewis. Alter-nates: Miss E. C. Egner, Frank R. Tobey.
Spring Garden Unitarian Society: Rev. W. I. Nich-ols, Samuel Sartin, Mrs. A. W. Longstreth.
Unitarian Society of Germantown: Rev. James C. Hodgins, Mr. and Mrs. Edward W. Clark. Alter-nates: Mrs. John P. Isley, Mrs. H. L. Deacon.
PITTSBURG—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Charles E. St. John, R. Q. Whitten, Mrs. Henry Holdship. Al-ternates: George Faunce, Miss Mary P. Semple.
RHODE ISLAND.
NEWPORT—Channing Memorial Church: Rev. George W. Cutter, M.D., Mr. and Mrs. William Stevens.
PROVIDENCE—First Congregational Society: Rev. Augustus M. Lord, Augustus R. Peirce, Mrs. Sydney R. Burleigh.
Olney Street Congregational Society: Rev. Wm. F. Furnman, S. H. Ungley, Miss M. Metcalf.
Westminster Congregational Society: Rev. Her-bert Mott, Nathan H. Truman, Mrs. B. Ray Phelon.
TIVERTON—Bowen Memorial Chapel: Rev. W. C. Litchfield, Mr. and Mrs. John S. West.
SOUTH CAROLINA.
CHARLESTON—The Unitarian Church: Rev. Henry A. Whitman, Alva Gage, Miss Caroline H. Marsh.
VERMONT.
MONTPELIER—Church of the Messiah: Rev. J. Ed-ward Wright, Mr. and Mrs. A. Johnson.
BRATTLEBORO—Unitarian Congregational Society: Rev. E. Bradford Leavitt, Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, Mrs. Mary E. Warder.
VIRGINIA.
RICHMOND—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Joseph M. Seaton, Mr. and Mrs. Ware B. Gay.
WASHINGTON.
SEATTLE—First Unitarian Society: Rev. J. H. Acton, D.D., Joseph Shippen, Mrs. J. H. Allen.
WISCONSIN.
MILWAUKEE—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Henry T. Secrist, Miss Kate T. Norris, D. W. Keyes.
ASSOCIATIONS.
AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION: George Batch-elor, George W. Stone, Horace G. Wadlin.
BENEVOLENT FRATERNITY OF CHURCHES: Rev. Edward A. Horton, William P. Fowler, John Capen.
CARE OF CONFERENCE: Rev. John A. Bevington, Hon. Charles Dillingham, Mrs. O. C. Winslow. Alter-nate: Rev. S. B. Flagg.
CHANNING CLUB OF BOSTON: Frank B. Thayer, Horace S. Sears, George Hutchinson.
CHILDREN'S MISSION TO THE CHILDREN OF THE DESTITUTE, BOSTON: William H. Baldwin, Clarence W. Jones, Dr. J. Foster Bush.
CONNECTICUT VALLEY CONFERENCE: Rev. F. A. Hinkley, Rev. C. F. Abbott, H. C. Parsons.
HANCOCK CONFERENCE (MAINE): Mr. and Mrs. David B. Flint, Mrs. F. G. Peabody.
LADIES' CHARITABLE SOCIETY OF FITZWILLIAM, N.H.: Miss Alice Ayers, Mrs. Julia Perry, Calvin B. Perry.
MINISTERS' LEAGUE FOR PRACTICAL WORK: Rev. D. M. Wilson, Rev. E. C. Head, Rev. Pitt Dillingham.
NATIONAL ALLIANCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL CHRISTIAN WOMEN: Mrs. B. Ward Dix, Mrs. Emily A. Fifeid, Mrs. Mary B. Davis.
NATIONAL BUREAU OF UNITY CLUBS: Rev. Thomas Van Ness, Rev. George W. Cooke, Rev. W. H. Savage.
NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE: Mrs. H. D. Catlin, Miss Phoebe M. Waldo, Mrs. J. M. Tyler.
NEW HAMPSHIRE UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION: Gen. George T. Cruft, Hon. Henry M. Baker, Col. Charles C. Danforth.
NORFOLK CONFERENCE: E. A. Cushing, Mrs. G. F. Fisher, Mrs. Samuel Phipps.
NORFOLK AND MIDDLESEX MINISTERIAL ASSOCIA-TION: Rev. Solon W. Bush.
NORTH MIDDLESEX CONFERENCE: J. A. Harwood, Littleton; Thomas H. Elliot, Lowell.
PACIFIC UNITARIAN CONFERENCE: Charles M. Gor-ham, Rev. Charles W. Wendte, Andrew D. Halliday.
SUPREME CONFERENCE: Rev. C. R. Eliot, Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells, Reuben Peterson.
THE UNITARIAN CONFERENCE OF THE MIDDLE STATES AND CANADA: Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, Rev. D. W. Morehouse, Howland Davis.
UNITARIAN CLUB (BOSTON): Francis H. Brown, William Howell Reed.
UNITARIAN CLUB OF PHILADELPHIA: E. E. Allen, Mrs. W. I. Nichols, Wm. N. Allen.
UNITARIAN CLUB, PROVIDENCE, R.I.: James F. Field, Frank Bowen, William H. Miller.
UNITARIAN EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY (ANDOVER, N.H.): Miss Mary A. Downing, Mrs. Clarence E. Carr.
UNITARIAN MINISTERS' MONDAY CLUB: Rev. Alfred E. Mullett, Rev. F. H. James, Rev. Eber R. Butler.
UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY: Rev. Ed-ward A. Horton, Richard C. Humphreys, Edwin J. Lewis, Jr.
UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON: Frank B. Thayer, Mrs. C. R. Eliot, Hon. Charles H. Porter.
UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY: Rev. C. R. Eliot, Prof. Francis G. Peabody, D.D., Mrs. M. F. W. Homer.
WISCONSIN CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND IN-DEPENDENT SOCIETIES: J. T. Dodge, S. H. Hunt, Mrs. Anna B. Secrist.
WORCESTER ASSOCIATION OF MINISTERS: Rev. George S. Ball, Rev. Samuel May, Rev. T. T. Stone, D.D.
WORCESTER CONFERENCE: Charles H. Blood, John C. Ous, Mrs. W. S. Heywood.
WORCESTER LEAGUE OF UNITARIAN WOMEN: Miss Augusta F. Taft, Mrs. Mary S. Rugg, Mrs. James B. Stone.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE
OF
Unitarian and Other Christian Churches
AT WASHINGTON, D.C.,
October 21, 22, 23, and 24.
Messrs. RAYMOND & WHITCOMB have arranged for the accommodation of dele-gates and others who may wish to attend the National Conference an Attractive Series of Excursions at Very Low Rates.
Parties will leave BOSTON Friday, Octo-ber 18, and Monday, October 21, under special escort. A choice of routes by boat and rail.
Additional excursions to Gettysburg, Old Point Comfort, etc.
SPECIAL TRIP TO ATLANTA,
leaving Washington after the close of the Conference, and reaching Boston October 31.
Send for special circular.
RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,
296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.
THE RALEIGH
Pennsylvania Avenue and Twelfth Street, N.W.
WASHINGTON, D.C.
Only two blocks from hall in which Unitarian Confer-ence meetings are held.
The only strictly first-class hotel conducted solely upon the European plan, with its entire construction absolutely fire-proof.
No pains nor expense have been spared to make the sanitary conditions of the hotel as satisfactory as mod-ern ideas and first-class work could make them.
Every room is heated by steam and lighted by elec-tricity. The service and cuisine of the hotel will be maintained in accordance with the best traditions of the culinary art.
Rates for rooms are graded according to size and location.
T. J. TALTY, Manager.
The Ebbitt House
WASHINGTON, D.C.
Special rate for those attending meeting of the Na-tional Conference, $2.50 and $3.00 each per day up. Parlors and alcove parlors at equally low rates. This house is only two blocks from Metzger's Hall, where the Convention will be held.
H. C. BURCH, Manager.
Literary Lectures
—FOR—
UNITY CLUBS, WOMEN'S ALLIANCES, Etc.
By Rev. GEO. H. YOUNG
—ON—

Louisa Alcott.	Charlotte Bronte.
George Eliot.	Jane Welsh Carlyle.
Dorothea Dix.	Margaret Fuller.
E. B. Browning.	Jane Austen.
Alice and Phoebe Cary.

For circulars and terms address
LAWRENCE, MASS.
Series of attractive lectures.—Lawrence American.
Delightful lectures.—Lawrence Eagle.
Large and select audience gathered to enjoy the liter-ary treat offered. Mr. Young is a very interesting speaker, and held the attention of his audience closely. All who listened to this lecture will be anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity offered for the remainder of the course.—Portsmouth Times.
Atlanta Exposition.
ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors. Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Con-venient to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.
JAMES KAY APPLEBEE
is open to engagements for PREACHING or LECTURING. Address: ALLSTON, MASS.
Rooms To Let.
Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at 36 RUTLAND SQUARE.
Situation Wanted
By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Ad-dress H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

The Pulpit.

GEORGE W. BRIGGS, D.D.

A MEMORIAL DISCOURSE.

BY REV. W. H. JOHNSON.

"A cloud of witnesses."—HEB. xii. 1.

I do not know how better to introduce a discourse on this theme than by quoting from a sermon of our late beloved senior minister on the same text. He says: "Honored and loved as men may be, they seldom exert their deepest influence until they die. A thousand misconceptions may often attend living excellence. We do not yield it a fitting reverence while it stands by our side. But the dead truly begin to live in the better judgment, in the reverent feeling, of human hearts. When they leave the earth, they begin to exert their noblest influence. When Jesus went away, the Comforter came." Here is eloquently set forth that aspect of death which so greatly helps to reconcile us to it. I mean its idealization of the departed, in their removal from the environment which, in some degree, obscured our vision. In life the accidents of daily occurrence and of familiar intercourse form a medium, more or less dense, through which the object of our regard is seen, as the full moon is seen on the horizon, veiled by the intervening mists. When death has lifted one out of this environment, these obscuring accidents fall away, and he is seen in his essential character, as the moon risen above low-lying vapors shines in unclouded effulgence.

In this way those of the dead who, living, possessed character and individuality, are, in a peculiar and significant sense, a "cloud of witnesses." They testify to great principles, to vital truths, to social virtues or domestic graces. Their lives, though ended here, form an enduring testimony to the things which cannot be shaken. One witnesses to the need of singleness of purpose as the essential requisite of success; another, to the glory of that self-forgetting love which throws life and energies without stint into some work for man. In short, every life that has been worthily lived bears its testimony to some enduring principle.

May we not, then, with especial emphasis, say of the revered and loved man whom we commemorate to-day that he has joined the great cloud of witnesses? His life and work bore no uncertain testimony. Let me briefly and with no little self-distrust, since I address those the most of whom knew him far better than I, point out how, as a minister of the gospel, he seems to me to have borne strong and faithful witness. Before all, I would say, his work testified to the need of personal consecration and the value of a vital sympathy between minister and people. His was no service of brilliant but cold intellectuality, far removed from the every-day needs and struggles of his people. With warmth and sympathy he entered into their life, fatherly to the young, friendly to all. With whatever power he spoke from the pulpit,—and we all know how great that power was,—I venture to think that he was, even more than the fervid and eloquent preacher, the pastor of his people, the loving shepherd of the flock, rejoicing with them in their joys, sorrowing with them in their griefs, carrying with him in his daily intercourse that gentleness of demeanor, that quick responsiveness, flowing warm from the heart, which we all knew and loved in him, and these endearing qualities combined with such readiness of wit and playfulness of speech as made his presence a perpetual sunshine. I dare assert, without fear of a dissenting voice, that, forceful as he was in the pulpit and on the platform, he is remembered and loved still more as the man of warm heart and sweet spirit, the faithful and sympathizing pastor, the constant friend and father of his people. This I affirm, not because it has been told me, but because of the conviction growing out of my own observations. I am well assured that a preacher only, however powerful and brilliant, could never have taken a hold so deep and enduring in the affections of his people. His throne is pre-eminently in the heart.

Did not his whole public ministry make its appeal mainly to the affectional side of our nature? I should say so. As I glance over a volume of his sermons, printed in 1854, I find these discourses glowing with the fervor of an intense personal piety. I should judge that the speculative aspects of religion—those which deal with it as a logical system—had little attraction for him. But he was profoundly interested in applied religion; i.e., in the employment of those doctrines which he accepted to the daily guidance, stimulation, solace, and inspiration of life. If I may venture to interpret his inner habit from these discourses, I should say that he lived in an atmosphere of deep religious feeling, and that these utterances are but the outpourings of his own secret springs of strength and sweetness. The source of their power over hearers was that they flowed from heart to heart. He did not labor to convince. He did not argue a point. He did not state a proposition and array his proofs in support of it. He simply uttered his own burning convictions in language singularly felicitous and moving. The hearts of his hearers responded, because he was handling, with the deep earnestness of an unquestioning faith, themes that vitally concern every human being. The positiveness of his own beliefs must have been peculiarly grateful to those whom it distresses to hear any point of the faith which they have early been taught to receive brought into debate.

To him the life hereafter was a vital reality, to be spoken of with the same certainty as that with which we say that to-morrow will not be essentially different from to-day. Hear this strongly positive passage from the sermon already quoted: "The spiritual world is no longer a land of shadows, when loved and cherished friends have gone to dwell there; and, in proportion as such witnesses increase, it will appear like a great reality to the soul. It cannot be shadowy, then. We know its inhabitants. Familiar voices are speaking there. Well-known feet are busy in its blessed ministries. Hearts whose deeper life has been manifested to our eyes throb there unchanged, except as their earthly graces have brightened into a heavenly glory." What language could be more reassuring to one contemplating the life to come and accepting the statements made with reference to it as parts of an inerrant revelation than the following passage? "As the presence of dear friends on earth gave to life its dearest joy, so now their presence in the spiritual world invests the state beyond the tomb with the same attraction. In well-remembered tones of love they seem to say, 'Come up hither to dwell again with us.' The cloud of witnesses is gathering. We are only passing from our home below to our home above. As the new-born child is received into the arms of love which wait to bless it, so is the new-born soul welcomed and blessed in that higher world. And a still better welcome may await that better birth. It may be as if the infant here could instantly share the first full rapture of the mother's heart."

How delightfully reassuring to those who mourn such words as these! "The souls of the holy departed are represented not merely as quickening the faithful by their memories, but as invisible yet assisting angels, present with them in their earthly pilgrimage. If the earthly life has been a quickening, spiritual ministry, we can scarcely question the continuance of that ministry when this life is ended. The departed child whose angel always beholds the face of the Father, whose soul was never clouded by sin, may now be sitting in the midst of us, like the child whom Jesus once placed in the midst of his disciples, to reveal to the heart the spirit of heaven. Perhaps it is near to us, to whisper messages from the Father more directly to the soul." "When Jesus shall touch our eyes, we may open them at once upon the now invisible scenes of the spiritual world. The bonds of love that once connected us with the departed in visible communion are not severed, but strengthened, as they vanish from our sight. God, who makes all things his angels, forever sends out the spirits of the pure with revelations of his will. The earth is covered with the ashes of the departed, and we are compassed about by their present spirits. They speak to us, it may be, while we wake and while we sleep. They whisper thoughts of encouragement in our hours of weakness. They speak no longer in imperfect words, as when here by our side, but in clear revelations. The departed mother may be one of the angels who watch over the child. The ascended child may come with consolations to the weeping mother; and, while we linger at the tomb of the loved, they may be standing, as it were, behind us, as the risen Jesus stood behind Mary at the sepulchre." "Communication between the spirit world and this is a necessity. The unseen ocean of spiritual life washes all the coasts of present being, and the waves and tides from afar forever come to bring their reviving influence to its shores. We cannot see these spiritual forms with mortal eyes. We cannot hear their swift wings, as they fly on their errands of love and joy. Still, their spirits pass before our face; and, though we do not discern the form thereof, yet, in the silence of listening reverence, we may hear a voice, speaking words of truth, messages of God."

He had an intense conviction of the "witness of the Spirit," as superior to the deductions of reason. He was not of those who, in his day, sought to prove immortality by labored arguments, still less of those who, in this day, declare that it is not matter of demonstration, but of hope. To him it was a subject of inward conviction. This is strikingly illustrated in the sermon on "Present Experience of Immortal Life." In this he says: "Would you gain a bright faith in immortality? Dwell in the life of lowly prayer, till your intimate relationship to God becomes a fixed and present thought. This practical assurance of immortality, the proof which grows from the life of the heart, may be manifest to those who know nothing of human wisdom, but who humbly dwell in the divine love. It may be hidden from the wise and prudent, while it is revealed to babes."

To him the Bible was not the literature of an ancient and deeply religious people, abounding with passages of high inspiration. It was the Word of God. Where its utterance on any point was clear and unmistakable, he quoted it as conclusive. Its statements and affirmations were those of a divine revelation.

So, also, Jesus was more than an inspired teacher, a Divine Man, "the Son of God, whose life and death laid the cornerstone of the great temple of truth and holiness." The reported utterances of this exalted being are absolute truth. We read, "The declarations of Jesus, the words of him who was clothed in the majesty of wisdom and of miracle, come to the yet undeveloped soul like the words of a friend on whom we implicitly rely." To him the prophet of Nazareth was a savior of men, not merely during his earthly life, but one still carrying on his redemptive work in heaven. Thus we read: "A love like that of Jesus could not change its nature when he entered into the invisible world. It became more intense, as he ascended into heaven, to sit on the right hand of the Father. Jesus did not breathe his last prayer for the sinning, when he implored forgiveness for the crucifiers. His intercessions did not cease when his voice of love was no more heard on earth. His ministry was not closed when he vanished from the disciples' sight. As he himself said, he went away only to enter upon a mightier work, to send the all-sustaining, all-illuminating Comforter into their souls. I hear his promise of love, 'Lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.'"

Briefly, he had such a deep conviction of the supernatural, as inwoven with and manifesting itself in the natural, that his religion glowed with the fervor of mediæval saintliness. He seems to have dwelt in such unquestioning faith in the Hebrew interpretation of life, set forth in the New Testament, as gave tone and color to his whole ministry. It is true that the sermons from which I have quoted were published forty-one years ago, before that great flood of light from the scientific study of life in its various manifestations, which has so profoundly influenced recent religious thought. And it is not supposable that a mind of such alertness as his could have escaped being affected, in some degree, by this new and potent influence, which is in itself a revelation. But that the essential character of his religious thinking and feeling and teaching was not thereby changed, I presume, is certain. His ministry was one of power and helpfulness to those whom it reached, because it had in it the same elements as those which made mighty instruments for good of those great preachers of an older time, some of whose names will readily occur to us. He was, like Stephen of old, "a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost." He spoke with power, because he spoke with conviction. He shared the common beliefs of the people; and he gave them the ideas that were precious and sustaining to them, clothed in beautiful form and touched with fine poetic imagination. To a faith that was childlike in its absolute simplicity he joined a beauty of diction and an oratorical fervor that thrilled the hearts of his audience. When to these was added the influence that came from the mutual affection of preacher and hearers; there was a combination of rare power. While his faith was distinctly of the older type, now rare among us, he was in warm sympathy with the progress of modern life. In the sermon delivered here in October, 1891, after his recovery from his long illness, he says: "Amid my joy there sometimes comes a sadness that my eighty years cannot be the eighty that are coming instead of those I have already had. For it seems to me that life could never have been so truly worth living as it is to-day, and must be in the coming time. . . . One year to-day accomplishes more for humanity than the thousand years of patriarchal time."

It is needless to say that Dr. Briggs's long service in this parish was a happy ministry. Pastor and people were, from the beginning, singularly well adapted to each other; and, as the years rolled by, the ties of affection bound them the more strongly together. Only a few months ago he wrote to a friend here, "My long service in Cambridge was full of pleasure to me, only lessened by the wish that I could have served such faithful friends more nobly." I doubt whether a minister and his congregation were ever in more complete accord. Such, as I have poorly and inadequately sketched him, was the man whose beautiful life and helpful ministry endeared him to so many hearts. Of his activity in other relations than the ministerial I shall not attempt to speak, except to remind you how into all his work he carried the same intensity of conviction and the same emotional energy that made him everywhere felt as a power, while the gentle and peace-loving nature of the man won him hosts of friends. Let us be deeply thankful for what he has been to us and has done for us. As one of his brother ministers, his neighbor during twenty-five years, has beautifully written: "All that heart-felt devotion could contribute to the help and heal-

A LESSON IN COOKING

When a recipe calls for a cupful of lard or butter, use two-thirds of a cupful of Cottolene—the new shortening—instead. It improves your food, improves your health, saves your money—a lesson in economy, too. Genuine COTTOLENE is sold everywhere in tins with trade-marks—"Cottolene" and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK CO., CHICAGO,
224 State Street, BOSTON,
PORTLAND, ME.

ing of his time he has freely given, and that with courage. Any of us will be happy to be as gratefully remembered when we have fought our fight."

ADDITIONAL TRIBUTES.

The following are extracts from tributes delivered at the memorial service by members of the congregation:—

BY MRS. W. W. WELLINGTON.

The power of Dr. Briggs in the pulpit can hardly be overestimated. His prayers were reverential, tender, and fervent. His sermons were emotional without being sensational. There was little in them that was speculative, controversial, or dogmatic, their aim being to stimulate and develop the religious nature. The text was selected with care. The various lessons to be deducted from it, bearing upon daily life and conduct, were clearly mapped out; and, as he presented them one after another, the text would be repeated, so that the impressions thus deepened could not readily be effaced. The influence of his whole life upon us was one of uplifting and inspiration. Whether in the pulpit, unfolding the great principles and truths of Christianity, or in our homes bringing benediction with his entrance, his one aim seemed to be a thorough consecration of himself to the ministry of Christ and the service of humanity. The very sight of him was magnetic: little children would meet him with a kiss, young men and maidens gave to him their confidence, and older ones rejoiced in his warm and loving friendship. His words to the bereaved were few, but his tender bearing toward them was replete with sweet and loving sympathy.

BY MISS C. F. ORNE.

From the very first of his coming Dr. Briggs took that place in our affection which neither time nor change has been able to shake for a moment. He fulfilled every expectation and justified every confidence. Baseness and wrong fled from his righteous indignation, yet justice and love held even balance in his hand. The joyousness of his temperament gave that buoyancy to his life which is so universally attractive; and the oldest and the youngest were alike drawn to him, won by his pleasant smile and greeting, adding another joy to the most joyous occasion. In his long illness and declining age the bonds that held us did not weaken. They became silk for softness and steel for strength.

BY MR. JOHN LIVERMORE.

Dr. Briggs, either as a pastor or as a man, needs no words of eulogy. I could only echo the universal accord, "Take him for all in all, we ne'er shall look upon his like again." It only remains for us to profit by the noble life which it has been our high privilege to be associated with for more than a quarter of a century, to follow his instructions and his example. We can honor him in no better way than by doing all in our power to carry on the good work.

The Sunday School.

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

The Directors' Annual Report for 1895.

AIMS.

The Unitarian Sunday School Society was organized in 1827: it is therefore sixty-eight years old. The first President was Rev. Joseph Tuckerman, D.D. This movement took place two years after the forming of the Unitarian Association. There has been a steady growth of the work of the Unitarian Sunday School Society ever since that time, but great advances have been made at special seasons. It is a fact worth noticing that in 1852, when a new set of manuals was prepared, neither the Sunday School Society nor the American Unitarian Association appeared to have the financial ability to publish them. All matters of organization in the Unitarian body were then weak and groping their way. Now and then a discussion has arisen as to merging the Unitarian Sunday School Society with the Unitarian Association. But this has always been very decidedly met by considerations which are certainly of great force.

The moral and religious education of the young is something so important that it can never safely be left as a side matter. Whatever is undertaken for this purpose should be on an independent, energetic, and wisely planned basis. We meet again, not only to review the past, but to take a look at the future. What have been the aims of the Unitarian Sunday School Society? They might be summed up as an effort to assist the home in its nurture of disposition and character in the children, a coworker with the Church in making loyal and intelligent members, an associate power with the public-school system to add to intellectual training ethical and spiritual teaching, and to aid, in particular, in methods of spreading the cause of liberal religion. It should never be forgotten that, as a denomination, we stand for a free and reverent treatment of the Bible, a broad humanitarian use of the Church, and a fresh, vital application of Christianity to the world's needs. There is nothing so remote in philosophy or so near in practical life but finds a place in educational training. What we wish to realize in the manhood and womanhood of our land must first be planned for and started in the youth. It is as stewards of this great trust that the directors of the Unitarian Sunday School Society would again render account at this annual meeting.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Since our last annual gathering we have published "Studies in Character," by Rev. Charles F. Dole, treating Bible men and women. This is "Series IV." in Mr. Dole's suggestive "Questions for Bible Study." It has already found a large welcome among our Sunday-schools. The scholarly lessons on "The Acts of the Apostles," by Rev. W. W. Fenn, were issued in permanent form. They constitute a valuable treatise on a part of the Bible which has not been very much touched by our Unitarian authors thus far. We have also published a new tract, number six in the series, for free distribution, entitled "Music in the Sunday-school," by Rev. William H. Lyon. The current leaflet lessons of 1894-95 were bound up and made available for permanent use. These Advanced lessons on "Scenes in the Life of Jesus" were prepared by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, and the Intermediate lessons on the same subject by the president of the Unitarian Sunday School Society. They now form helps for instruction which will be of value for many years to come, since they are written in the light of the new criticism, and under the influence of a broad treatment of Christianity which is now in vogue. Rev. Charles F. Dole has prepared a book of mark and merit, entitled "A Catechism of Liberal Faith." This will prove exceptionally valuable in Bible classes. Its topics cover the range of beliefs which are the leading ones in theology; and the treatment is of a kind to elicit thought and lead the student to strong, guiding conclusions. We have in the two catechisms prepared by Rev. Minot J. Savage and Mr. Dole remarkable helps for workers in Sunday-school instruction. They are quite different; yet each is sure, when properly used, to stir thought and lead into clearness of belief. Our new catalogue, just issued, shows at a glance what a variety of manuals is now provided. The chief deficiency is in material for the youngest pupils, belonging to what is termed the "kindergarten" grade. We are now considering the publication of certain cards and leaflets in the style of those used for the common-school kindergarten. These we hope to issue by the first of the New Year. They will meet a great want, and, we trust, meet it adequately. Many of our manuals are capable of being used in the graded system or the uniform lesson. It is a significant fact that our friends, the Universalists, are becoming more and more our customers. The past year has brought many applications for our text-books from them.

GENERAL WORK.

The detail duties of the Sunday School Society steadily increase from year to year. During the past twelve months we have been taxed as never before in meeting the individual demands upon us by correspondence, orders, and requests for information. All this is very gratifying, and we speak of it as a sign of promise. The letters which come to us with regard to advice on all matters connected with Sunday-school work have multiplied. The farthest parts of the country have drawn near to us in this way. The headquarters at 25 Beacon Street, Boston, seem now to be in co-operative touch with the borders of our denomination. We have made donations to college libraries, home Sunday-schools, and struggling movements in the South and West. The president has, as its executive officer, represented the society at conferences, on Sunday in the pulpit and in the vestry, and to associations and meetings of various kinds presented the general and the special features of our great work. We wish to report with increased satisfaction the fact noticed before in our recent annual reports, that a deeper interest is now awakening with regard to Sunday-schools. The committees of churches are attending more carefully to the financial needs of the Sunday-school department. The Women's Alliance is showing a desire to join with us in strengthening this particular work. The ministers are arousing to a clearer vision, and seem to be throwing themselves more earnestly into the execution of Sunday-school duties. All this is quite natural, though we may deplore the apathy which has often rested upon our work in parishes. There is dignity in Sunday-school work, and dignity arising out of its importance and its sacred nature. To see the opportunity and to improve it is, we believe, the better state of things in our denomination.

"EVERY OTHER SUNDAY."

We need to make special mention of our paper, since it is the only one published for the young people in our denomination. The circulation of it is now between 11,500 and 12,000 copies every issue. This includes, of course, a large number distributed as missionary material. We have received many pleasant testimonies to the worth of this paper and its use in the home and church. There would be a great gain to the Sunday-schools if we could issue this paper once a week, but that does not seem possible now with the means which we have at our disposal. Considering how much there is now printed appealing to young people, we feel fairly well satisfied with the success of our paper. Yet our hope rests on a larger list, for we know of many Sunday-schools which do not take it and many homes where it ought to go.

ONE-TOPIC COURSE.

This new line of lessons, commenced two years ago, deserves special notice. We, as a board of officers, have always contended that a graded system is the only true one in theory. But we have recognized the obligation upon us to meet the wants of the denomination, not to gratify our preferences. Accordingly, from time to time there have been lessons issued prepared by Rev. Mr. Piper and Rev. Mr. Spaulding which were available for one-topic uniform lessons. Two years ago we commenced this new series of one subject, three grades, and a continuous issue every week for the school year in leaflet form, the first grade being illustrated. This course of lessons has succeeded beyond our expectations. We have always met with two obstacles in a matter of this kind. First, many schools are not large enough or homogeneous enough to allow for a one-topic lesson. Second, there are many ministers and superintendents who do not wish to adopt a denominational course, preferring to pursue their individual plans. All things considered, there has been a hearty support. We print now about five thousand copies every week of the Intermediate and Advanced lessons on "The Teaching of Jesus," and the Primary grade is meeting with great favor. The first year on the Old Testament, the second year on "The Life of Jesus," and this third year on "The Teaching of Jesus and the Beginning of Christianity," form not only a valuable course at the time, but put into our permanent stock the bound-up results in the shape of manuals which will surely serve the wants of Sunday-schools for a long time to come. There are many of our Sunday-school workers who continually ask for something new. They ought to remember that pupils are constantly changing in schools, and what is good at one time for a certain age of boys and girls will prove equally valuable for another set coming up in their places. There ought to be judicious action among those who provide text-books for schools, not unduly desiring the new, while wisely discarding the old. We hope to follow up the lessons of this current year with some other courses equally suggestive and valuable.

FINANCES.

Religion, as well as commerce, deals a great deal with money, and depends a great deal upon financial support. We report a satisfactory condition of our treasury, taking the finances of the past years as a criterion. Our work could be expanded beyond measure if we had larger and more numerous donations. We do not think we are exaggerating in saying that there is not another part of denominational affairs so important as that of the Unitarian Sunday School Society. It relates itself with the young people. It seeks to train them and pledge them. It sows the seed for the coming harvest of the liberal faith. The larger we can work in this preparatory stage, the larger will be the results. As it is, the treasurer's report, which is before you, shows that we have received about the same sum of money as last year, which is very encouraging, when we consider what kind of a financial year we have passed through. We make the happy announcement that more Sunday-schools and churches have contributed this year than ever in the history of this organization. This is a forcible evidence of the wider-spread loyalty to our society, and shows a desire on the part of a greater number to work together for our common objects.

We call attention to the opportunity offered to those who wish well to our work of increasing our endowment funds. It will be seen by the treasurer's report that we have already five. Here is a wise way of permanently sustaining this society. Incorporated as we are, there is perfect security in giving such endowments into our charge. With larger resources of this kind, the Sunday School Society would be able to meet the various financial vicissitudes of different years, and go steadily on with its work. Who will be the next friend to increase the list of our endowments?

NEW SONG AND SERVICE BOOK.

A marked event the past year was the publication of a new "Song and Service Book." This had been in careful preparation for some time. The difficulties in the way of such a production are known only to those who have undertaken such a task. We have to consider the varied tastes, circumstances, and past habits of the different Sunday-schools in our denomination. Probably in no other body is there such a varied and marked individual preference for music and hymns. The book was issued in its first edition toward the close of last April, when the Sunday-schools were drawing their year's work to an end. Without any effort on our part, beyond a proper advertising of the book, it has found its way into about eighty Sunday-schools, representing all parts of the country. We are now printing the seven thousandth. It is a book of song and service calculated not only for Sunday-school use, but for guilds, conference meetings, and home needs. It has been especially welcomed by the young people of guilds, who desire a variety of service and music which combines the church psalmody with other music of somewhat lighter and brighter kind. We wish to call attention to our action in putting this book out in attractive form and at a very low price. It will be noticed in the treasurer's report that we have a very small balance on hand. This is as it should be, for the money that is given to us we are expected to use. But the difference between the balance of last year, which was over a thousand dollars, and the balance of this year, which is about three hundred dollars, is accounted for by the publication of this "Song and Service Book." In order to serve the Sunday-schools and join hands with the poorest and weakest, we put this book at a price which not only furnishes no profit, but entails a loss. We sunk $1,200 on the first edition. It will be necessary for us to sell fifteen or twenty thousand copies before we can even get our money back. We merely mention this to prove to you that we are acting in good faith. A song and service book is something which is needed by every school. It enlivens the exercises, attracts the children, and makes everything move on with greater spirit. Therefore, we deemed it wise to put such a universal help at the very lowest possible terms, sacrificing in this, and trying to make ourselves whole in some other way. Meanwhile the former hymnal and service book is printed, and between the two it would seem as though our schools were well equipped in this direction.

CHANNING HALL "TALKS."

These valuable Saturday afternoon addresses by Rev. Mr. Pulsford have become very profitable and popular. They are to be continued this winter. During the past season the Primary was conducted with efficiency by Miss Dockham. It has been deemed wise, since there are so few Primary teachers that can avail themselves of the opportunity, to merge the Primary with the Intermediate and Advanced, all of which are now under Mr. Pulsford's skilful guidance. It is not simply that Boston and

Fascinating Music

"New Harvard Song Book"

The latest collection of college songs published. The best examples obtainable of the distinctly modern college song up to date. 92 pages, 35 songs. Cover in crimson and white.

Heavy Paper, $1.00, Postpaid.

"Good Old Songs"

Thousands sold. A treasure book of over 100 songs which have been loved by several generations. Handsomely bound.

Heavy Paper, $1.00; Boards, $1.25; Cloth, Gilt, $2.00.

"Minstrel Songs—Old and New"

102 songs. The most popular minstrel collection extant.

Heavy Paper, $1.00; Boards, $1.25; Cloth, Gilt, $2.00.

"Choice Sacred Solos"

Vol. 1. 39 songs for soprano and tenor. Vol. 2. 40 songs for alto, baritone, and bass. Made up of the best modern sacred compositions.

Heavy Paper, $1.00; Boards, $1.25; Cloth, Gilt, $2.00.

"College Songs for Girls"

The only collection of the kind published, including the best songs sung in the leading colleges for women. 120 pages.

Heavy Paper, $1.00, Postpaid.

"Moore's Irish Melodies"

New edition of the poet's exquisite songs and lyrics. 142 songs. Also a portrait and memoir of the author, with historical notes. Octavo size.

Heavy Paper, $1.00; Boards, $1.25; Cloth, Gilt, $2.00.

Descriptive circulars of any of the above books sent free on application.

Oliver Ditson Company

453-463 Washington St., Boston

C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

vicinity are served by these talks: the spirit of concentration is illustrated, and helps to shape other communities. The result has been that in various cities similar meetings have been held during the winter. One essential part of a uniform lesson course is to have teachers' meetings or joint gatherings of some kind. Then information is made common to all, and enthusiasm is increased.

OUTLOOK AND APPEAL.

Under no other government is there such a need for complete education as in a republic. Intelligence, uprightness, and justice are the first requisites for a successful democracy. We are recognizing this in ample provisions for industrial and mental training. But it behooves the American people to increase the supply of religious and moral training. Citizenship must draw support from noble sentiments, conscientious motives, and grand ideals. The churches of our denomination are more and more closely relating themselves to the people at large. They are recognizing that they have a vigorous duty to perform. They must not stand simply for Sunday altars and occasional periods of worship. In this awakening to the hour and the opportunity, the Sunday-school interests have a part,—a most important part. We are thankful for the support that has been given to the Unitarian Sunday School Society in the past, and we bespeak for it a still larger attention from the men and women of our denomination. This organization can serve great ends in the next twenty-five years, if given the power to meet the emergencies as they arise. One thing needed is a clearer understanding as to the possibilities of Sunday-school work and its chief object. Phillips Brooks very wisely says: "It is easy to praise and easy to blame that much discussed institution, the Sunday-school. Just now I think the blame inclines to outrun the praise, and no doubt the Sunday-schools have faults enough. But, first of all, we must have some clear standard to judge them by; and that can come only from a clear idea about the nature of religious teaching. If to teach religion is primarily and fundamentally to impart knowledge, the Sunday-schools are a failure. With their limited time, their changing administration, their voluntary attendance, they must be failures. But, if the teaching of religion is the bringing of Christianity to men, then I can see great cause for hope, congratulation, and gratitude in what the Sunday-schools are doing." To apply Bishop Brooks's words, the meaning is that the Sunday-school influence on the pupil consists of a personal element, the associative tie, the power of example, and those various phases of education which are operative on the heart as well as on the mind. In other terms, it is the making of Christian character, and not simply the imparting of detail knowledge.

There is still another appeal which comes home, especially to those in the membership of our denomination, and also to others who are in sympathy with us. What kind of belief do you wish your children to have? Shall it consist of false ideas as to God, duty, and immortality? or will you give your children true, happy views of life and destiny? Whatsoever truth makes life nobler, sorrow and pain better understood, the future brighter, and death less terrible, should be taught and fixed in the young mind. If this liberal faith of ours is of such worth as we claim, and ought to be more widely accepted, then the true way of securing this result is to lodge it permanently in the convictions of the young. You may establish new churches and lavish money on their support in missionary fields; but, if they are lacking in support and membership from the ranks of the young people, there is no hope for their continuance. It is useless to think that the Unitarian denomination can be enlarged by simply appealing to the adults in any community. They are often too fixed in their views to be changed, and do not make always the right material for successful organized work. The only sure and wise way is to begin with the young in our own homes and in missionary fields. Then there is some guarantee of a denominational future.

To these great ends the Unitarian Sunday School Society has constantly devoted its energies. Its manuals have lighted the way for progressive knowledge as to the Bible and theology: its every endeavor has been to equip the Sunday-schools with modern and enlightened methods. According to its ability, it has sought to arouse enthusiasm and loyalty in the young. Now that at the last National Conference at Saratoga a new stand was made for unity and renewed vigor, we feel sure the same zeal and hope will enter into our work. What was pledged at Saratoga cannot be executed without the aid of the young people. What is hoped for in growth, increase of churches, and general prosperity cannot be achieved unless the rising generation are secured on our side. To this end we ask your increased support. Examine our work and judge us on our merits. Infer from what has been performed as to the likelihood of the quality and measure of what we will do if thus more amply aided. We want to have every Unitarian Sunday-school in the land a member of our organization. We crave the time when churches will regularly recognize the importance of our work and provide for it. With the encouragement of the past and the hopes of the future, we offer this account of our stewardship, and enter joyously into the field of another year. Respectfully submitted,

For the directors,
EDWARD A. HORTON,
President.

Literature.

STUDIES IN THEOLOGIC DEFINITION.*

Mr. Palmer is the rector of an Episcopalian church in Andover, Mass., a brother of Prof. Palmer of Harvard University. The little finger of his heresy is thicker than the thigh of the Andover theological professors. His book is another case (sic) of new wine in old bottles. It develops a system of thought of which we are told that the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds are adequate symbols. The α of algebra would be quite as adequate. Mr. Palmer never got his fine meanings out of those ancient symbols until he had first put them into them. The book is brilliantly ingenious, and the same amount of ingenuity could make out a very plausible case for the proverbial constitution of the moon of green cheese. Mr. Palmer's idea of the proper use of creeds is near akin to Mr. Balfour's and Thomas Hill Green's and Dr. E. A. Abbott's. We are justified, he thinks, in holding and proclaiming this or that creed when we believe substantially what its original framers were trying to express by it,—not what the creed says, but what it doesn't say. If Mr. Palmer can once get this idea generally accepted, there should be no more sticking at any of the creeds or confessions. If every man is to be allowed to judge for himself what the creed-makers tried to say and didn't, the latitude thus encouraged would include the most diverse and even opposite opinions. Mr. Palmer has had no difficulty in discovering that the makers of the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds were trying to anticipate his personal theology. If he had tried his hand on the thirty-three articles of the Church of England or the thirty-nine of the Westminster Confession, they might have proved somewhat more intractable; but such confidence have we in Mr. Palmer's ingenuity that we believe he could have convinced himself that those articles were prototypes and shadows of his rational and cheerful faith.

The most liberal and rational thinker will find much in Mr. Palmer's book to agree with and admire. If a Unitarian, he may think the criticism of the traditional Orthodoxy somewhat too stern and harsh. It would grate upon the ears of almost any Unitarian congregation. But, on the positive side, the book abounds in large and helpful thoughts, in just and liberal discriminations. In the chapters on "Salvation" and "Forgiveness" there is very little with which even the radical Unitarian would not find himself in heartiest sympathy. With Mr. Palmer's doctrine of the Trinity he could find little fault, if any; though he might wonder if the older Trinitarians of our time would not "smile a kind of sickly smile" in reading it. With his doctrine of the incarnation it is much the same. The trouble with both of these doctrines and with all the others is that, where Mr. Palmer thinks that he can step across from his pure thought to the specialization of Jesus as set forth in Christian theology, the scientific mind will find an impassable gulf. We cannot conceive that any reader the habit of whose mind is even moderately scientific would allow the validity of Mr. Palmer's passage from his general to his particular theology. It is as purely arbitrary as any process could well be. It is the genial acceptance of a foregone conclusion. Mr. Palmer's personal theology is very far from that of the traditional Orthodoxy. It is as different from it as a pleasant day in June is from a biting day in March. And still the specialization and isolation of Jesus in his scheme are wholly without warrant. There is always at this point a gap in his argument through which you could drive a coach and four.

The trouble with Mr. Palmer's book is that it begins at the far end, and travels by "the high priori road" to its selected goal. So far as this road at any time runs parallel with the New Testament writings, it is with those of the Fourth Gospel,—a trait it has in common with Dr. A. V. G. Allen's "Continuity of Christian Thought," and with the obscurantist expounders of the New Orthodoxy generally. So, beginning, not with the New Testament documents, but with the last attenuation of the traditional theology, and under no bonds to subject itself to the results of critical research, it would be strange if any difficulty were found in arriving at such a specialization of Jesus as we have here, or even at one far more traditional in its character. But to begin at the near end is to begin with the New Testament, to seek the most authentic portions in it and, finding them in the Synoptic Gospels, to understand that even here we have veil behind veil of misconception and idealization disguising the actual lineaments of history, and finally to be convinced that, in what actually transpired, we have an order of events to segregate which from the normal processes of history and human life we have not the least temptation or excuse. But herein is no deduction from the impressive individuality of Jesus or the grand and noble inspirations of his life and death. J. W. C.

SIDE TALKS WITH GIRLS. By Ruth Ashmore. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.—The name of Ruth Ashmore has become well known through the department which she conducts in the Ladies' Home Journal, and these chapters are reprints of articles that have appeared there. There is much good sense in her advice to young girls, and she gives many hints that may be followed with advantage. She writes of social life and duties; but at the same time she does not ignore the country girl and the working-girl, to whom afternoon teas and card etiquette are of less immediate importance than some other things in life. She talks earnestly of common mistakes and faults, of visiting, travelling, and home duties, of friendship, and of love. The chief lack of the book seems to come from a certain timid conventionality. Her strong feeling that a girl needs especial "protection" leads her to pass in silence certain qualities of what seems to many the noblest womanhood. To make this clear, it is only necessary to compare the ethics of the book with such a work as Miss Cobbe's "Duties of Women," with its bracing helpfulness, both morally and intellectually. For instance, Miss Ashmore finds the best proof that "a woman without religion is like a rose without perfume" in the fact that even men of no belief like to have "the women who belong to them" believers. She begs her girls not to become "advanced women," and defines this undesirable class of humanity to suit herself. She condemns women's clubs for "malice and evil-speaking," preferring the time when women met with their fancy-work in the afternoon, and husbands and sons came to the supper afterward. Still, as has been said, there is much good sense in the book; and one of the best chapters is that wherein she addresses the mothers of girls.

SHAKSPEARE'S HEROINES ON THE STAGE. By Charles E. Wingate, author of "The play-goer's Year Book," etc. Illustrated. Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.—The method of Mr. Wingate's book is to take up Shakspeare's heroines one after the other, and, emphasizing the qualities of those actresses that have impersonated them, and of those most popular of late, make briefer mention of the less celebrated. The book resulting is one that will commend itself to the habitual play-goer, and not to many others. Some of the actresses mentioned lend themselves to a lively and gossiping treatment much better than some others. What is purely personal is frequently more interesting than what is critical of the stage performance. Few readers will regret the emphasis upon the modern actresses, which is, no doubt, out of proportion sometimes with their relative importance. Admirers of Ellen Terry and Modjeska will be well contented, if not satisfied, with the admiration they receive. The illustrations, many of which are very interesting, are not a fair presentment of the several actresses. The earlier suffer from the abortive efforts of the painter, the engraver, and the primitive daguerrotypist. But the unfairness is not confined to these. Ellen Terry as "Portia" is as beautiful as one could wish; but what shall we say of Ada Rehan as "Rosalind"? It is an exaggeration of her worst defects. Her "Rosalind" is too rollicking and boydenish, but it is far from being so vulgar as it is represented here.

AN UNLESSONED GIRL. By Elizabeth Knight Tompkins. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.—"Her Majesty" is one of the prettiest of the recent romances, in which a princess figures as the heroine; and, although its scene was laid far from America, yet the author made it quite evident that, if she had chosen to draw a genuine American girl, she could easily have done so. In this second book she has given herself the opportunity; and the result is one that will commend itself to her young readers, and will surely be satisfactory to the girls whom her heroine represents. These maidens are true to the life, unaffected, fun-loving, ambitious, enthusiastic, as American college girls have a right to be, not always doing the right thing, but growing in the right direction. An older reader smiles now and then at the ingenious hints that are given concerning the proper bearing and manners of young women, and it is safe to say that girls will profit by them unconsciously even more than by Miss Ashmore's elaborate directions.

The Strike in the Choir

BY ROBERT J. BURDETTE

How a Western choir quarreled with the minister of the church. Told in Mr. Burdette's most humorous vein in the October issue of

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

10 Cents on all News-stands

The Curtis Publishing Company
Philadelphia

* STUDIES IN THEOLOGIC DEFINITION underlying the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. By Frederic Palmer. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co.

THE SALOON KEEPER'S LEDGER. A Series of Temperance Revival Discourses. By Louis Albert Banks, D.D., Pastor. New York: Funk & Wagnalls.—Rev. Dr. Banks has been studying the book-keeping of intemperance, and in this volume he gives us a trial balance from the saloon-keeper's ledger. The influence of the saloon on disease, immorality, lawlessness, and crime, political corruption, and pauperism, is brought out in a graphic, forcible way. Dr. Banks does not mince matters. He strikes hard, but he has a terrible demon to fight. Rev. Theodore Cuyler, D.D., furnishes a brief introduction.

The Magazines.

"A Singular Life," Elizabeth Stuart Phelps's serial, which has been running in the Atlantic Monthly, closes in the pathetic yet triumphant strain characteristic of the writer. It is well done, and its theme is significant of the present era in social progress. Susan Coolidge contributes an interesting article about the Countess Potocka which will give to many long familiar with her picture more information about the beautiful, ardent, undisciplined original. One of those experiences which stir the blood of the ardent camper or tramp is narrated by Alvan F. Sanborn in "The Wordsworth Country on Two Shillings a Day" although to the lover of summer hotels and summer hops its raptures may well be incomprehensible. Ellen Olney Kirk's "Weather and Weather Wisdom" makes the most of a topic of perennial interest, and is poetic, scientific, reflective, by turns. Altogether, this number of the Atlantic is one that gives genuine satisfaction to the reader who goes to his magazine neither for his history, his politics, nor his scientific information.

Robert Herrick, in his article on "The Chicago University," which opens the October number of Scribner's, dwells less on the phenomenal birth and growth and the material side of it than on other aspects no less important, perhaps. An institution that never closes its doors, where matriculation and graduation may take place four times a year, where a student may spend six months of the year in bread-winning and six in full academic residence, or where he may earn his bachelor's degree by three years' continuous work, without increasing the strain at any one point, has many points of difference from the universities with whose methods most readers are familiar. There are other interesting points studied, as the success of the absolutely sexless education offered, the causes of the fact that student government is one of the least perplexing problems, and the possibility here demonstrated of understanding the individual work and needs of each student. The present interest in posters is recognized in an article by H. C. Bunner. Lloyd Osbourne describes "Mr. Stevenson's Home Life at Vailima," N. S. Shaler writes of "Domesticated Birds," and Mr. Smalley gives us bits of description and gossip about Huxley, different from the earlier articles that have been appearing since his death.

Literary Notes.

Miss Bouvet has written another of those tales that fairly entitle her to a good place in the list of writers for the young. Last year she brought from France the love story of "My Lady." Now she is home from Italy with a little romance that she calls "A Child of Tuscany." The publishers are McClurg & Co., Chicago.

In the Writer (Boston) for October the series of "Editorial Talks with Contributors," which was begun in the September number by the superintending editor of the Independent, is continued by Robert E. Bonner of the New York Ledger, who tells what the Ledger wants and does not want in the way of manuscripts. This series of articles will be continued monthly in the Writer.

Mrs. Molesworth's annual story for children, published by Macmillan & Co., is called "The Carved Lions." A. C. Swinburne wrote in the Nineteenth Century in regard to children's writers, "Since the death of George Eliot there is none left whose touch is so exquisite and masterly, whose love is so thoroughly according to knowledge, whose bright and sweet invention is so fruitful or so delightful as Mrs. Molesworth's."

Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Co. are taking their time in bringing out their beautiful edition of the Baroness Tautpoeus's novels. They are appearing at yearly intervals. First we had "The Initials" and then "Quits," and now "At Odds" follows in due course. It is not so famous as the others; but it is a very charming novel, much better worth reading than many novels that are now appearing for the first time, and will soon be hidden in "death's dateless night." But no novel could be so excellent that it would not win a fresh attraction from such agreeable externals as we have here.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From the American Unitarian Association, Boston. Hymns for Church and Home. With Tunes. From Geo. H. Ellis, Boston.

The Postulates of Revelation and of Ethics. By Thomas Hill, D.D., LL.D. Price $1.50. From Leach, Shewell & Sanborn, Boston.

The Lives of Cornelius Nepos. Edited with Notes and an Introduction on the Rapid Reading of Latin and the Art of Translation. By Isaac Flagg. Fifty Selections from Valerius Maximus. Edited with Notes and an Introduction by Charles Sidney Smith, A.M. Paper covers. From Little & Co., Boston.

Littell's Living Age. Sixth Series. Vol. VII. From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.

The Tower. With Legends and Lyrics. By Emma Huntington Nason. The Complete Poetic and Dramatic Works of Robert Browning. Cambridge Edition. Price $3.00. A Singular Life. By Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. Price $1.25.

The Life of Nancy. By Sarah Orne Jewett. Price $1.25. From John B. Alden, New York. Substantial Christian Philosophy, or True Science in Harmony with Nature, Man, and Revelation. Specially designed for Young People. Compiled by William Kent, M.D.

From Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York. Half a Dozen Boys. An Every-day Story. By Anna Chapin Ray. Price $1.50. The Little Marchioness. The Story of a Child's Faith and Love. With an Introduction by Bishop Gailor. Illustrated by W. L. Taylor. Price $1.00.

From Harper & Brothers, New York. Other Times and Other Seasons. By Laurence Hutton. The Return of the Native. By Thomas Hardy. With an Etching by H. Macbeth-Raeburn. Against Human Nature. A novel. By Maria Louise Pool. A Life of Christ. For Young People. In Questions and Answers. By Mary Hastings Foote.

From Henry Holt & Co., New York. Lady Bonnie's Experiment. By Tighe Hopkins. From Macmillan & Co., New York. College Sermons. By the late Benjamin Jowett, M.A. Edited by the Very Rev. The Hon. W. H. Fremantle, M.A. Price $2.00.

The Wonderful Visit. By H. G. Wells, author of "The Time Machine." Price $1.25. The Long Vacation. By Charlotte M. Yonge. Price $1.00. Wild Rose. A Tale of the Mexican Frontier. By Francis Francis. Price $1.00. Red Rowans. By Mrs. F. A. Steel. Price $1.00. Where Highways cross. By J. S. Fletcher. Price 75 cents. The Last of the Vikings. A Book for Boys. By Capt. Charles Young. Price $1.50.

From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Dissertations on Subjects connected with the Incarnation. By Charles Gore, M.A. Price $2.50. Two Little Pilgrims' Progress. A Story of the City Beautiful. By Frances Hodgson Burnett. Price $1.50.

The Reflections of a Married Man. By Robert Grant. 2 vols. Price $2.50. The Garden behind the Moon. A Real Story of the Moon. Angel. Written and illustrated by Howard Pyle. Price $2.00. The Opinions of a Philosopher. By Robert Grant. From Charles H. Kerr & Co., Chicago. The Hand of Fate. A Romance of the Navy. By Kate Lilly Blue. Price $1.00.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. Egyptian March. Caprice. For the Pianoforte. By Charles Becker. Gondellied. For Pianoforte. By Mrs. Henry Carmichael. A Dream of Spring. Song. Words from the German of Wilhelm Müller. Music by Robert Atkinson. Ever the Same. Song. Words and music by A. N. Cosner. A Shepherd told a Story. Song. Words by A. B. Van Fleet. Music by Percy Mack Marston. Little Duchess. Gavotte. By Rudolph Aronson. Four-leaf Clovers. Song. Music by Hubert A. Baker. Remembrance. Serenade for Pianoforte. By Mrs. Henry Carmichael.

From Wm. A. Pond & Co., New York. The Rose of Coleraine. Words by Mrs. D. Cunningham. Music by W. C. Parker. "O Jesu, thou art Standing." Sacred Song. By William Reed. A Night Song. With Violin Obligato. Composed by Louis Lounhard. Fear not Ye. Sacred Solo for Soprano or Tenor. Composed by H. E. Parkhurst. I love These So. Words and music by Augusta Preston Bedell. Valse Styrienne. For the Pianoforte. By H. A. Wollenhaupt. "Liza's my Sweetness." Words and music by Charles Harvey. "A Southern Lullaby." Song. Words and music by Maribel Seymour. Cyclist's Polka. For Pianoforte. By Jessie Zern O'Donald. Murmuring Brook. Words by P. A. H. Music by Ella C. Howard. "Hold the Wire, Kitty." Words and music by Charles Harvey. Old Glory, there is Good Enough for me. Words by William S. Batam. Music by Gen. E. R. C. King. Juba. Negro Dance. By George William Warren. Church Music. Magnificat in B-flat. By W. C. Williams. Nunc Dimittis in B-flat. By W. C. Williams. Richard and Dorothy. By G. R. Nevin. "The Mellow Eve is gliding." Sacred Part-song for Men's Voices. By Albert J. Holden. The Jolly Miller. Male Voices. By R. H. Atkinson.

The Sunday School's Best Illustrator !!

What is? A lantern that will give a sharply defined picture from 10 to 20 feet in diameter specially illustrating the lessons. No argument is needed to prove that the Stereopticon is the most valuable illustrator in the world. Complete outfit from $50 upwards. No poor cheap lanterns sold.

Write for particulars. Installment plan. Slides rented. Large catalogue 20 cents.

RILEY BROTHERS, New York.

Branches: 16 Beekman St., New York. BOSTON 244 Washington St. CHICAGO 196 La Salle St. KANSAS CITY (Mo.) 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND 411 Couch St.

WANTED 5000 MORE BOOK AGENTS men and women, for the fastest selling book of the times DARKNESS & DAYLIGHT in NEW YORK With 250 new illustrations from flash-light photographs. Introduction By Rev. Lyman Abbott. A Christian woman's thrilling story of years of rescue work "In His Name," alive with intense interest, touching pathos, humor and glory. Most splendidly illustrated. 86th thousand in press. Bishops, Ministers, etc., say "God speed it." Eminent women endorse it. It sells at sight, and pays Agents from $5.00 to $100.00 a month. We Pay Freight to all points, Give Credit, Extra Terms, Premium Copies, and Free Outfit. Write for terms and specimen engravings to HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Conn.

tall back available for luxurious reclining. The wings were borrowed from the fireplace Comfort chair of the same period.

As we make them, the height from the floor is here a little over four feet. The only part of the wood which shows is the facing of the wings; and here the dark rich color of mahogany lends age and dignity to the design.

The covering is a flowered chintz or cretonne, but any other covering may be employed. So successful is this design that we have completed an entire set on the same lines, and we now offer the sofa with one side chair and one fireplace chair at a very low price.

PAINE FURNITURE CO., 48 CANAL STREET.

Just Out.

A HISTORY OF GREECE.

For High Schools and Colleges. By PHILIP VAN NESS MYERS, L.H.D., Professor of History and Political Economy in the University of Cincinnati, author of "A History of Rome," "Mediaeval and Modern History," and "A General History." 12mo. Cloth. 577 pages. Illustrated. $1.40.

This book is designed for use in colleges as well as with advanced classes in high schools and seminaries. The aim of the author has been to bring into prominence the vital and permanent elements of Greek history.

There are special chapters devoted to art, literature, philosophy, and the social life of the ancient Greeks. Besides a full bibliography at the end of the book, each chapter is followed by references to parallel readings, while numerous foot-notes direct the student to the original authorities. The book is abundantly furnished with colored and sketch maps, and is illustrated with numerous cuts.

A copy of this book sent postpaid to any address on receipt of price. Send for our High School and College Catalogue.

GINN & CO., Publishers, BOSTON, NEW YORK, CHICAGO.

Just Published.

The Postulates of Revelation and of Ethics.

BY

THOMAS HILL, D.D., LL.D.

Contents:

PART I. POSTULATES OF REVELATION.—I. The Unseen Real; II. The Reality of Knowledge; III. The Infinite Knowable; IV. Final Causes; V. The Universe a Work of Art; VI. Power and Possibility; VII. Logic and Love; VIII. Beauty; IX. The Testimony of Conscience; X. The Infinite in Man; XI. Relativity and Reality; XII. The Universe a Revelation; XIII. Authority and Inspiration; XIV. Summary of Natural Sources of Religious Knowledge.

PART II. POSTULATES OF ETHICS.—I. The Field of Ethics; II. The Validity of Moral Perceptions; III. The Nature of Ethical Relations; IV. The Innocence and Sinfulness of Error; V. Love and Duty; VI. Determinism and Utility; VII. Duties Relative to Self; VIII. The Connection of Ethics with Religion; IX. Non-religious Morals and Moralists; X. Learning by Doing.

394 pages, with portrait, price $1.50.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Kindling Thoughts. By ELIZABETH P. CHANNING. 315 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

Contains fifty-seven brief essays, such as Deu upon the heart; The angel in the shadow; A disappointed life; Plain living and high thinking; The spiritual tangle; The charm of the old; Accepting ourselves as we are; etc., etc. It is a long time since anything so brightly refreshing as these Kindling Thoughts has come to us. They are full of that best cheer which comes from the deepest, clearest springs of faith.—Unitarian.

Colonial Sofa.

There is no more delightful piece of Colonial furniture in existence than the old high-back winged sofa, which may always be seen in any Colonial collection, and which is as picturesque as it is comfortable.

The fashion was the natural outgrowth from the fireplace settle of the seventeenth century, but the seat was deepened in order to make the tail back available for luxurious reclining. The wings were borrowed from the fireplace

Comfort chair of the same period.

PAINE FURNITURE CO., 48 CANAL STREET.

Now Ready.

HYMNS

FOR

CHURCH AND HOME WITH TUNES.

The Hymns edited by Mrs. MARY W. TILESTON.

The Tunes edited by Mr. ARTHUR FOOTE.

As stated in the preface, "In this collection endeavor has been made to provide an ample number of hymns of thankfulness, joy, and hope, and of active service," and, in the music, "to include, so far as possible, old tunes, whose associations or musical value warrant their retention; and, when a new or unfamiliar tune is given, a more familiar one of the same metre has, if practicable, been put on the opposite page. There will be found a number of English tunes, which, although new to most of our congregations, have been tested by years of use in other branches of the Christian Church."

The book is a square 8vo, of 512 pages, contains 801 hymns, and is handsomely and substantially bound in morocco.

Price, $1.50, with a discount of 20 per cent. to societies introducing the book and to clergymen, to whom a copy will be sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1.20.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "A Year of Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."

"In 'The House Beautiful,' Rev. Wm. C. Gannett describes, with a rare combination of good sense and poetic insight, the essentials of a beautiful home, giving to flowers, books, and guests, for instance, their due place in its furnishing, while love is the bond that binds all together in gracious influence."—Literary World.

"It is on the side of sincerity, quietness, and simplicity. Meets with our entire approval."—The Critic.

"Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on 'The dear Togetherness' is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. Our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and, if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so."—The New Unity.

Sent postpaid on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,

174 High Street, - - - Boston.

Hymnal.

AMORE DEI.

This Hymnal is steadily making its way into use in a large number of churches, and in all cases gives satisfaction.

If considering a new book, send for sample copies, which will be sent subject to return, if not adopted.

PRICES:

Cloth, 90 cents; Leather, $1.35.

By the dozen, per copy,

Cloth, 75 cents; Leather, $1.10.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston,

The Home.

For the Christian Register.
WEATHERCOCK.

BY HENRIETTA R. ELIOT.

Watch as your baby grows, and you will see
That his whole life, wherever he may be,
Is a perpetual mimicry.

An engine now, he puffs with all his might;
Anon, with brows perplexed, he feigns to write;
Or strides his chair, a mounted knight.

Brimming with life, but knowing not as yet
Even the letters of its alphabet,
He imitates each pattern set.

And, watching him, perchance you question why
Each new activity that meets his eye
Excites him his own skill to try?

His is an instinct ignorantly wise!
Only in doing can he real-ize
The thing that's done beneath his eyes.

A stranger 'midst the surging life of men,
He to his own life-stature shall attain
By taking—to give back again.

For the Christian Register.
RAY'S BIRTHDAY.

BY ANNIE ROGERS.

Mrs. Howard sat by her chamber window that looked out upon the sea. The sunshine, sparkling on the waters, made her think of the light that often danced in the big blue eyes of her little boy who lay asleep in the next room. As she thought of Ray, she sighed. A stranger, looking in upon him as he slept, his golden curls tossed out over the pillow, his eyes closed so that their brown lashes swept his rosy, dimpled cheek, might have wondered why Mrs. Howard sighed when she thought of him. She knew that beneath the clothes, which covered a body scarcely larger than that of a five-year-old boy, was hidden a poor, misformed little leg that would make Ray a cripple for life. He could walk, to be sure, but it was always with a pitiful limp that made his mother's heart ache. Nor was this all that Mrs. Howard thought of when she sighed. Ray was, to-day, despite his size, which seemed to contradict the fact, seven years old. She knew he would not expect any present she might long to give him. Baby though he was, he understood that all mother's money had been spent to obtain for her this visit to the seaside, which the doctor had told her was positively essential to her health. Yet Mrs. Howard, in her mother love, would have been glad to let her health suffer for Ray's enjoyment, except that upon her untiring labor depended his welfare. So she looked over the sea, thought of her boy, and sighed.

Very soon, however, a clear, sweet voice said,—

"Mamma, are you there?"

Mrs. Howard went into the adjoining room, and found Ray busily at work putting on his shoes and stockings.

As she entered, he stopped, pushed the curls from his face, and said eagerly,—

"Mamma, it's my birthday, isn't it?"

"Yes," she replied, kissing him seven times.

"Mamma, what are birthdays for? I think," after a pause, "they're meant for you to do something for somebody, aren't they?"

Surprised and pleased at this unselfish interpretation of the meaning of a birthday, Mrs. Howard sat silent a moment, till Ray said wistfully:—

"Isn't that right, mamma? Have I made you feel bad?"

For answer his mother took him in her arms. Tears stood in her eyes as she replied:—

"No, no, darling. You are quite right. It pleases mother very much to have you think of it."

Quite happy again, Ray continued his dressing, chatting merrily about the flowers, the waves, and the sunshine, till Mrs. Howard forgot his momentary seriousness, and thought it one of his many passing moods.

Immediately after breakfast Ray put on his hat and started outdoors. He told no one his errand; but, as he never wandered far alone, Mrs. Howard felt no uneasiness. After an hour had passed, however, she began to wonder at his long absence. She stepped to the door to look for him, and was surprised to see what at first sight seemed like a great bouquet of golden-rod and asters coming straight toward her. At last she saw that a pair of little hands were clasped in front of this strange bouquet, and two little feet appeared beneath it. Above showed a head whose shining curls were scarcely less bright than the golden-rod.

It was indeed Ray, who panted up to the steps, and threw the bright-colored heap on the piazza.

"Haven't I done well?" he said, stepping back proudly to survey his treasures, and putting up his hand just in time to catch the hat that was falling off the back of his head.

"I picked 'em all myself; and now I'm going to take 'em to her, can't I?"

"Take them to whom?" his mother said, bewildered by this sudden announcement.

"Why, to the poor sick lady. Don't you think she'd like 'em? It was the only thing I could think of," apologetically; "but it's rather nice. Don't you think so?"

It took Ray several minutes to make his mother understand that there was an invalid (Ray called her "sick lady") a few houses away for whom he had picked the flowers. As he had said, this was the only way he could think of for carrying out his idea of what should be done on a birthday. As soon as Mrs. Howard learned his plan, she gave him permission to do as he wished. Though she was not acquainted with the "sick lady," she felt sure Ray, with his sweet offering, would not be unwelcome to her. As it chanced, Ray found the invalid sitting on her piazza. She was by no means as ill as Ray had believed her to be, though she was not able to take much violent exercise. Mrs. Howard was right in supposing Ray's offering would not be misunderstood. Though it took the "sick lady" some time to gather, from Ray's quaint remarks, just what he had in mind, she found out at last. When she learned it was his own idea, she appreciated the sweet unselfishness of the action, and became so much interested in the little lame boy that she kept him talking to her till nearly lunch-time.

Nor was that all. While Ray was repeating to his mother, in an eager, breathless way, all the lovely things his "sick lady" had said to him, a fine barouche drove up to the door of the cottage, and the "sick lady" herself called Mrs. Howard to the carriage.

They talked for several minutes. A little later Ray could hardly believe his senses; for he found himself dressed in his best suit of clothes, and sitting beside the "sick lady" in her beautiful barouche, while two black horses, driven by a black coachman, drew them rapidly along over the smooth, hard road.

What a glorious drive that was! How Ray enjoyed the little supper he and his "sick lady" ate together under some trees at a short distance from the water, just where they could hear the splash of the waves. And then there was the long ride home again, during which Ray counted the fireflies that glimmered now and then among the trees by the roadside.

And, after it was all over, and he had told his mother about "the loveliest birthday he ever had," he fell asleep to dream of fireflies who ate luncheon with him and black horses who seemed to be talking to him about a wonderful fairy he called his "sick lady."

That evening, as Mrs. Howard looked out over the sea, where the moonlight was just beginning to tinge the waves with silver, she no longer sighed, but smiled.

A DAY AT AUNT HARRIET'S.

"Children, come here."

"Children" meant my cousin Polly, who was visiting us, and myself. We both ran at the sound of mother's voice.

"Do you want to go on an errand up to Aunt Harriet's?"

"Yes'm."

"No'm."

"Yes'm. Let's, Emily."

"I don't like to go there," I grumbled. "You wouldn't, Polly, if you lived as near Aunt Harriet as I do."

"Emily," said my mother, in a reproving tone. "Your Aunt Harriet is a very good, kind woman; and I am surprised to hear you talk so."

"Well, I'll go if Polly wants to."

"And do you want to stay all day?" asked mother. "Because, if you do, I will say so in the note I am writing to Aunt Harriet."

"Yes," again said Polly.

"I wonder if the pony is there yet," I said.

"I think he is. Your aunt wishes to sell him, but I hadn't heard of her doing so yet."

"I think it's real mean of her to sell him," I whimpered. "I think she ought to keep him for us children when we go there."

"Aunt Harriet needs the money she would get for the pony," said mother. "Now take this basket, and don't loiter too long on the way."

It was late in the morning when we reached Aunt Harriet's. Hulda, the maid, always greeted me with a smile; Aunt Harriet, always with a look as if she was wondering what I might do before I left for home. As I watched her read the note from mother, I thought I fancied a little cloud coming over her face, and felt sure it was because we were to spend the day. This was a mistake, as I learned afterward. Mother had told her of the death of an old friend. But I jumped to my silly conclusion at once, and my heart was filled with a spirit of opposition to Aunt Harriet.

"I don't care if she don't want us. I don't care whether I am a good girl or not."

I felt it as Aunt Harriet explained that she had been very busy in the hot kitchen all the morning, and was now going to take a little rest. She told Hulda to bring us some cool milk and gingerbread, and told us to amuse ourselves in any way we liked.

"The pony is out in the meadow," she said. "I suppose you will like to ride him. You will have to be contented with riding, for the cart is broken."

"Oh, dear! I wanted to drive," I said.

"Too bad, dear."

We rode the gentle little creature, taking turns, until we were tired of it. "I do wish we had the cart," I said. "It's a great deal more fun when we can ride together. I'm going to see how it is broken. I know just where they keep it."

We went to the carriage-house.

"It looks all right to me," I said. See, Polly, I'm sure it would do just to ride 'round the meadow. We won't go out in the road. Here's the harness. I've hitched Bob up lots of times."

"I don't believe we'd better," said Polly, doubtfully.

"It won't do a bit of harm. See, the cart runs just right."

I drew it out, and we soon had Bob harnessed to it. We climbed into the cart, and turned it into the meadow. "Now isn't this nice?" I began. "Didn't I tell you, Polly?"

Polly never disputed me; for at this moment she gave a scream, in which I joined. The cart went over, throwing us both out. Bob, good little fellow that he was, made no fuss, but stood quietly, only looking round as if to ask, "What are you girls up to now?"

Hulda heard us, and came out.

"Oh, I hope Aunt Harriet hasn't heard, Hulda," I sobbed, as she took us in and bathed our bumped heads. She had not, and before long Polly and I were looking for some new amusement. Very soon we found it. Wandering around the house, we came upon a little shelf outside a window in the woodshed.

"Oh, Polly! look there!" I exclaimed.

"Blackberry jelly! Doesn't the sun shine through it beautifully?"

"I should think Aunt Harriet might have given us a little," I said, trying hard to build up a reason why we should help ourselves. I stole into the kitchen, and got a spoon. Then I stood on a peck measure, so that I could reach the jelly; and we took spoonfuls turn about.

"That's enough," said Polly, at length.

"No," I said, "we must even them all down."

"Now let's go," urged Polly.

"Wait," I said. "There's just one more. We must take some out of that, or they'll surely know."

I leaned over toward the back of the shelf. I pushed against it; and—crash! Down it went; and the jelly, mixed with broken glass, lay on the ground. Aunt Harriet heard this time. She and Hulda came out to gaze with dismay at the wreck. Hulda scolded.

Aunt Harriet did not scold. She looked at us two naughty, woe-begone little culprits, splashed with jelly from head to foot, in sore perplexity.

"There's only one thing to do, Hulda," she presently said. "You must put their dresses right into a tub of water. This hot sun will dry them in an hour, and then you must iron them. I'll go and make some starch."

Three hours later, as, very meek and subdued, we were ready for our walk home, Aunt Harriet gave me the basket, saying:—

"Here are a few fresh eggs and a note for your mother." The mention of the note sent a chill to my heart.

"Polly," I said, as we walked home, "I know it's to tell mother how naughty we've been."

"I s'pose so," said Polly, with a sigh.

"Say, Polly,—s'pose we don't give it to her."

"Oh! but we ought to," said Polly, a little startled at the idea. We talked about it nearly all the way; and the end of it was, as we crossed the bridge over the creek, I held it high over the water, and let it fall. A moment later I said,—

"I wish I hadn't."

"We can get it again."

"But it would be all wet. That would be just as bad."

"Why, dears, how nicely you have kept yourselves!" said mother, as we went in in our clean dresses. I'm sure you've been good girls."

We were both so quiet and said so little that mother, thinking we must be tired, sent us to bed early. And there I had to face the full ugliness of my ill-doing. I didn't mind much about anything except the deception; but, with every moment in which I restlessly tossed, it grew darker and darker to me. Mother trusted me, Aunt Harriet trusted me. I bore my burden of unconfessed wrong-doing for two weeks, and then carried it to my mother.

"I know what you'll say," I said. "I must go and tell Aunt Harriet."

"You can't do that for a while," said mother. "She has been sent for to go down to Virginia to a sick sister, and must not be bothered now. O my little girl, I hope you will think well before you again do a thing which you may be tempted to conceal. A concealment means a lie, for it is a covering of the truth. We will wait until you can tell her yourself."

I expected Aunt Harriet to look dignified and severe when I told her about the note. But she did not. She looked only earnest and grave and kind, as she said:—

"We all of us do wrong, dear child; but it is not all of us who have the courage to confess our misdoings, even to our God. Don't ever forget that that is the sure and the only way to atone for a sin. Let me see," she added, after a moment of thought. "What did I write in the note? Oh, it was to tell your mother that I couldn't sell the pony till the fall, and that, if she wished, I would let you little girls have him through the summer. If I did not hear from her the next day, I should conclude that your father did not want him about, so I would let Robbie Hays have him, which I did."

Ever since I have had an ache at my heart thinking how Polly and I would have enjoyed the pony that summer.—Sidney Dayre, in the Interior.

Sunlight

Soap

is made in a twin bar (as shown above) for the sake of convenience; it is made of pure materials for the sake of quality; it is made by our peculiar processes for the sake of effectiveness (doing its work easily); it is made at the largest soap works in the world for the sake of supplying the largest demand in the world; it is used everywhere for the sake of

Less Labor
Greater Comfort

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N.Y.

GRANDMA'S PLAYMATES.

Mina stood by the window looking out upon the snowy street, "just fine for coasting," wondering how it happened that there was always a reason why she should stay at home when she wished most to go to some place. She was quite sure that she did not have "the least bit of a cold." All of her classmates were going coasting that afternoon, and Mina knew what a splendid time they would have; but mamma had said "No" so firmly that Mina knew it was of no use to tease.

Grandma and Jessie, Mina's little sister, sat by the fire roasting chestnuts, and making a "cat's cradle" out of string. They paid no attention to Mina until she came and stood by grandma's chair.

"Let's play something, Mina," said Jessie, who was always happy and cheerful.

"I don't want to play," answered Mina, very crossly; for she was still thinking of the coasting party.

"When I was your age, dear, I would have been glad to have any one to play with me," said grandma, gently, as she drew Mina up on the arm of the chair.

"What did you do when you were a little girl, grandma?" asked Jessie. "Didn't you have any little brothers or sisters or next-door folks to play with you?"

"No, not one," answered grandma. "The only playmates I had were a huge shepherd dog that I called 'Dan' and a tame fawn."

"Tell us about them, grandma," said Mina, who had nearly forgotten about the coasting party.

"Well," continued grandma, "when I was only eight years old, my father moved West to search for gold; but my mother died in less than two years, and I had to take care of myself most of the time as best I could.

"We lived in a rudely built cabin half way up the side of a high mountain, and our nearest neighbors were more than two miles away. Dan and I kept house; and, when our work was finished, we played the games which I taught him, and sometimes went to the mine. Dan could play hide-and-seek, and could jump rope almost as well as I.

"The mine was only a short distance from our cabin; and, when it was pleasant weather, Dan and I always took father's dinner to him. Dan persisted in carrying the bucket, and he was always careful not to drop it or shake it.

"One evening in early winter father came home, bringing a little fawn which had been wounded by hunters and then lost from the herd. We made a bed of dry leaves for it in a shed near the house. For a long time it would not eat anything; but at last it grew more tame, and would eat bread crumbs out of my hand.

"I thought a great deal of the pretty little thing, and it grew more playful and tame every day; but it was a long time before Dan and the fawn became friends.

"When at last the fawn was able to walk, father built a fence around the shed, so that it might come out and play in the sunshine. Dan would lie by the door, and watch it; but he never ventured to join in its frolics.

"I kept it all winter; and by spring it was so gentle that I could let it run loose, and it would always come home in the evening. By the close of summer Dan and the fawn had become warm friends. They would play together for hours; but, if Dan became too rough, the fawn would come to me for protection, or, if Dan got too hard a blow, he would come whining, and lay his head in my lap.

"One afternoon early in November the sky began to look dark, and the wind commenced to blow terribly; and in less than an hour the snow was falling so thick and fast we could not see a dozen yards from the house. The fawn had gone away in the morning, and had not returned. Dan could not be still: he would lie down by the fire, and then go to the door and bark to get out, until I had to let him go. But he would not go without me. When he found that I was not coming, he came back. So I put on my cloak and hat, and followed him. He went down the mountain path, and then started across a very dangerous piece of ground where the rocks were loose and there were many deep holes. I followed Dan as faithfully as I could, until at last he stopped by one of the holes, and began to bark. I leaned over the hole; and, not far below, I could hear the cry of the lost fawn.

"I could not help it out, so I returned home; but Dan would not go. By this time father was at home, and we carried a rope and ladder to the place where the fawn was imprisoned. Father placed the ladder down in the hole, which happened not to be very deep; and, fastening the rope about its body, he drew the little frightened thing to the top.

"It soon recovered from its few injuries; but, at daybreak one beautiful spring morning, father saw a herd of deer on the opposite side of the valley, and, when I went to look for my fawn, it was gone. I never saw my little playmate again."

"But what became of Dan, grandma?" asked Jessie.

"Dan died of old age, and we buried him on the mountain-side. Those were the only playmates I ever had," said grandma, as she arose to put away her knitting.—Ella Mayhew, in the Outlook.

SNOWBALLS AND ORANGES.

It had rained and rained. The skies were dull and dark. The streets were like rivers.

Lou and Clara stood at the window, scowling. They complained of the weather. They found fault because the mountains were hidden. They did not know what a wonderful treat was being made ready for them behind that gray cloud curtain.

Like many other children whose homes were among the orange groves in the valley, Lou and Clara had always lived in Southern California; and the only snow they had ever seen was that which in winter capped the far-away peaks.

So, when they awoke the next morning, and saw the great mountains, the foothills, and even the near mesa covered with snow, the sight almost took away their breath.

When Lou and Clara ran downstairs, they found that papa and mamma had planned to make the most of the snow.

"We will take the first car," said papa, "and go up the avenue; and you shall see what snow is like."

Papa seemed almost as pleased as the children. He remembered how he used to play in the snow when he was a boy, and he had been so many years away from it.

Lou and Clara were in a hurry to be off. They could scarcely eat any breakfast.

"What if we should miss the car?" they kept saying. "Or what if the snow should melt before we could get to it?"

It seemed as if the snow might melt very fast, the sunshine was so bright and warm; but they did not run any risk of missing the car, for they were out by the track fully fifteen minutes before it was time for it to come along.

A lady and two children came from a house near by, and joined the little group; and they talked together as people do in this country, although they did not know each other. Lou and Clara soon became acquainted with the two children, whose names were Bertha and Ralph; and they all had a nice time.

The strangers had just come from the East. Bertha and Ralph had never seen orange groves before; and they looked in wonder at the stocky trees, bent down with the weight of the big, bright fruit.

The ride up the avenue seemed long to the children, who were in a hurry to reach the snow; but it seemed too short to the little strangers, there was so much to be seen along the way.

"O Ralph, look!" cried Bertha. "Oranges on the ground!" And she pointed to a few windfalls under a tree.

"Oranges on the ground!" echoed little Ralph; and he leaned out of the car window, and looked at them as long as they were in sight.

Lou and Clara leaned from the windows, too; but they did not look at the orange and lemon orchards, nor at the roses blooming in the door-yards. They looked ahead at the snow on the mountains, and they said:—

"Oh, isn't it lovely! Isn't it lovely!"

When they reached the head of the avenue, the children saw that the ground was white; and they fairly tumbled over each other in their haste to get out of the car. There were several who, like Lou and Clara, had never seen the snow, and others who had not seen any for a long time. Then there were those who had just come from a cold country, and to them the sight of the snow brought back thoughts of home.

They stayed on the mesa an hour; and I can't begin to tell you how much fun they had, playing in the snow, snow-balling, and washing each other's faces. When they were on their way back to the car, a man who was picking oranges from some trees near by called to them.

"Here are some oranges to go with your snowballs," he said, and tossed each one an orange over the hedge. So every child carried an orange and a snowball into the car.

The Eastern children soon threw away their snowballs, and began to eat the oranges; but the little Californians left their oranges lying in a corner of the seat, and they sucked the cold white balls, and smacked their lips, and cried,—

"How good snow is!"—Mary Elizabeth Stone, in Youth's Companion.

AN ORDER OF MERIT.

A society in France for the prevention of cruelty to animals has founded an order of merit, insignia of which are bestowed on dogs who distinguish themselves by deeds of bravery. A tastefully designed collar of honor is awarded. Among the animals decorated, one of the most celebrated is Bacchus, a large bull-dog, whose specialty is to stop runaway horses by jumping up and seizing them by the bridle. It is said that the intelligent beast has already saved the lives of eight persons in this way. Pataud, another bull-dog, received a collar in 1887 for saving his mistress from the attack of a foot-pad; and Turk, a splendid Newfoundland, has had a similar honor conferred on him for saving three young children from drowning, on as many occasions. Southern Presbyterian.

Coughs,

* Consumption.

The greatest cause of terror of the present day, formerly considered hopeless, is now conceded by the best physicians as curable under proper conditions. Its cause—a depleted condition of the system; a mal-assimilation of food; a wasting away of the tissues; an impoverishment of the blood. The result—a diseased condition of all the organs of the body; a formation of eating ulcers; and the result death from collapse or hemorrhage. But the cure is that greatest concentration into the least possible bulk of the vital elements of lean, raw beef. It is absorbed and nourishes with the least possible effort on the part of the stomach. It creates new tissue, enriches the blood, makes flesh, and by strengthening the great vital centres of the body enables them to perform their functions in a natural manner, and dispel disease. Thousands owe their life to its use.

Bovinine

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

"WHERE DIRT GATHERS, WASTE RULES."
GREAT SAVING RESULTS FROM THE USE OF

SAPOLIO

ASK Your Grocer for

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

Two Mince Pies, equal to our Grandmother's, from each package of None-Such Mince Meat, without the worry and work. For sale by all Grocers.

MERRELL-SOULE CO.,
Syracuse, N. Y.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

A WINTER IN CALIFORNIA.

Parties will leave Boston in Elegant Trains of Palace Vestibuled Sleeping and Dining Cars, Tuesdays, October 22, November 19, and December 10 for Los Angeles, San Diego, etc., by way of Chicago, Kansas City, and Santa Fe. The tickets cover every expense of travel both ways, and give the holder entire freedom on the Pacific Coast. They may be used returning on Any Regular Train until July, 1896, or with Parties under personal escort, with Choice of Three Different Routes.

Tours to Atlanta Oct. 8, 14, 16, 22, 28, and 30; Nov. 5, 11, 13, 19, 25, and 27; and Dec. 3, 9, 11, and 17. Additional California Tours, Jan. 7, Feb. 11, and Mar. 3, via New Orleans, and Jan. 23, Feb. 13, and Mar. 5, via Chicago, Kansas City, and Santa Fe.

Tours to Mexico January 23 and February 13.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines; also Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular trip desired.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,

296 Washington Street (opposite School St.), Boston.

COOK'S TOURS. ESTABLISHED 1841. HOLYLAND TOURS.

All Travelling Expenses Included.

Parties under Personal Escort will leave New York, Nov. 6 per S.S. Augusta Victoria. A Special Tour spending Christmas at Jerusalem and Bethlehem. Jan. 8 per S.S. Normania; Jan. 22 per S.S. Kaiser Wilhelm II.; Feb. 12 per S.S. Fulda; Feb. 19 per S.S. Normania; Feb. 29 per S.S. Verra.

Fares range from $675 to $1,225. Illustrated descriptive pamphlet free on application.

COOK'S NILE STEAMERS

will leave Cairo
Rameses III.....Nov. 12 | Rameses III.....Dec. 10
Rameses Great.....Nov. 26 | Rameses Great.....Dec. 24
and weekly thereafter.

Dahabeahs and Special Steamers for private parties.

Programme of European Tours. Season 1896 on application.

THOS. COOK & SON,

New York, 261 and 1225 Broadway; Boston, 332 Washington St.; Philadelphia, 824 Chestnut St.; Chicago, 234 South Clark St.

Official Ticket Agents for all Trunk Lines.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address
E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

New York, N.Y., 11 West 86th St. (adj. Central Park). A THE JACOTOT SCHOOL. Boarding & Day School for Girls. Mlle. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Fall term begins Oct. 1. Kindergarten begins Oct. 15.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address

JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

In the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address

HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION

for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

MONEY WANTED.

I want to borrow money to increase my dairy business on paying lines and improve a good farm. I can give good, safe real estate security, and pay interest promptly. Property steadily rising in value. Address "P. J. N." in care of GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston, to whom I am at liberty to refer.

AN ANNIVERSARY HYMN.

BY JOHN CODMAN.

[On the thirtieth anniversary of the ordination of Rev. Dr. Stebbins in San Francisco.]

As Moses o'er the desert led Jehovah's chosen race,
Their wants by heavenly manna fed
In token of his grace,

So may you lead your loving flock
Not over barren plains,
Where water gushing from some rock
Miraculously rains,

But through sweet fields of living green,
By Nature's hand supplied,
Lead them to sweeter fields unseen,
Beyond the swelling tide.

Round out your term of forty years,
Until your setting sun
From Pisgah's distant height appears
To show your work is done.

Till then lead on, like him of old,
When time was in its youth,—
A pioneer, but not for gold,
The pioneer of truth.

LAKE MOHONK PLATFORM.

I. We, the members of the Lake Mohonk Conference, in this its thirteenth annual meeting, reaffirm its utterances of past years, and especially of last year. The reservation system is an insuperable obstacle to civilization, and should be abolished, the tribal organization destroyed, the lands allotted in severalty, the Indians intermingled with the whites, and the Indians treated as other men.

II. Until the Indian comes into complete ownership of his allotment, he should have the special protection of the federal government, special federal officers should be endowed with magisterial authority for the administration of local justice, the bureau should have power and means to employ and assign counsel for the legal protection of his rights, he should be guarded by adequate legislation from the land robber, the gambler, and the liquor-dealer, he should not be allowed to sell or lease his lands except upon permission first obtained from a federal judge, and provision should be made for the secular and industrial education of all Indian children of school age in schools supported by and under the exclusive control of the government, State or federal.

III. It is un-republican and un-American to permit the existence of any landed class in the community exempt from taxation. Such exemption is equally unjust to the taxed and to the untaxed. The taxes otherwise due on the allotment of the Indian citizen, so long as by a protected title his land is exempt, should be provided for out of Indian funds in the hands of the national government, or, if there are no such funds, out of the general treasury.

IV. No Indian tribe should be transferred from one reservation to another without its consent, and rarely, if ever, even with its consent. Rations should be given only where required by existing treaty stipulations or to avert imminent starvation, and should be done away with entirely as soon as practicable. Distribution of money per capita is often disastrous, and should be made with increased caution.

V. The nation possesses a supreme sovereignty over every foot of soil within its boundaries. Its legislative authority over its people it has neither right nor power to alienate. Its attempt to do so by Indian treaties in the past does not relieve it from the responsibility for the condition of government in the reservations and in the Indian Territory; and, despite those treaties, it is under a sacred obligation to exercise its sovereignty by extending over the three hundred thousand whites and fifty thousand so-called Indians in the Indian Territory the same restraints and protection of government which other parts of the country enjoy.

VI. The best of laws are useless unless they are faithfully and equitably enforced. Such enforcement through the Indian department is impossible unless appointments are made only for merit, removals only for cause; and the tenure of administrative officials is to this extent made permanent. We congratulate the country upon the evidence which the history of the past year has afforded that it is the purpose of the department to administer the Indian Bureau upon this principle, and we call upon Congress to co-operate with the Executive in such measures as may be necessary to secure permanently the Indian Bureau from the fatal incursion of the spoils system.

VII. The government alone cannot solve the Indian problem. Our American civilization is founded upon Christianity. A pagan people cannot be fitted for citizenship without learning the principles and acquiring something of the spirit of a Christian people. The duty of the Church is increased, and the hopefulness of accomplishing it is made more reasonable, by every advance the government makes in providing protection and secular education for the Indian race. The progress already made toward the dissolution of organic barbarism, the opening already afforded for free Christian work, eloquently summon Christian philanthropists to furnish that contribution which nothing but unofficial, voluntary, and Christian service can furnish toward the emancipation and elevation of the Indian.

Spiritual Life.

Every mean purpose renders a great hope more incredible: a mean heart cannot believe in a majestic destiny, and a poor soul has no faith in an everlasting growth.—H. W. Crosskey.

Rejoice in the joy of life. Be touched with tenderness and sympathy for all this life that can feel and can suffer, and do not dare to add a pang to the burden of the world's sorrow.—Minot J. Savage.

Between soul and soul, even the greatest and the least, there can be, in the things of righteousness and love, no lordship and servitude, but the sublime sympathy of a joint worship on the several steps of a never-ending ascent.—John Learned.

No one has any more right to go about unhappy than he has to go about ill-bred. He owes it to himself, to his friends, to society and the community in general, to live up to his best spiritual possibilities, not only now and then, once or twice a year, or once in a season, but every day and every hour.—Lilian Whiting.

All human help is God's help. All human pity is God's pity. All human love is God's love. All human tenderness is his. Let us have done with looking for his help, his tenderness, his love, and his pity where they never are, in lawless interference, and look for them in human faces and in human hearts; and we shall not look in vain.—John Chadwick.

He who will gauge the future of the religion of the Spirit by the yard measure of his experience, however devout his thought, will paralyze all hope and aspiration, will shut out the range of his destiny, and look back to the past as the end of the glorious possibilities of God. The revelations of the past are great, indeed: our hearts glow with thankfulness when we return to them. But man's own powers and possibilities are more glorious still.—Mozoomdar.

Here and There.

The value of pure black skunk skins in the furrier's trade has led to the breeding of these little animals, and there are now several farms for this purpose in the United States.

So far as can be learned, the only regular pigeon post service on this side of the continent or the other is that which bears messages every day in the summer season between Los Angeles and the little town of Avalon, on Catalina Island, and bears them at a speed which can be beaten only by the telegraph or telephone.—San Francisco Chronicle.

It is truly a singular discovery that the outlines of the "Defender" are almost precisely identical with those of an ancient Egyptian boat, 5,000 years old, recently found by De Morgan and Meir at Gizeh. It has the extreme overhang at bow and stern which is the chief characteristic of the 1895 racing yacht. Perhaps, if we could find the ark, we might get some pointers for our transatlantic liners.—Springfield Republican.

Great Britain has been striving for several years to change the taste of the tea-drinkers of the world,—to convince them that Indian and Ceylon teas are better worth using than those of China, Japan, and Java. The success crowning these efforts, says the New York Times, is shown in the fact that the consumption of the British product has increased in the five years, 1890-94, from 13,400,000 pounds to 28,400,000 pounds.—Journal of Commerce.

Worn Out,

both your silver and patience by a worthless silver polish and the silver shows it first.

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

does the work easily and quickly, never wearing, always satisfying. It's unlike others.

Trial quantity for the asking.
Box post-paid, 15 cts. in stamps.
Your Grocer has it.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

International Fur Company
39th & 45 Summer St.,
Adjoining C.F. Hovey & Co. BOSTON.

First Floor.

RICH FURS. CHOICE SELECTIONS.

This floor devoted exclusively to the display of all the fashionable Furs. The newest designs and the highest quality of manufacture.

Second Floor.

CLOTH GARMENTS.

To gain more space and better light, we have fitted out this floor with every convenience, and can show the very latest Paris, Berlin, and New York styles.

(Take Elevator.)

Third Floor.

FUR RUGS, ROBES, AND SKINS,

Gents' Fur-lined Coats, and many Rich Fur Decorations.

(Take Elevator.)

STRICTLY ONE PRICE.

A College Town Pulpit.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S MONTHLY SERMONS.

50 Cents a Year. 5 Cents a Number. Reduced rates in quantities.

Series for 1894-95.

1. The Soul's Cry for God.
2. Jesus as Humanity's Ideal.
3. Sectarianism: Its Evils, Causes, and Cures.
4. The True Cross of Christ.
5. Was Jesus God? How he came to be worshipped.
6. Loyalty to Conviction.
7. Is Life a Blessing?
8. Robert Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible.
9. A Religion for a Republic.
10. The Surest Way of Doing Good.

Order from Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, Ann Arbor, Mich.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Crosswell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

20. PRIMITIVE MAN: Pliocene, paleolithic and neolithic races; the ages of bronze and iron, cave-men and lake-dwellers; mound builders; primitive tools. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
21. GROWTH OF THE MARRIAGE RELATION: Its earlier forms; polygamy; polyandry; marriage by capture; monogamy; divorce and divorce laws. By C. STANLAND WAKE.
22. EVOLUTION OF THE STATE: The growth of political institutions; family tribe, clan, city; the State's final form. By JOHN A. TAYLOR.
23. EVOLUTION OF LAW: How law begins; statute law and judge-made law; the conversion of customs into law. By PROF. RUFUS SHELTON.
24. EVOLUTION OF MEDICAL SCIENCE: Supernatural ideas of disease; the beginnings of medical science; modern sanitary science. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.
25. EVOLUTION OF ARMS AND ARMOR: The struggle for existence; Nature's methods; individualism and co-operation; final universal peace. By JOHN C. KIMBALL.
26. EVOLUTION OF THE MECHANIC ARTS: Development of the human hand; earliest use of implements and tools; inventions; the laboring classes. By JAMES A. SKILTON.
27. EVOLUTION OF THE WAGES SYSTEM: The definition of wages; economic characteristics of the wages system; wages the outgrowth of slavery; development of the system. By PROF. GEORGE GUNTON.
28. EDUCATION AS A FACTOR IN CIVILIZATION: Early methods in Egypt, Persia, China, Greece, and Rome; early Christian ideas of education; Catholic and Protestant views; the common-school system. By MISS CAROLINE B. LE ROW.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

"Unity Pulpit"

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents.

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.
2. God in the City.
3. Reaping Time.
4. Called to be Saints.

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Education.

The Cincinnati souvenir, presented to visitors of the Atlanta Exposition, is an artistic pamphlet, entitled "A Plea for American Decorative Art," with illustrations and designs by Benn Pitman. It explains the requirements of beautiful and suggestive decoration, developed by advancing civilization, describes the characteristics that are likely to distinguish the American decorative art of the future, and gives a brief account of the artistic work of the Cincinnati Art Academy since 1872, when the movement was started by Mr. Pitman himself. A second brief essay defines the place of decoration in a classification of the fine arts. The illustrations show beautiful examples of wood-carving, china and pottery painting, mural decorations, etc., done by the girls and women of Cincinnati.

Charities and Reforms.

Emily Balch, Bryn Mawr, 1889, has lately prepared a manual for use in dealing with juvenile offenders of the State. It is published by the State conference of child helping societies, of which Miss Balch is secretary, and is intended for distribution among the lower courts and children's aid organizations. The edition is limited to 750 copies, and may very shortly be obtained on application to the secretary of the Children's Aid Society, Boston.

The legislation of France during the last ten years, in view of helping the laboring classes, has been prodigious. The institution of the Bureau of Labor, the laws limiting the labor of women and children in factories, the laws in reference to the responsibility of employers in the case of accidents to employees, the laws giving special privileges to trades-unions, and the recent laws for the housing of workmen will do more to stay socialism than the most Draconian laws of repression could have done.—The Congregationalist.

The Chinese Christian Home of Boston, situated at 49 Clarendon Street, was dedicated to its present work by the late Dr. Gordon, who was deeply interested in it; and it has been largely supported by the Clarendon Street Church. Now, however, since the accommodations have become totally inadequate for the needs of the hundreds of young Chinese who frequent the home, an appeal is sent out to friends of all denominations to help on the work. The home is open for social intercourse through the week, and is helpful in many practical ways besides the regular Sunday services.

There is a practical training school in New York to fit students or "Rescue Volunteers" for practical rescue work in missions, or as pastors' assistants, to reach the non-church-going public, especially those who have fallen through drink and accompanying vices. They are trained and practised in personal work in the rescue missions of this city, and by visiting the tenement districts and the slums of New York, under the direction of expert workers. During the term of training they reside in the East Side tenement houses in comfortable apartments especially furnished for them, mingling with the residents, observing their ways, habits, and temptations. The school is in connection with St. Bartholomew Rescue Mission; but Christians of any denominations will be welcome. The cost of the term is $190, to cover everything; but a class not to exceed fifty will be taken for $50 per student. The remaining $50 will be provided by friends of the work. Applicants desiring to enter this fall class are requested to apply immediately, with recommendation as to character from their pastor and two prominent citizens. The illustrated report of the spring class, with thirty photographs, fifteen testimonies, and full description, will be forwarded free to those who intend to come. Others who may desire the report will please forward twenty-five cents for it. Applications or letters requiring further information should be sent at once to Col. Henry H. Hadley, Superintendent of St. Bartholomew's Rescue Mission, 205-207 East 42d Street, near 3d Avenue, New York City.

Temperance.

The government of Canada has prohibited the sale of intoxicants among the Indians of Hudson Bay territory, and punishes severely any violation of this law.

Chicago is preparing for a notable celebration of Father Mathew's day next month. Archbishop Feehan has consented to preside at the public meeting that is to be held, and Archbishop Ireland has been invited to be the orator of the evening.

The city of Cambridge, Mass., has been under the no-license system for several years, with such excellent results that, it is said, even many who opposed the idea at first are now strongly in its favor. What makes the case of Cambridge more notable is the fact that it is the seat of a great university, and the suburb, in reality, of a large city. If the policy of no-license can be enforced under such circumstances, it ought to be enforceable in any town. A significant bit of testimony in regard to the results of no-license in Cambridge is given in the following statement of savings-bank deposits. The last year under saloons there were $140,000 of new deposits; the next year under prohibition, $586,000. The last year under saloons 861 new accounts were opened in the savings-banks, while in the first year under no-license 992 were opened.

Russia has determined upon nothing less than a complete government monopoly of the manufacture and sale of the liquor supply for the entire empire. Somewhat more than two years are to be allowed for the system to attain completeness. It is to be put in force in eight provinces on the first day of July, 1896, in seven other provinces on the first day of July, 1897, and throughout all the rest of the empire on the first day of January, 1898. Saloon-keeping as a private business will be altogether abolished. The French attempt at a monopoly of wholesale supply has been based very largely upon considerations of public revenue. It does not appear that the new Russian policy rests so much upon financial motives as upon a desire to rid the Russian people once and for all of the demoralizing influences of the liquor traffic as privately conducted.

Science.

A Swiss scientist has been testing the presence of bacteria in the mountain air, and finds that not a single microbe exists above an altitude of two thousand feet.

Science will some day measure the influence of the weather upon man's capability of work. The head of a factory employing three thousand workmen once reckoned that on a disagreeable day his workmen turned out about ten per cent. less work than on a day of pleasant weather.

Prof. Emery E. Smith of California has succeeded by experiments in cross fertilization in producing an entirely new violet, highly scented and of great beauty. In size the flower covers an American silver dollar. Its color is a clear violet purple, which does not fade. The fragrance is very powerful. The result is characterized by Knowledge as "one of the most remarkable botanical achievements of this century."

The latest hygienic craze in Paris is the use of porous glass for windows. This is declared to possess all the advantages of the ordinary window-framing; and, while light is as freely admitted as through the medium of common glass, the "porous" further admits air, too, the minute holes with which it is intersected being too fine to permit of any draught, while they provide a healthy, continuous ventilation through the apartment.

The city engineer of Munich has devised a new paving material composed of finely ground serpentine mixed with a binding substance, moulded into bricks, and fired in kilns at a high degree of temperature. The blocks are seven inches square and four inches thick, and cost a little more than four dollars a square yard. The unequal wear of the serpentine and the binding substance roughens the surface and prevents slipperiness. The wear is said to be less than granite, and equal to the best porphyry.

Salt

You don't realize that there are as many grades in salt as there are in sugar. Bradley's "Yorkshire" Salt is AI — the only pure salt. None can be better, even at a higher price. Your dealer can supply you — see that he does. We want to mail you a sample bag free. Send your address to

BRADLEY SALT CO.,

49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

ALWAYS refuse imitations. 372 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Its SCREW and PLUNGE LIFT for regulating Wick; Lift Attachment for LIGHTING without removing Chimney; SIMPLICITY of Design for Rewicking, and Cleanliness combine to make the

MILLER Lamp

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.

All parts Interchangeable, any of them can be supplied, and it costs no more than the ordinary centre-draft Lamp without our Patented Improvements.

EDWARD MILLER & CO.,
Mill and Factories, Meriden, Conn. 63 Pearl Street, Boston.

No. 865. Wrought Iron Banquet. Illustrated Catalogue Sent Free.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR OCTOBER.

- The Glory of the Present Hour. Rev. Frank L. Phalen.
Perhaps To-day. Rachel B. MacMullin.
Salvation: What it is and is not. H. W. Crosskey, LL.D., F.G.S.
Hidden Treasures. Maud L. Cotton.
Savonarola: A Sketch. I. S. Fletcher Williams.
Somewhere. Philip Falconar Deane.
The Vision of Rabbi Zeb. E. L. R.
Praying to Christ. Martha Perry Lowe.
Toleration in Religion. Edwin Burt Beckwith.
Passing Joy. Elizabeth Hill.
The Growth of Religion.
A Vacation Glimpse of England. J. T. Sunderland.
An Epitaph. C. Leech.
Divinity in Humanity. W. H. Fish, Sr.
The Shrewd Layman.
Types of the Spirit. William M. Bicknell.
The Mist. Hattie Tyng Griswold.
The National Conference.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

- American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women; Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work, Christopher R. Eliot; Literary Notes.
Children's Corner.
NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

* Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

Now ready:—

1. The Public Service of Religion.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William B. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVAL. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

Address Christian Register Association,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

AT MANUFACTURERS' PRICES. 658 WASHINGTON ST. OFF. BOYLSTON ST.

JOHN H. PRAY, SONS & Co.,

CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY, BOSTON.

CHURCH CARPETS

Pleasantries.

Uncle John: "Jimmie, if I were to take one dollar, and divide it into four parts, and give a quarter to each of your brothers, what would be left?" Jimmie: "I would." Presbyterian.

Mother: "Jack, what have you done with the money you saved up last week?" Johnny: "Papa told me to save for a rainy day. Yesterday was the first one we had, so I spent it."—Harper's Round Table.

"Mamma," remarked Johnnie Runkles, after he had absorbed a potash lozenge which had been given him for his sore throat, "wasn't Esau an idiot to sell his birthright for a mess of this stuff?" — Brooklyn Life.

At a young ladies' seminary, during an examination in history, one of the pupils was interrogated thus: "Mary, did Martin Luther die a natural death?" "No," was the reply, "he was excommunicated by a bull."—Exchange.

An Englishman sat at a restaurant table, critically viewing the soup he had ordered. "What is it?" said he. "It's bean soup," answered the waiter. "I don't care what it's been," retorted the Englishman: "I want to know what it is."—Christian Work.

Mr. Wheeler: "I suppose the great and mysterious Robert has many admirers in Boston, Miss Emerson?" Miss Emerson: "Why, yes, Mr. Wheeler. Even the beans go through a course of browning before they come to the table."—P. & S. S. Co. Bulletin.

Johnny and Jenny were quarrelling, and Jenny began to cry. "Oh," said Johnny, "don't cry. I'll take back all the mean things I've said." "Yes, you'll take 'em back," sobbed the girl, "so you can have 'em ready to use over again."—The Evangelist.

The most absent-minded man was not the man who hunted for his pipe when it was between his teeth, nor the man who threw his hat out of the window, and tried to hang his cigar on a peg. No! But the man who put his umbrella to bed, and went and stood behind the door.—Selected.

A Boston woman, who was trying to recover a parcel that had rolled under an electric car, turned apprehensively to the conductor, and inquired if she would receive a shock if her foot touched the rail. "Not unless your other foot is on the trolley wire," gravely replied the official.—Pacific Unitarian.

The following were answers received by a teacher in an up-town school from her pupils during a recent examination: "The cotton-gin was invented by Robert Morse shortly before the war broke out." "The Boston tea-party was a famous dinner given by one of the colonists to the Indians. Many celebrated people were there." "The gold fever is a fatal disease which those who dig gold sometimes get."—Philadelphia Call.

A pretty story is about a little boy whose elder sister is much interested in photography, and who gives the family the benefit of many observations about her work. The little boy was taken to the courthouse to see the end of a certain trial. He came home, and told his mother about it. "The judge made a speech to the jury," he said, "and then sent them off into a little dark room to develop."—Boston Transcript.

SUGGESTED TITLES.

The editor of a London journal lately offered a prize for the wittiest list of titles for twelve sham books on a dummy shelf. The following were some of the titles received in the competition:—
"A Binding Oath," by Scott.
"Badly Brought Up," by the author of "Molly Bawn."
"A New England Puss," by M. E. W.
"Thoughts on my Bed," Stead.
"On Different Tacks," by Van Hammer.
"Lizzie Wouldn't," by John Wood.
"The Fatal Blow," by John Knox.
Porter's "Tales of Lost Luggage."
"Lost in the Wash," by the author of "Bachelor's Buttons."
"Grinding the Poor," by Mill.
To this list a Yankee humorist adds:—
"Owe No Man," by O. W. Holmes.
"Against Shiftlessness," by Thoreau.
"A Treatise on Abbreviations," by the author of "Ben-Hur."
Poe's "For Effect."
"Harvard Freshmen," by the author of "Innocents Abroad."
"After the Ball," by the author of "Our National Game."
Morse on "Our Old Houses."
"Woodchucks and Rabbits," by Burroughs.
"E. E.," by the author of "My Double." Youth's Companion.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON, EUROPEAN PLAN, J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

CAUTION.

Spoons and forks not our make are frequently sold as "Rogers." Our trademark is 1847 Rogers Bros. "1847" guarantees original genuine goods, silver plate that wears, on nickel-silver. Look out for imitations.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO., Meriden, Conn.

CRAZY PATCHWORK

Has become quite the rage again. Ounce package of waste embroidery silk, bright colors, sent post-paid for 40 cts. 1/2 oz. package, 25 cts. Brainerd & Armstrong Silk Co., 2 Union St., New London, Conn.

DYSPEPSIA FLOUR.

Also Special Diabetic Food, Barley Crystals, and Patent Biscuits, Cakes and Pastry Flour. Unrivalled in America or Europe. Pamphlets and Baking Samples Free. Write Farwell & Rhines, Watertown, N. Y., U.S.A.

TO LET. The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

The MAGEE Boston Heater

FOR WARM AIR ONLY, and the MAGEE COMBINATION HEATER here shown (for warm air and Hot Water), each received THE HIGHEST AWARD at the World's Fair, Chicago.

They are honestly, carefully and intelligently made for USE, not merely to sell.

No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost above any others on the market.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The name Magee carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use.

DESCRIPTIVE CIRCULARS FREE.

For Sale by Leading Dealers Everywhere.

Hot Water Combination. 32, 34, 36 & 38 Union St., Boston. 242 Water Street, New York. 86 Lake Street, Chicago.

MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY,

Ivers & Pond PIANOS

If no dealer sells them in your neighborhood write us for catalogue and valuable information (free). We will promptly give prices and make it easy for you to deal with us. Easy Payments. Bargains in slightly used pianos. Write us before buying.

IVERS & POND PIANO CO., 183 Tremont St. (Masonic Temple), Boston, Mass.

USE "BURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING"

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES of Copper and Tin. BLAKE BELL CO., Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1895.

NUMBER 43.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes: A Tribute to Unitarianism,	673
The Unsatisfied Heart; Higher Criticism,	674
MUSINGS,	674
BREVITIES,	674
PRO AND CON.
Amen!	675
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Tempted by the Devil, by Rev. John W. Chadwick; A Cheerful Old Age, by P. Thorne,	675
Myths and their Uses, by J. Leonard Corning, Sr.; New York Letter,	676
The Unitarian Sunday School Society; Salt Lake City To-day, by Ella A. Giles,	677
The American Unitarian Association; What Unitarians Believe,	678
Liberalism and Roman Catholicism, by Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D.,	680
Sponge Farms,	682
A Toad for a Barometer,	686
Benjamin Cushing, M.D.,	687
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	678
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	678
LITERATURE.
"The University Hymn Book"; Other Book Notices,	682
Miscellaneous; Literary Notes; Books Received,	683
THE HOME.
At a Frontier Post; A Little Business Woman,	684
Indian Walkers; He Got It; A Little Heroine; A Florida Crane; Story of a Bell,	685
POETRY.
Autumn Days, by Edith Callender,	675
The Old Love-song,	684
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	686
TEMPERANCE,	686
HERE AND THERE,	686
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	687
EDUCATION,	687
SCIENCE,	687
PLEASANTRIES,	688

Editorial.

THE spring used to be the anniversary season, but now church conferences seem to ripen most in the fall. The triennial council of the Congregational Church held its session at Syracuse last week, and its action is noticed below. The American Board met in Brooklyn, the Episcopal General Convention is still holding its sessions in Minneapolis, and this week the Unitarian National Conference meets at Washington. There is room for all these bodies in this country, and they need not jostle each other; and there is room, too, for a greater unity of spirit among them all, and, the closer they get together in this sense, the less friction there will be.

THE National Council of Congregational Churches held its ninth triennial session in Syracuse, October 9-14. This council, though without authority to dictate the policy or methods of the individual churches represented, is yet the chief exponent of the thought and work of orthodox Congregationalism. Its meetings were characterized by able papers on important, present-day subjects, free and earnest discussion, and by a general spirit of harmonious co-operation in working for high ends. Considerable time was taken up with a consideration of "The Christian Ministry" and the standard for ministerial service. It showed its interest in practical methods of reaching and helping the people by commending the institutional churches, which were defined by Rev. C. S. Mills as possessing these three characteristics,—that they are open week-days as well as Sundays, that their pews are free, and that they are evangelistic in the sense of speaking a message of salvation by every part of the church life and work. The subject of Christian unity was discussed through one afternoon; and a proposed basis of union was adopted, looking toward fraternal co-operation with other bodies. The principles of this basis include the acceptance of the Scriptures as the only authoritative revelation of God to man, discipleship of the Lord Jesus Christ, belief in the Church of Christ, and liberty of conscience in the interpretation of the Bible and church administration. The council did not think of organic unity as either near or desirable, but evidently wished to do its part toward a vital spiritual harmony and co-operation.

THE abstract we publish this week will give our readers a good idea of the tone, spirit, and argument of the "Dudleian Lecture" delivered last week by Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford at Harvard University. To lecture on the text furnished by Judge Dudley is something like taking a text from one of the imprecatory Psalms. But the imprecatory spirit was wholly absent from Dr. Herford's lecture. He did not, however, use the text as a point of departure. In perfect good faith, and with characteristic frankness and thoroughness, he took up the claims of the Catholic Church, and considered them from the standpoint of modern liberalism. In the larger part of his address he dealt directly and essentially with the Catholic Church as an organized institution. He considered no claim which it has not made in official documents and through official representatives. It cannot be said, therefore, that he was dealing with figments of imagination or hypothesis without official or historic character. There can be no doubt as to what the claims of the Catholic Church are; for it has constantly reasserted them, and there can be no doubt that such claims are incompatible with the enlightened reason and knowledge as well as spiritual experience of our own day.

IN dealing with the Roman Catholic Church as an institution, Dr. Herford was precluded to some extent from dealing with it as a spirit. There is hardly any church in which there is not some divergence, contrast, or antagonism between its spiritual and its corporate life. It is notably so in Presbyterianism. If we judge of the claims of the Presbyterian Church by its standards and confessions, they are simply monstrous and as untenable as those of Roman Catholicism. Indeed, there may be advantages in having the dogma of infallibility invested in a living man instead of in a dead book. But, though the Presbyterian Church, interpreted through its standards and its assemblies, is sternly Calvinistic, the Presbyterian soul to-day is more and more progressive. Such movements as that represented in Union Theological Seminary and in Lane Seminary are not temporary eddies, but new channels of thought and movement through which that Church will eventually flow. Just as truly there is a soul in Catholicism which cannot be pent up in the documents and institutions of that Church. Catholicism as a religion is much larger, freer than Catholicism as a Church; and, if we differ from Dr. Herford, it is mainly in thinking that these progressive manifestations of modern Catholicism are something more than local accommodations. They seem to us attempts to adjust the spirit of Catholicism to modern life, thought, and political institutions, which eventually must react upon the Church itself.

ONE extraordinary claim of the Roman Catholic Church which Dr. Herford did not include in his criticism is the claim of the temporal and political supremacy of the pope,—a claim which, as we have lately shown, has been reasserted by his delegate in this country. At the same time this very claim serves to illustrate the reaction which has taken place within Roman Catholicism itself. As the laity do not control the administration of that Church, they could not directly reform its abuses; but they could and did in Italy overthrow its political power and extinguish in all except name the claim of papal supremacy. While in Spain the Church has unchecked dominion, and an ascendancy through its clergy in Belgium, in France the Catholic laity are uppermost, and have secured victories for liberty which have not been won even in this country. Somewhat grudgingly the clergy have been obliged to submit to the taxation of church property. Instead of Catholicism being a menace to government either local or national, France has a degree of freedom under its republican constitution, especially a liberty of the press, not enjoyed even in Protestant Germany. In this country the services which Catholics rendered in securing the victories of liberty in the war of the Revolution were publicly recognized by Washington; and their loyalty here during the Rebellion was as marked as Dr. Herford shows their loyalty has been in England. The pope himself has formally admitted, in his last encyclical to the Church in America, that, for the prosperity of the Catholic Church here, "thanks are due to the equity of the laws which obtain in America, and to the customs of the well-ordered republic. For the Church among you, unopposed by the Constitution and government of your nation, fettered by no hostile legislation, protected against violence by the common laws and the impartiality of the tribunals, is free to live and act without hindrance." Such a concession is all that the Catholics of America need; and it does not concern them that, further on in the same document, the pope tells them that they must not "draw the conclusion that it would be universally lawful or expedient for State and Church to be, as in America, dissevered and divorced." Catholics are very likely to believe that what is a good form of government here may be just as good on the other side of the ocean, and there are thousands of Catholics in Italy who are working and hoping for democratic government. Thus it is that the Catholic Church, in spite of decrees, councils, and buried popes, is gradually abating its own claims and adjusting itself to the conditions of the nineteenth century.

A TRIBUTE TO UNITARIANISM.

THE new and striking book, "The Christ of To-day," by Rev. George A. Gordon, D.D., minister of the Old South Church, Boston, will command much attention. Like "The Oriental Christ," by Protap Chunder Mozoomdar, it may be said briefly to be a consideration of the Christ ideal in its universal aspects. Later on we shall have occasion to notice it more fully. We call attention to it now simply to show the new attitude which liberal and independent Orthodoxy sustains toward Unitarianism. In the Unitarian controversy of sixty years ago, one saw how wide apart Orthodoxy and Unitarianism could be. In this volume we see how close they may be together, yet without absolute identification. Mr. Gordon is not a Unitarian denominationally or theologically. Yet his tribute to the work and influence of Unitarianism is one of the most generous that has ever been paid to it.

In his introductory chapter Dr. Gordon says: "For the most part, then, the persons addressed in this discussion are those who have not broken with historic Christianity, who stand in the consciousness of its grandeur and finality, but who desire a better understanding of that which holds them with a grasp so beneficent. If any of my

Unitarian friends should read what I have written, let me here make plain the fact that I am not trying to raise from the dead a deeply and decently buried controversy. It is the duty of the Unitarian, as surely as it is mine, to endeavor to ascertain the worth of our common Christian inheritance; and, if upon the central part of this vast bequest—the person of Christ—we differ in our estimates, it must strengthen him in his own conclusion to see it victorious against mine. Perhaps this consciousness of the duty resting upon Unitarian and Trinitarian alike, to open up afresh the whole question of the significance of Christianity, may subdue both from the mood of self-confident controversialists to the temper of patient and reverent thinkers. Any words of mine bearing upon Unitarianism are written, I trust it is needless to say, in honor and gratitude for the great movement of thought whose power for good has been so vast, but from whose conception of Christ I differ. Mutual recognition is the basis of all fruitful discussion. As a tenacious Trinitarian, I rejoice to recognize the benefit to the Christian Church of the Unitarian contention. No intelligent religious person can fail to honor its insistence upon the fatherhood of God, the real and therefore the divine humanity of our Lord, the function of history as a revelation of God, the place of the Bible at the centre of religious history, and salvation as a moral process under the Spirit of God. Against a Trinitarianism that was tritheism, in opposition to a view of the person of Christ that slighted his humanity and dishonored the Eternal Father, in the face of opinions that made history godless and terrible, that construed salvation as outward, forensic, mechanical, that regarded religion as alien to the nature of man, at war with the intellectual and moral wealth of the world, and that turned it into a provincial and deformed thing, the Unitarian protest was wholesome, magnificent, providential. On the other hand, the ceaseless assertion, in the face of militant Unitarianism, of the enlightened Trinitarian's conception of God, his search for the basis in the Infinite for human society, his construction of the person of Christ, his view of the differentiating character of the Bible and history within the Christian Church, his persistent plea for the meaning of an outraged conscience, his appeal for an authentic and authenticated Mediator of the Eternal Pity, his proclamation of obedience to Christ as the path to spiritual freedom, the exalted personalism in which his ideas have lived, and the contagious enthusiasm with which he has expounded them, have doubtless told for good upon his stout theological antagonist, and constitute a tradition of faith of the utmost significance. Whoever enters into both these moods, whoever studies both these traditions, if he is a deep-hearted man and alive to the sublime reach of his Christian inheritance, will feel the call as from God, whether he be Unitarian or Trinitarian or neither, to fathom to a lower depth, and explore on a wider scale, the unsearchable riches of Christ. To such a man, whatever his name or order, I would venture to repeat the invitation of the Hebrew singer, burdened as it is with the meaning, the privilege, and the hope of this new day,—

"Oh, magnify the Lord with me,
And let us exalt his name together!" *

In another chapter, in treating "Christ and the Faith of To-day," on a page with the head-line "Our Debt to Unitarians," Dr. Gordon says:—

"Under the supremacy of the Augustinian and Calvinistic conception of human nature, the consciousness of sin necessarily tends to become exclusive, and the task of Christian living to become more and more a lamentation over the defect of character and a despair of goodness. More and more salvation must become, not the act by which God educates his children and claims his own, but the triumph of Almighty pity over sheer worthlessness. This overdone sense of depravity, hardened into dogma, stood for centuries against the truth that the morality of God in Christ is the morality for mankind. The truth has at last prevailed; and, at this point of belief, Christian people everywhere are under an immense debt to the great Unitarian leaders. It is impossible to be too thankful for these words of Dr. Channing: 'Expect no good from Jesus any further than you clothe yourselves with excellence. He can impart to you nothing so precious as himself, as his own mind. Look up to the illustrious Son of God with the conviction that you may become one with him in thought, in feeling, in power, in holiness. The most lamentable scepticism on earth, and incomparably the most common, is a scepticism as to the greatness, powers, and high destinies of human nature. In this greatness I desire to cherish an unvarying faith. Tell me not of the universal corruption of the race. Humanity has already, in not a few instances, borne conspicuously the likeness of Christ and God. In such men I learn that the soul was made in God's image, and made to conform itself to the loveliness and greatness of his Son.' ('Channing's Works,' p. 316.) The title of the discourse from which these words are taken, 'The Imitableness of Christ's Character,' might well serve as a summary of the vast service that Unitarianism has rendered to the Christian belief of the century. Channing and Hedge and Peabody and Furness and their contemporaries refused to be forever shut up within the consciousness of moral defect and infirmity. They held that the morality of Jesus has power to give life to the spirit to which it comes, that it elicits into clearness and strength the aboriginal human endowment, sets free the divine in man's constitution, and invests it with new vigor and prophetic invincibility. The leaders of the Unitarian movement were men of exalted spirit: in them the ethical and religious principles lived in great power. They were unimpeachable examples of the high doctrine that they proclaimed. Largely through their inspired fidelity to their high teaching, the idea has become current again that the example of Christ is the standard for man.

* Psalm xxxiv. 3.

"There is no reason why this clear achievement of Christian faith should not remain. It has far less to fear from the avowed enemies of high morality than from a narrow religious zeal. Nothing can obliterate the modern sense of amenableness to the ethics of Christ except a fresh deluge of the old exclusive consciousness of human sinfulness."

Dr. Gordon's tributes to Unitarianism do not mean that he has accepted the Unitarian position, but that he simply recognizes the contribution it has made to the development of Christianity in modern life and thought. Many Unitarians will be the more interested in reading his presentation of his own conception of the Christ, because it diverges somewhat from their own.

THE UNSATISFIED HEART.

It is not the selfish, grasping heart which is unsatisfied: it is the loving and generous one. The baby born with such a nature makes friends with all the world. As a child, it claims the whole school as playmates. Arrived at maturity, there is still the eager outstretching for more to love. The happy wife is not satisfied till little ones of her own give a still wider opportunity for the tendrils of affection to clasp and cling. She watches them grow in turn to manhood and womanhood, and rejoices in grandchildren on whom to pour out the rich balm of her heart. While she lives, she loves: she is unsatisfied else.

There is a world of difference between the unsatisfied and the dissatisfied heart. The latter might well envy the former. One feels out for the infinite, and gratefully accepts every good that comes. The other frets and fumes because the infinite is not thrust into its bosom. One thinks of others: the selfish, cynical soul, only of itself.

The man or woman with the tender, loving heart may see dear one after dear one pass away; yet there is this ever on-reaching of affection which holds like a magnet all who come within its influence. There may be no outward attempt to win friends; but the gentle qualities of the nature draw every one to it, as the mellow influence of the sun in spring wins to the surface every seed which has within it the responsive germ of life. One might indeed speak of the sun as unsatisfied in the same sense. It awakes the spring, it lures the summer, and it summons the fall with its wealth of fruitage. It is ever calling on and upward. So with the unsatisfied soul. It sees ever in perspective joy and love, and stretches out its wings to reach them. The immortal life is to it an unquestioned reality. How else could the instinctive longings of the heart be gratified? When there are enough such souls in a community to leaven it, the tone of that place is optimistic. If things are not right, they will be made so. There is no halting-place for the unsatisfied heart. It springs from better to better, finding satisfaction only in the Infinite Life and Love.

HIGHER CRITICISM.

The old reproach that our Unitarian churches are too intellectual is one that has been often heard in the past, and is sometimes still repeated, although it must seem to many of us that a little modesty in this regard is not unbecoming. It may be that our ministers are occasionally led into the mistake of preaching too abstrusely for the edification of the average listener; though the general tendency seems to us to be in the direction of practical, earnest talks, fitted to actual needs. Every attempt to have sermons clear and straightforward is to be commended; but the cultivation of the intellect, both of minister and people, ought to lead to definite gain in these very qualities. When a man knows where he stands, and has a clear idea himself of the thought which he wishes to express, he is not likely to confuse the minds of his hearers. Intellectuality is not opposed to spirituality, and we can hardly hope to increase the love of goodness in our churches by decreasing the intellectual element of the sermon. Take the ministers whose sermons have attained the most wide-spread influence among all classes of readers, both in the denomination and out of it. To what do they owe the secret of their influence? It is not that they build on any simpler theories of evolution or of the higher criticism than the others, or that their thought about Jesus is very different. Partly, at least, it is because they are so absolutely clear in statement, and because they draw no lines between the truths which they accept in the study and the truths they think suited to the needs of the people. They have no place for an esoteric religion. If a minister wishes to secure the best results among his people, it is far wiser to trust them intellectually, even at the risk of being a little ahead of them sometimes, than to underestimate their power of receiving and assimilating the truths which he himself accepts.

As for the higher criticism of the Bible, our people have long ago come out from the hard-and-fast literalism which accepts everything, contradictions and all, as literal inspired truth. Nevertheless, until the general misconceptions as to its place and value are cleared away, it is useless to expect the general use and appreciation of it which we desire. It is true that all the detailed pioneer work in this field is far too difficult for any but the deepest scholars; but the results of their labors, so far as they touch broadly the place and relation of the Bible itself, are not difficult. When a mother, teaching the old Bible stories to her children, can no longer truthfully claim that they are literally or historically true, and yet wants her children to feel their power and value, it is more study that she needs, not less. She needs to be freed from the uncertainty that takes away every atom of one's enjoyment of the Bible as literature. She may, it is true, confine her teaching to the inexhaustible riches of the New Testament; but even there she loses much, if she is not quite sure of her own attitude toward certain unavoidable difficulties, as, for instance, the genealogy of Jesus in the very first verses of the very first book.

The truth of it is that we older persons do not realize how naturally children take to a common-sense presentation of something that puzzles one brought up on miracle and ancient dogma. They are quick to discern symbolic beauty and truth, and we make a great mistake when we assume that they must necessarily reach conviction by the same painful steps which we have been forced to take. Which is easier, to explain to a child what a miracle is and why it should have been allowed to interrupt the orderly course of the universe, or to show him how miracle stories have always grown out of loving hearts naturally and unaffectedly? What more easy than to show how, even to-day, with all our means for quick and reliable communication, such a story as that of John Brown's kissing the little black child when he was on the way to the scaffold is as often repeated as disproved? What does that sweetest and most significant of all stories, the wonder-story of the birth of Jesus, lose when it ceases to rank as literal history? Its symbolic truth and beauty appeal none the less to child hearts.

No one fancies that we should try to keep the young people in our Sunday-schools up to date in the slow process of disentangling the different threads of Old Testament history; but let us, at least, build on the basal facts which have been rediscovered for us, and not insist that our children should go on through the various stages of uncertainty, distrust, and "general muddle-headedness," as Mr. Pulsford calls it, where we ourselves have wandered. Ministers need not make the mistake of putting the facts of the higher criticism up on an artificial pedestal, as if too good for common use. The truths of the Bible have their roots deep in human nature; and, the younger our children are when they approach it from the new and rational point of view, the less they will have to overcome in appropriating to themselves its rich helpfulness and appreciating its genuine intrinsic interest.

Musings.

THROUGH a dim vista of many years a pleasant picture opens before me. It is a picture from days of early childhood. The streets of New York were quieter then than they are now. It was an event to have a certain buggy stop at the door. Not that it came seldom,—for it came rather frequently,—but that its coming was so welcome. There was always a smiling, benedictory face inside; and sometimes it was a special privilege to get a ride "around the block." Shall I call him the doctor or the minister? Really he was both. I know at least two men who, during their active work as ministers, have studied medicine to enlarge their usefulness. But this man, contrariwise, was educated as a physician, and enlarged his usefulness by preaching the gospel and taking no pay for his ministrations. It could be literally said of him that he preached on Sunday and practised during the week. The church was but a little room, a sort of upper chamber, like that of the primitive disciples; and the congregation was small. The good doctor seemed the largest part of the establishment. To the small boy his visits were never associated with bitter medicine, either physical or religious. The youngster did not run away or hide under the bed to escape the infliction of his pastoral calls, as he did when a later and more ghostly minister came; nor was there a fear of drastic remedies for physical ills. The combination of doctor and minister seemed to neutralize the terror which either profession might sometimes have, and to combine the virtues of both.

I HAVE been led to ponder during the last week the question whether, since the days of Luke, the pastoral and healing professions have not been more frequently combined than we imagine. I have been thinking of one who was distinctively a medical man, honored in his profession, and who externally was as far as possible away from the clerical profession. He never preached, and did not often lecture: he did not covet the publicity of the platform. He was not an ecclesiastic. But, if not a preacher, he did become a pastor. In these days, when ministers cannot visit their flocks as much as their forefathers, it is possible that the doctors will have to do a good deal of pastoral work; and this doctor was certainly a physician of souls. He had a great capacity for keeping secrets, which was, perhaps, one reason why so many secrets were intrusted to him. His sympathy was not effusive, but it was wonderfully wise. He did not wait for people to put burdens upon him: he took them up. He worked quietly, without ostentation. I happen to know of families in which he seemed to combine all the functions of doctor, counsellor, lawyer, guardian, and friend. On his Messianic spirit were laid the burdens of us all. He did not gossip about his patients, and he never magnified their illness. People who tried to "pump" him about the condition of his patients found him wonderfully dry. He had a high sense of professional pride and of professional ethics, and his opinions were decided about those who did not have. He more than paid his own debt to his own profession. In these days of patent medicine the healing art has become more or less commercial and impersonal. There are many people who transfer their allegiance from the physician to some nostrum which they have seen advertised. They assume that the remedy they need is corked up in some bottle. But I am persuaded that his success as a doctor was largely due to his unique personality,—a quality which could not be bottled and sold. He was a Christian Scientist. I do not mean that he talked gibberish, and that he disdained material agencies, or that he belonged to the sect by that name. On the contrary, I mean that he was thoroughly scientific in his methods and thoroughly Christian in his spirit; and I am sure that Christian Scientists would be more successful in their healing of body and mind if they added his knowledge to their faith. A whole regiment of people have lived more abundant lives because he mitigated their sufferings and their sorrows. If not the rector, he was pre-eminently the cure. Perhaps there is no profession in which the man may not be more than the art. It is so in the ministry and in the law, and it is pre-eminently so in medicine. And Dr. Benjamin Cushing was infinitely better than anything in his materia medica. His sagacity, his prudence, his intuition, his reserve, his quiet sympathy, and a certain undefinable authority over disease enabled him to expel evil spirits and demons in nerve and blood which possess the body and the mind. He has gone to a well-earned rest. But I think of him there, too, as still engaged in that highest service of bringing imperfect souls into harmony with the eternal laws.

Brevities.

We call attention to the notice in our department of "Charities and Reforms," on the fourteenth page, of the annual meeting of the New England Hospital for Women and Children, to be held in Copley Hall, Boston, Tuesday, October 29, at 3.30 P.M.

The North Carolina Christian Advocate apparently credits the statement "that a phonograph was used recently at a funeral service on Coney Island. It was difficult to procure a minister. So the friends gathered around the bier, and the deputy coroner touched a button, and the instrument began to work. The words of the service and the hymns followed." It thinks that there are many ministers just as dead as the phonograph. "They go through the service like a machine. There is no life in it."

There are many churches that have baptistries; but St. Mary's Church of Ardmore, Pa., is the only church we know of that has a laundry. It is not, however, a part of the church itself. A new building has been purchased, enlarged, and fitted up for the purpose, and a stable built where a horse and delivery wagon are kept. The laundry yields a net profit of $1,200 a year, largely through the business energy and support of two parishioners. Considering the part that water has played in religious services, it does not seem violent to apply it to the laundry business. And the exchange containing this item reminds its readers that "cleanliness is next to godliness."

The New York Christian Advocate rebukes the custom which some parishes have of first contriving to get rid of their minister, and then sending him off with the most laudatory messages: "Instances in every denomination have occurred where people have disliked a man so as to cause his removal, and then, having accomplished it, seem to relent and perhaps repent of all that they have said concerning him. By a natural operation of the mind, they try to make amends by giving him what they call a good chance to get another place. We have known men in the Methodist Church, of high character, to do this very thing, and not only to do it orally, but to pass resolutions that would have suited only a description of such an orator as Bishop Simpson concerning a man whose removal they had caused because they were not satisfied with his preaching."

Pro and Con.

AMEN!

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I wish to cry "Amen!" to the righteous words of Rev. Charles Graves in your issue of October 3. I think that, when our brother from without gains a wider acquaintance with the Unitarian ministry, he will find that he has been mistaken in saying that "there is scarcely a preacher or minister among us." You and I, Mr. Editor, know many such; and we have seen rich harvests of the spiritual life resulting from their labors. Nevertheless, the chief reason why our faith does not stand forth as one of the most conspicuous and moving influences of the time we live in is that our ministry as a body is not dead in earnest for making spiritual things shine out as the only stable foundation on which to build a noble life. It is not our business to conduct schools or to organize high-minded politics or to write books, or to become so overwhelmed with the glorious deeds and thoughts of other people as to neglect to do anything fine ourselves. We shall of course engage incidentally in these works of practical righteousness. They offer scope for our overflows of energy. But the full weight of our energy should be given to the creation of religious earnestness in human souls. If we succeed in that, our especial work, then our hearers will go out in such force to do the righteous things that we shall not have to do them in person. We must preach about politics and reforms when the need arises, but always in such a way as to show how God can be put into them. Our preaching is a clear failure if, in addition to preaching, we have to go out in person to try to do all the good things that are done in our community. A preacher's business is to inspire other people to do great things. In that success he has done the greatest deed it is ever given to man to do. Every moment which a minister devotes to doing what a layman could do as well as he is a moment lost from the more wide-reaching things he ought to be about.

But that larger work of inspiring human souls by imparting to them a vital religious earnestness can be done by none but men and women who are all on fire with religious zeal themselves. By our intensity of conviction, by our insistent interest in their spiritual growth, by our determination that they shall know the truth, we shall succeed in awakening human souls,—not minds simply, but immortal souls. To do the work which we might do, and which none others can do so well, we must insist that men shall know and trust the love of God, our Father, must insist that they can attain no lasting strength until they believe with a mighty assurance in the immortality of their souls, must yearn for the welfare of our people until, by the nobleness of our anxiety, they are helped to gain the power of a personal religious life. Until these things are accomplished for all our people, there is nothing else so important to be done.

Brothers in the ministry, let us thank Charles Graves for his searching word. Let us join his utterance of scorn for all religious feebleness in the pulpit, and let each one of us see to it that in his own work one thing shall shine out through all else that he does, and be the message carried by every sermon. Let that one thing be the holy zeal which carried Paul into Macedonia and Theodore Parker into loneliness and Emanuel Bayard into the back alleys of Windover. Let us resolve again that men everywhere shall care more for religion (love for God and love for man) than they do for anything else. The men and women whom we arouse to that spiritual earnestness are the ones who are going to shape the future of America. They, and none different from them, are going to purify our politics, spread abroad intelligence, and root out all iniquity. They will be the only souls who cannot faint by the way. God forgive every man who shows the dilettante spirit in a work like this. But we cannot forgive him until he steps out of the pulpit or gets a change of heart.

CHARLES E. ST. JOHN.

Pittsburg, Pa.

AUTUMN DAYS.

BY EDITH CALLENDER.

The corn in shocks of russet gold
Gleams out against the quiet sky,
Soft purple lights the hills enfold
And over all the meadows lie;
Red, red, along the pasture slopes
And boulders gray, the sumachs burn;
The woodbine trails in scarlet ropes
Through beds of bronzed and withered fern.

O wealth of light and color flung
Once more by Autumn's lavish hands!
O breath of balm that floats among
These peaceful, sun-embosomed lands!
As if there fell a sweet delay,
A gracious pause, in Nature's haste,
And every mellow, golden day
Poured out her heart in loving waste.

Though soon the touch of winter freeze
These depths of calm and crystal air,
And shake from off the maple-trees
The royal garniture they wear,
O smile of God that lingers still
On field and mountain, wood and glen,
We feel thy sweet assurance thrill
That life and beauty come again!

TEMPTED BY THE DEVIL.

BY REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

"Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceedingly high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, and saith unto him, All these things will I give thee if thou wilt fall down and worship me." It would be superfluous to say that there is no correspondence between the circumstance narrated here and the possible experience of any actual human being. For one thing, the mountain does not exist from whose summit more than the meanest fraction of the kingdoms of the earth is visible. But what of that or any other formal incongruity between the New Testament poem and the universal fact? There is nothing to prevent the essence of the temptation to which Jesus was subjected in this imaginative construction of his experience from being that of the temptations to which ambitious men and women have been subjected every day since Jesus walked the earth, and were subjected long before that. And the New Testament symbol is all the more pertinent to the general situation because it is a symbol of political temptation. The appeal is to the political ambition of Jesus: the conditional promise made to him is a promise of political advancement. For nowhere have the temptations of ambition been so conspicuous as in the field of politics, nowhere has the devil been so ready with his promises, so magnificent, and nowhere has his success been more phenomenal than here. I say the devil: I mean the personal devil, whose name is legion. A budding heretic asked me a few days ago if I believed in a personal devil, assuring me, with an anticipatory gleam of satisfied superiority, that he did not. "Not one," I said, "but many." The town is full of them in these last days. Primaries and political conventions are their opportunities. They are the political bosses and their representatives, making their cautious approaches to the honest citizen, the would-be reformer, the young political aspirant. Their promises are not so liberal as those of the New Testament tempter. They only promise what they can reasonably be expected to perform. And what they ask is not that the honest citizen, the would-be reformer, and the young political aspirant shall fall down and worship them. That would be too absurd, considering who they are. It is only to support their candidate, or to go upon their ticket, or withhold your opposition to this or that nomination with the understanding that you never shall regret it. The god Heimdal in the old Norse mythology could hear the wool growing on the backs of the sheep. If we had ears like that, and went the round of conferences and conventions in these last days, how often we should overhear some fine, earnest fellow saying to himself: "Well, until a man is inside politics, he can do nothing to improve them. I should like to go in with my port erect and my face toward heaven. But, if I must crawl, I must. Once well inside, I'll stand upright enough." And I am bound to say that here and there the expectation is fulfilled. Here and there we see men, who began with indirection, straightening themselves as they go on. But, where one succeeds in this way, many fail. One can know nothing of political history and biography, and not know that worshipping the devil, making terms with wrong, is a note that runs all through it with a hideous and painful jar. How many have fallen away from the promise and performance of their first estate! In our own politics the tragedy has had many illustrations,—the saddest, possibly, of them all that afforded by Daniel Webster. In 1829 the devil came to him in the most gracious semblance of a Boston manufacturer; and it was no wonder that he was deceived, and straightway unsaid all that he had said so memorably in 1824. In 1850 he came to him with the promise of a presidential nomination, if he would support the "Fugitive Slave Law" and the compromise of which it was a part; and that great brow was buried in the dust.

"So fallen! so lost! the light withdrawn
Which once he wore!
The glory from his gray hairs gone
Forevermore!"

And still the old, old tragedy goes on; and now its victim is an aspirant for some small municipal office, and anon it is an aspirant to the Presidency, trimming his sails to catch at once the wind from Colorado and New York. And, again, it is some great political convention, framing a platform that means something or nothing, according to the exigencies of its local application.

But the ambitious are not all in politics, nor anxious to be there. They are in business and in medicine and law. They are preachers and teachers. They are men and women anxious for social distinction and social standing, kingdoms of the earth, and glory enough for them to get on a little faster,—

"To make a happy fireside clime
For weans and wife,"— to get into some charmed circle, some enchanted ring. And how often is the apparent cost some base concession, some falling-off in one's allegiance to one's personal ideal, some stooping lower than we know we ought to stoop for anything which we desire!

A CHEERFUL OLD AGE.

AN AUTUMN LEAF DISCOURSE.

BY P. THORNE.

Old age and cheeriness to many people seem to have little in common. The season symbolized by the sere and falling leaf, the dying year, the setting sun; the period when the body wanes in strength and charm, when the mind begins to lose its grasp, when we walk largely alone, bereft of many dear friends whose tender love warmed our younger years; when we begin to realize that we are no longer necessary, that we are out of the race, which speeds merrily on without us; when death looms up, a certainty near at hand,—are we bid to be cheerful then? Patient resignation, at the best, would seem to be the highest degree of virtue reasonably to be expected of the old.

But, as by the goodness of God every phase of life has its compensations as surely as its drawbacks, there must be sources of cheer and happiness possible even in declining years. There is the satisfaction and repose of certainty. In youth all life lies before us, a wild, surging sea of possibilities, amid which, bewildered, we know not which way to turn. Our crude, untried powers tempt us now this way, now that. Everything hinges on our decision, yet we know not which path leads to the success we mean to attain.

In old age the years lie behind us. In some fashion or other we have travelled through them. Our success may be largely of the kind indicated by Browning,—

"What I tried to be,
And was not, comforts me."

The years have done their worst and their best to us, and we have come out of the struggle bearing scars of battle thick upon us. But, at least, it is over; and we are what we are. An old Puritan on his death-bed said to Judge Sewall, "God does by us as a goldsmith,—knock, knock, knock, knock, knock, knock, to finish the plate." The knocks may have been many and sore to bear, but the plate is finished. We might wish it other and better, but there is a sense of rest in being through.

The "time for remembering" has come. The peaceful pleasures of retrospection await the old. By a merciful law of our nature, while past joys loom up with ever increasing brightness, we see past sorrows through a softening haze of distance. On many trials that seemed almost unbearable at the time we look back from the heights of age with the indulgent smile with which we comfort the little troubles of a child. Once they were so grievous: now they seem of such slight consequence. Possibly, after the change we call death, we shall look back on all our life here in the same spirit. Often, with the perspective lent by distance, we can see why it was good for us to have been afflicted; and, for the rest, we can trust the Love whose guiding hand we see so plainly now, looking back.

No doubt we should all agree with Jean Paul when he says to Poverty: "Be welcome, so thou come not too late in life! Preserve, just Providence, the old man from want! . . . I have no objection—since he has already made his best preparation for the other world—if now, in the morning, he should rejoice over his breakfast, and in the evening take comfort in his bed; and now, when he is a second time a child, the world should appear again under the innocent form of delight in which it first came before him." But if, unfortunately, the trials of narrow means, and, worst of all, a grudging dependence, befall the old, what remedy then? Always the remedy of patience. The patience often displayed by the old under trying circumstances is both beautiful and pathetic. It is a part of the peace which belongs to that border-land between two worlds, where they dwell. They, even more than others, may take to heart the lesson of the anecdote related by Sir Walter Scott in a letter to Lord Byron:

"A sultan once consulted Solomon on the proper inscription for a signet-ring, requiring that the motto be one equally adapted to moderating the presumption of prosperity and tempering the pressure of adversity. Solomon gave this motto, 'And this, too, shall pass away.'"

Because this is so especially true for them, the old can afford not to be selfish and grasping. Why clutch and grab, when the hand, even at longest, must very soon relax its hold on all earthly possessions? The serenity of giving up may belong peculiarly to the old.

What compensation for failing powers and the being set aside as no longer of use,—probably one of the sorest trials in advancing years to those who have been active and prominent? The first remedy is not to fail,—at least, to use every power you have as long as you can, keeping your faculties bright with use. An old friend, a retired minister, wrote a sermon weekly during his life, as conscientiously as if expecting to preach it. It was he who read the hard books in the village library,—the books for the few everywhere. He kept up with the most advanced thought of the day, and rejoiced "in the sunshine that would be when he should see it no more." His mind was in unimpaired vigor when, on his ninety-second birthday, the light of life flickered gently in the socket, and went out.

Lucretia Mott, unable to thread her needle, said to George Combe, "Thee sees I am growing old." "So you may be," he replied. "But, then, the last thing we should do is to admit that, and so give time the vast advantage of our will. We should fight for our powers, I think, as we have to fight for everything best worth holding."

No doubt we all make a great mistake in, as it were, welcoming age, in saying we are old, especially that we are "too old" to do thus and so. We need not affect juvenility: neither need we court old age. Often, if we should analyze this plea of old age, we should find it but a form of indolence to be resisted now, as ever. In spite of Jean Paul, we must beware of rejoicing in our breakfast, and taking comfort in our evening bed too soon. We are never too old to do anything we can. An old lady whom I knew took up oil-painting after she was seventy, and became quite an artist, whose fruit pieces were admired and sold; while her husband, not to be outdone, at the same time studied medicine, and hung out his sign with all the confidence of youth. Their spirit was certainly commendable.

We should try not only to retain the powers and accomplishments. we already possess, but to acquire new ones. One of the keenest delights in life is to develop a new power. I always sympathize with the serene joy diffused over the face of the white-headed old gentleman who spins by me on his bicycle, while I admire his wisdom in not thinking he was "too old" to learn. If we do not wish to be laid on the shelf as useless, we must be of use. The world teems with good causes suffering for help; and we can always do something to aid if we will. To be sympathetic and interested and eager to help the world while we stay in it is one sure recipe for a cheerful, happy old age.

And another is the love of nature. Those who love nature carry within themselves a source of happiness that nothing can dim, that will only increase with advancing years. "The world seems more beautiful to me every year I live," said a friend who was soon to lay down a long life that had known many sorrows. Always will there be radiant sunsets and morning dawns, river meadows and mountain heights, October foliage, wild flowers nodding in forest depths or along pleasant country roadsides, pine woods, spring's tender haze of new leaves, the ocean's wide expanse; and more and more, as the years go on, do we feel something underlying all this beauty and glory, something inexpressible, yet more real than the things we call tangible,—the peace of God, which fills and uplifts our hearts as we stand in his holy places. To those who are "stepping westward" it is hardly imagination which perceives a hint of the glories of the next world in the dear, familiar beauty of this.

One desiring a cheerful old age should be sure to have grandchildren,—if not his own, then some one's. Grandchildren are certainly a wonderful and delightful provision for brightening the end of life. A little girl, laying her rose-leaf of a hand beside her grandmother's, wrinkled with age, said, "Your hand is old, grand-mamma; but mine is new." Thanks be to God that into the end of our lives come these little ones, full of eager interest in the world which has become "a tale that is told" to us. Life has a fresh charm as we view it through these bright "new" eyes. "The eternal child dwells in fine natures," said De Quincey. The child's instinct detects the immortal boy lurking under grandpapa's white hairs, and finds in him his best comrade. Grandpapa is old: that is a way grandpapas have; but he has so much leisure, and who so sure as he to appreciate the new cart or kitten or whatever is the child's absorbing interest? It never occurs to the child that grandpapa or grandmamma are not beautiful. They are always charming and delightful to him.

The many friends that have fallen by the way and vanished from our sight,—those loved more dearly than ourselves, without whom our lives must go but maimed and broken to the end,—is there any possibility of cheer as the aged think of these? Yes, if always we cling to the joy of having had these dear ones. What love God showed in giving us all the happy years brightened by their presence! The Love which gave could not have taken away wantonly or cruelly, but because it was best for them and for us that they should go first, while we must stay awhile. But the aged can truly say, "Because the way is short, I thank thee, O my God!"

Rarely do those "outlive their usefulness" who, not suffering their powers to fail from indolence and luxurious pampering, love more and more the beauty of this beautiful world; who rejoice in all new movements to help man's progress, aiding them so far as possible; who keep the mind bright with high thoughts from good books, the heart warm with the love of little children; who, indeed, cultivate a lively interest in human beings generally; above all, whose souls are filled with that ever-present consciousness of God's love which gives repose for this life and trust for the next. The peace of God that passeth understanding fills their hearts with quiet sunshine to the last. The dying year wanes to a December close, only to usher in a joyous New Year, full of larger possibilities. The sun sets, but its radiant afterglow hints the glories of the coming dawn. The autumn leaf, bright to the last, falls from the tree, but only because pushed off by the eager new life crowding behind, the bud already formed, ready to expand in the tender warmth of the quick coming spring-time.

MYTHS AND THEIR USES.

BY J. LEONARD CORNING, SR.

If I should gather up the fruits of years of study in the story of art into a single moral inference, I would put that inference into the following proposition: the practical worth and beneficent power of a religious faith is not to be measured by its objective truthfulness, which is only another way of saying that the mythical element in the faiths of mankind has had its uses, and still continues to be an important factor of spiritual culture and influence. I was thankful, after years of study and reflection, to find this to be historically true; and I wonder that I was so slow in its discovery. I was forty years old before I read that noble sentence in Plato's Republic, in which he makes confession of his disbelief in the myths of the conventional religion of his time, but likewise takes pains to add that, as long as these myths seemed useful to the people, he would not by word or deed attempt to destroy them, or in any way to diminish their moral influence. Had I read those words twenty years before, and duly reflected upon them, a well-meaning ministry would have been saved from much useless and, mayhap, hurtful iconoclasm. I remember well in those unripe days how sturdily I smote at old faiths with my battle-axe, as soon as those faiths ceased to be true to me, never once thinking that they might possibly be true to several other people, and useful as well. I know very well that myths, like people, often outlive their usefulness, surviving in formulas and ceremonial customs out of which much of vital credence has departed. But, looking at the history of religion as a whole, I find that, when a myth has really ceased to do any practical good in the world, it makes ready to get out of the world, and give place to some faith, whether objectively true or false, which is better suited to the wants of the time.

It was my good fortune several years ago to visit Greece, and the week that I passed in Athens and its environs I have written down as the golden week of my life. There is no spot on this earth so populated with visible memorials of the grandest epochs of history as Athens. And probably there is no spot so populated with glorious memories of dead and almost forgotten faiths. When Paul preached his memorable sermon on the Areopagus, he could have thrown a stone over to the Acropolis. The architectural and sculptural glories of that historic citadel were then in a good state of preservation, albeit nearly five centuries old.

I have often wondered if it ever occurred to Paul, as he looked from his improvised pulpit under the very shadow of the Acropolis, to ask of history what faiths and their consequent moral consecrations were responsible for the wonderful architectural creations before him. I wonder if he had the curiosity to ask under what moral and religious inspirations the Parthenon was built, and the Propylæa and the Erechtheion and the Temple of Nike Apteros, to say nothing of the thousands of sculptural marbles and bronze statues with which that sacred area was crowded. Already the faiths here so grandly materialized were sick unto death, and for long centuries they have been only antiquarian curiosities. But, when they were vital in the heart of Greece, they showed themselves equal to grander achievements of their kind than the world has ever known before or since. We call them myths; and such they were, and religious myths as well. But, unlike some Christian myths that I can think of, they had the good fortune to be profoundly believed, else they would have been as infirm in moral power and practical results as many Christian myths have come to be.

We will leave Paul with his sick patient on Mars' Hill, and take a ride—or walk, as you please—to the field of Marathon. Possibly, Paul might have taken half a day and gone out there; but it is far more likely that he left it out of his itinerary, as he was in Athens on quite another errand than sight-seeing. At the battle of Marathon the Persians outnumbered the Greeks in a proportion of ten to one. But the Greeks had a celestial inspiration, and the Persians hadn't anything celestial to speak of. On the morning of the critical day in the most decisive battle of antiquity, Miltiades thought he saw the spirit form of Theseus floating in the sky and beckoning the Greeks on to victory. He told his vision to his captains, and they told it to the soldiers; and, with almost telegraphic celerity, it spread throughout the entire army, till everybody heard of it, and probably nearly everybody saw it. Theseus, you know, was, in the popular legends, the founder of the Grecian nationality, albeit it is doubtful if such an individual ever lived; and, if he ever did live, the vision of his materialized spirit was, like many similar visions of our own day, a creature of subjective imagination, but objectively a fiction. And so the myth of Theseus, with its surprising inspirations, gave to history the grandest victory of antiquity in its influence upon the tide of modern civilization. I doubt if Paul thought of that. On the contrary, it is presumable that he considered the religion of which he was so noble a champion as the only one on earth entirely exempt from mythical mixtures, whose mission it was to banish from the earth all the myths of the past. This little reminiscent word of history shall suffice to suggest the one thought which I would like to lodge in the minds of my readers,—that the religious myths of old pagan peoples have had noble uses, and, when their mission was accomplished, they seemed to be endowed with a sense of the fitness of things, and took their exit from the realms of living faith.

And now for a brief concluding word as to Christian myths and their uses. Is there a Christian myth? Of course there is. We who are Protestants recognize its existence among the Catholics; but not a great many of us recognize such a thing as a Protestant Christian myth, of which I am persuaded quite a number of representative examples could be cited. Of the myth discoverers within the pale of Orthodoxy, perhaps Prof. Briggs may be regarded as a sort of Columbus, whose path over the sea will probably be followed by a host of navigators of lesser grade, on the score of scholarship and moral courage. But the myths of Christianity, whether they be Catholic or Protestant, will die of themselves when their time comes; and some of them, conserved in verbal and ceremonial formulas as regards the shell, seem already to be anæmic at heart, and making ready for respectable funerals. As we lay them away one by one in their sepulchres, let us not forget the good things which they wrought in the transitional term of their existence, when they were slowly and unconsciously making ready for the emancipation of faith and the dawning of freedom's long day.

Munich, Bavaria.

NEW YORK LETTER.

An abstract of Mr. Savage's National Conference sermon reached New York several days before Washington began to be besieged by the Unitarians. One ringing sentence in it so fitly and grandly stated the motive that has led to arranging some "Forward Movement Meetings," to be held in Brooklyn early in November, under the auspices of the Middle States Conference, that to quote the sentence is to reveal the heart and soul of the Brooklyn programme. Mr. Savage says: "With such a gospel as ours, we ought not to rest until we have made it known to every man and woman in all the world. We are unworthy of such a divine message if we are content to take it, and rejoice in it alone. Let us not be content, even if it were possible, to enter into any heaven, in this world or in any other, so long as one poor soul is wandering and stumbling in the darkness outside." After such a statement, it is needless to say that Mr. Savage is himself to be one of the speakers in Brooklyn at the first of the meetings. There are to be three in all, held on successive Sunday evenings, November 3, 10, 17, at the Aurora Grata Cathedral, corner of Bedford Avenue and Madison Street,—a section of the city never before reached by Unitarian preaching. At the first meeting Rev. Samuel A. Eliot of the First Church in Brooklyn and Rev. John W. Chadwick of the Second Church will aid Mr. Savage in convincing their hearers that Unitarianism is the "forward movement" needed to-day. A week hence two others of our ministers, with Rev. S. M. Crothers of Cambridge, Mass., will talk upon the influences that have brought about "The Religious Situation of To-day"; while on the following Sunday evening Rev. Robert Collyer, Rev. Stephen H.

Camp, and "Rev." George W. Stone, as our new treasurer is beginning to be called, will enlarge upon our own beautiful text, "that Unitarianism is the religion of Jesus, as summed up in love to God and love to man."

It is hoped that the immediate effect of these meetings will be to interest some of Brooklyn's unchurched citizens in the three Unitarian societies so long established in the city, and that they will deepen and increase the loyalty and affection of all the Unitarians across the East River in other respective churches and their activities.

But the Middle States Conference is not going to let the opportunity escape of reaping a harvest and an aftermath as well in Brooklyn. The "Forward Movement Meetings" are to be quickly followed by the annual meeting of the conference in the First Church, on November 19, 20, and 21. The programme, covering three days, is too lengthy to be given in full; but it is a good one, of a strongly missionary character. Possibly, its most attractive feature may prove to be the Thursday afternoon session, when there will be personal testimonies from four of our ministers as to how they came out of Orthodoxy, and how they hope to lead others out. Rev. J. W. Scott (Baptist), Rev. W. M. Brundage (Methodist), Rev. S. R. Calthrop (Episcopalian), and Rev. James C. Hodgins (Presbyterian) are the men who will give their experiences. Mr. Batchelor and Mr. Stone are coming on from Boston to take part in the programme.

It is a good thing that there is no American authority who can issue decrees forbidding those of differing faith to take part in religious conventions, as Pope Leo XIII. has just forbidden the Catholics; for, if there were, Rabbi Gottheil and Rev. Dr. Crowe of the Universalist Church would be missing from the "outside talent" which will address the conference. Certainly, the stay-at-homes, who would fain have gone to the National Conference, have got a good deal of pleasure and profit ahead of them.

In view of the coming elections, it is dreadfully hard, just now, to get away from politics. It is only the careful readers of the press who can untangle the snarl into which local option has thrown reformers, Republicans, and Democrats. Much to Dr. Parkhurst's disgust and just wrath, the killing of the Tammany tiger has become a secondary issue, and the Sunday laws have taken its place. Most of the members of the German-American Reform Union, whose votes did so much to elect the reform candidates last fall, have gone over to the enemy's camp; for they want their Sunday beer, and Tammany has promised to give it to them. The Reformers and the machine Republicans have agreed to lie down peacefully together, and a fusion ticket is the result; while the "Good Government Clubs" have gone off on a tangent of their own, and have put forward their own candidates. No wonder that it is difficult for Dr. Parkhurst and a few others to keep heart and patience, and to leave the issue to the people at the polls!

Next to the all-engrossing "political situation" comes the interest of the public in the reopening of the educational institutions. The annual report of President Low of Columbia was pleasant reading for the friends of the university, which began its one hundredth and forty-second year on October 7. It is the president's wish that henceforth it shall be known as "Columbia University," or the "University of Columbia College," and that the School of Arts shall be known as the "College." The faculty has lost a beloved and prominent member in the late Prof. Boyesen, who was literally snatched to heaven, as the poet puts it, so sudden and unexpected was his sad death. His three young sons have been made wards of the university by its board of trustees, and will receive their education free of cost.

Next year Columbia hopes to open its fall term in the new buildings on Morning Side Heights. To-morrow, the 19th, its youthful rival, the University of the City of New York, which is only sixty years old, opens its new buildings some distance above Columbia, and on the east side of the Harlem River, at what is now called "University Heights." Great preparations have been made to make the occasion conspicuous. Gov. Morton is expected to be present; while Mayor Strong is announced for the dedication of the fine athletic field, which will throw open its cinder track, a quarter of a mile in length, to bicyclists for the first time. A part of the dedicatory exercises will be the breaking of ground for a new library. Its architect is Stanford White, a graduate of the university, as was his father, Richard Grant White. The last work done by Richard M. Hunt was to look over Mr. White's plans at his request, and to suggest some additional architectural details.

The colored kindergarten, of which mention was made last winter, has also reopened its small doors to the tiny folk of the neighborhood. Mrs. James H. Morse, one of our prominent Unitarian women, is a sort of mother superior to this kindergarten; and she is about to make an appeal for funds to keep it open during the coming season. One session of the New York League is to be devoted to a discussion of the social position and rights of the colored people. Mrs. Morse is to be chairman of this meeting. In connection with this subject, it is worth mentioning an unusual sight which was seen in our streets the other day. Among a gang of workmen mending the pavement were four colored men. The latter have been so constantly ostracized as workmen by city departments that this change in policy augurs a better intelligence or heart at the head of affairs.

New York has gained a new art treasure in one of Turner's masterpieces, his famous painting, "St. Mark's Place, Venice." It is now on exhibition at the Avery Gallery, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street. Mr. Avery purchased it in England this summer, paying $50,000 for his treasure. One is surprised to find less splendor of color and carelessness of form in this than, it is said, is found in the other Venetian canvases of Turner. Venice appeared to him "a city of rose and white, rising out of an emerald sea against a sky of sapphire blue"; but he has left out the gorgeous iridescence of St. Mark's, and it rises white and misty under an early evening sky, while the setting sun sends a flush of color over the crowd surging in the open Place. The perspective of the vanishing vista of palaces and the warm night air are rare examples of technical skill.

M. A. M.

THE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

When Mr. Lord suggested that Providence had given the Sunday School Society better weather than Newport furnished last year, he did not refer entirely to heavenly rulings; for Rhode Island hospitably received the society again within her borders, and the city of Providence was besieged by those eager to accept the wide invitation "to all individuals." People had been asked to provide a night's hospitality for a hundred expected guests. Thrice that number descended upon the Unitarian fold, and received the most delightful care and kindness. The two great churches were filled, one for the evening session and one for the day meetings; and the five hundred or more were not only amply fed at the material collation, but an abundant mental and spiritual repast was spread before the multitude. Four religious bodies were represented by the speakers,—Universalist, Congregationalist, and Jewish, as well as Unitarian. Boston and vicinity furnished most of those who took part in the exercises; but Maine sent Mrs. S. C. Beach and London lent Dr. Herford, whose contribution on "The Minister and the Sunday-school" was full of pleasant autobiographical touches.

Instead of a sermon for the opening evening, there were three good essays by Messrs. Pulsford, Van Ness, and Cuckson. Mr. Pulsford spoke on "The New Criticism"; and the belated ministers who think that the results of the higher criticism of the Bible should be confined to the clergy, and not shared with ordinary folk, ought to have heard him. One of the main hindrances to high living, said Mr. Pulsford, is the lack of clear ideas. And nowhere are clear ideas so much needed as regards the Bible. Nearly all of us are troubled with the disease of muddle-headedness about the Bible. It is a disastrous disease. The higher criticism, instead of being, as some think, bent upon the destruction of religion, is a bitter enemy, not to religion, but to muddle-headedness; and in the Sunday-school, if we are to have any power over the moulding of the characters of the children, it will be a great help. Indeed, in one sense, we may say that the higher criticism has rediscovered the Bible. Since the ban was taken off from inquiry, it is possible for us to know what the Bible is, and to have clear ideas about it. The higher criticism is doing for the Bible what the skilled picture-cleaner does for a canvas that has been changed by additions of paint and by quantities of varnish. So long as you try to look at the Bible through the thick varnish of ancient ecclesiasticism, the story of Jonah, for instance, may seem to you as wonderful as the stories of the Gospels. You learn the comparative value of the different parts of the Bible, and how to use it as a whole. The young girl who binds herself to read a certain number of verses or chapters of the Bible daily that she may read it through in a given time, who goes to a cold room at the end of the day, and, driven by conscience, reads the portion assigned by the table which she follows, perhaps a bit of the Song of Solomon or an imprecatory Psalm, hastening through it, and then tumbling into bed, where she may forget the indistinct impression she has received, is handling the Bible in an absolutely useless way. The higher criticism takes away our false ideas, and lets us see in its beauty and freshness that we are reading the story of how out of the early darkness men groped their way to that genius for religion of which Jesus Christ was born.

The new criticism rediscovers the Bible as literature. It makes the prophets no longer dead dummies, but living men. It puts meaning into the Psalms. You come to understand that the Psalms were the passionate utterance of hearts speaking out of the ignorance and dimness of their vision, but also out of the fulness of their hope. And these clearer ideas help us to feel the beauty and truth of the Bible.

Again, the new criticism discloses the fact that the Bible falls into line with the greatest of human thoughts,—the thought of evolution. The story is of ever-growing light. The golden age was not in the time of Moses. The story of the Bible is the story of the universe, which is an unfolding of God when you rightly understand it. God works ever from the lower to the higher. In this study you catch gleams of a dawn to come, fairer even than our dreams.

To bring this back to the Sunday-school. Is it not essential that the children should have clear ideas about the magnificent literature which we use as a text-book? They should know that the Bible is not a dead, supernatural, unnatural thing; but it is a story of men like ourselves, who were making endeavors for a higher life, from whom we may learn lessons in life. Then is it not all important that we teach the children to look forward, to know God, not as an Almighty Non-person, something, somewhere, way out of sight, but as the great Heart beating in our hearts, the great Spirit lifting our spirits? That is where the Bible may become life and power, filling the imagination of the children with the stories of heroes who sought for strength and divine guidance, and so making life real to them, teaching them that we are all on the great road which begins in the darkness and ends in a glory which we cannot yet understand. Let them feel that the prophets are our brothers, that the psalmists are kindred of theirs; that the men whom we have looked at as far-away, impossible creatures are of the same stuff as we are; that we may learn to dream the dream and live the life of Jesus; that we may grow strong in our own time because we find how men were strong in the darkest hours, and were able to press forward for truth, for life, for God, for the laying in human hearts of that kingdom whose strength is righteousness, whose inspiration is love, whose lord and master is Jesus Christ. These are some of the things which criticism, free and fearless, loving God and truth, will do for us, that we may do it for those who are to fill our places when we have passed on.

Mr. Van Ness's paper was full of practical advice. He began by taking the ground that the object of the Sunday-school is to fit children for citizenship in the kingdom of God. He would have the school-room bright, cheerful, flooded with sunshine, material as well as spiritual. The children should find it a place of delight, a place of education, and a place where they should have a chance to learn practical philanthropy. There should be red-letter days, devoted to the study of the lives of great and good men and women. There should be review days, if possible on some other day than Sunday, when the lessons learned should be illustrated by photographs of persons and places or by stereopticon views. He emphasized the importance of teachers' meetings, and of the necessity of what might be called home rule in the Sunday-school. That is, the children should be allowed to vote on subjects coming up for decision, including the expenditure of money, the purchase of books, and the giving of picnics and parties. This is an education in itself, and will be of great help when they graduate into the church and become members of the older congregation.

Rev. John Cuckson took up the relation of the home to the Sunday-school, and showed how hard it is to train children in reverence when the tone of the home is irreverent. Yet the development of the religious nature is the vital thing in every child's education. He made a strong plea for more religious culture in the home.

These three addresses were so fine that many of the listeners would have been satisfied, had they been all. But Thursday was brimful with equally good things. There was, first, the address by Dr. Herford; then an excellent paper on "Woman and the Sunday-school," by Mrs. S. C. Beach; one on the line of work in the orthodox Congregational Sunday-schools, by Mr. C. N. Goodrich; and in the afternoon another trio by Rev. James De Normandie, Rev. S. H. Roblin (Universalist), and Rev. C. F. Dole. Mr. De Normandie spoke on "The Value of Bible Study," using Jonah as an illustration. His paper will assuredly set people to reading that much abused book. In the same way, Mr. Dole's address must have made catechisms seem as attractive for study as Browning's poems; while Mr. Roblin's clear-cut and altogether admirable address must make for unity of spirit and purpose in all liberal Sunday-schools.

There were several notable features about the meeting. One was that the time limit was observed to a minute, from first to last. In that respect it was one of the most moral meetings the Register's scribe ever attended. There was absolutely no theft of time on the part of any one. Then there was uniform excellence throughout. No one star eclipsed another in glory, but all shone with serene and even light. Mr. Horton presided with wit and geniality from the great perch of a pulpit, which, like Mohammed's coffin, seems suspended twixt heaven and earth. The treasurer's report showed a balance in the treasury, and the president's report was full of cheer and promise. On the whole, the meeting well matched the rich October day.

BUSINESS RECORD.

The following Committee on Credentials was appointed: Messrs. H. D. Sharpe, Johnson, Tingley, Billings, and Mrs. Bagley. The report of the Committee on Nominations was made by Rev. G. H. Young, and was accepted; and the following persons were elected by ballot: Rev. Edward A. Horton, Boston, president; Rev. Richmond Fisk, D.D., East Boston, Mr. Robert C. Metcalf, Boston (Roxbury), vice-presidents; Mr. Edwin J. Lewis, Jr., Boston, clerk; Mr. Richard C. Humphreys, Boston, treasurer. For directors to serve three years, 1895-98: Rev. William H. Fish, Jr., Dedham, Mass.; Mr. Frank A. Page, Wollaston, Mass.; Mrs. Clara Beatley, Roxbury, Mass.; Rev. Charles E. St. John, Pittsburg, Pa.; Rev. Allen G. Jennings, Toledo, Ohio.

Messrs. Tripp, Baldwin, and Billings were elected a committee to choose a Nominating Committee for the ensuing year, the nominations to be printed in the Christian Register at a suitable time. This committee was afterward elected as follows: Rev. J. C. Jaynes, Rev. C. G. Ames, C. H. Sheldon, Miss Hannah Kimball, and Rev. E. J. Prescott.

SALT LAKE CITY TO-DAY.

BY ELLA A. GILES.

On reaching Salt Lake City, every faculty takes on new alertness. The mind is aroused to fresh activity. For the moral, social, and political atmosphere is surcharged with questions. When will the Territory of Utah, of which Salt Lake City is the soul and centre, become a State? What will Congress do? What position will Cleveland assume? Can women vote on the formation of the constitution? What will be the effect of woman suffrage if the ballot is given to all the ex-wives and their children who live in non-polygamous Utah to-day? An optimist sees that the disintegrated forces of the old régime are now working for good as well as harm, and that ultimately the good will prevail. Advantages will grow out of the disadvantages from which Salt Lake City must suffer for a time, as having been the seat of polygamy.

At the present period of certain progress, modern Salt Lake may be studied with even more interest from a political than a social standpoint. In everything to be attempted, to be accomplished, to be discussed, to be settled, one factor is sure to arise,—women. Not woman, but women! They refuse to be silenced or ignored. On first arriving at Salt Lake, the writer was invited to a woman's Democratic reception, as it was called. There were several hundred ladies present. Three men were discovered eating ice-cream and chatting with the well-dressed, even ultra-fashionable throng in the handsome parlors. Two of the men were famous public speakers. The third was a registrar. He was constantly surrounded with fluttering fans and bright ribbons, amid which he looked self-complacent and not at all embarrassed, as he wrote name after name in his official book. It was presumed that all reluctant women who did not at once register would do so after hearing the eloquent addresses of the men and women selected to convince or convert them. Opposing factions of women have been very active for months. A test case in the Supreme Court, relating to the right of a woman to vote on the formation of the constitution, has been somewhat discouraging; but the two parties, Democratic and Republican, are alike hopeful, eager, determined, and methodically busy. In the women's political clubs are both Mormons and Gentiles. They work together harmoniously. They are forgetting personal or religious differences in their desire to gain the ballot for women when Utah's Statehood is established.

This possible early admission of Utah as a State induces the usual revolutionary ideas in all conceivable lines. The air is full of new ambitions, new hopes, new systems. There is the constant clash, too, of personal, self-seeking interests. It is said that there is no longer hostility between the Saints and Gentiles; that, after twenty-five years of strife, they are tolerant. But new political lines divide them, and human nature asserts itself in envyings and purely selfish aims and purposes. While barriers are broken down between warring religious sects, and Mormons cheerfully announce that the Church has gained rather than lost by the abolishment of polygamy, other barriers of bitterness and hatred are being built among the Mormons themselves by partisan greed. In matters relating to the work of the Chamber of Commerce, however, the Mormons and Gentiles are hand and hand; and mineral resources, coal, natural gas, manufactures, products, and irrigation enlist general and enthusiastic attention.

New homes have been created by the cessation of polygamy, and the social and artistic impetus thus given make Salt Lake a charming place for a stranger to visit. Such must be shown both the old and the modern public buildings and private residences. The Tabernacle must be marvelled at, and the New Temple must be admired. The latter, recently dedicated, was forty years in building, and cost five million dollars. It is sacred to the elect. The Gentile can gaze and wonder, but may not enter the sanctuary.

The conditions of the Unitarian movement in Salt Lake City are entirely unlike those in any other part of the country. Rev. Adelbert L. Hudson, the very popular representative of liberalism in this region of superlatively orthodox growths, thinks Salt Lake a most promising field for his work. His views are substantially those already given in this article. But they may be fitly used as a summary in trying to mirror the Salt Lake City of to-day. In Mr. Hudson's opinion, "the more" intelligent Mormons, who break away from blind, superstitious obedience to the dictation of the elders, and begin to do some of their own thinking, find no congenial church home except in a rational religion which seeks to preserve all that is true and sacred in the religion of the past brought into harmony with all that is clear and rational in modern thought." More than one-third of Mr.

Hudson's Unitarian congregation and membership is made up of ex-Mormons, including some of the brainiest business men in Salt Lake City. Very few converts from the Mormon fold are found in the other Gentile churches. And, again, the Gentiles who come to Salt Lake have, in many cases, left their creeds and associations behind. In most instances they have been gradually growing out of the limitations of orthodox theology, but have been kept in the orthodox churches by the force of family and social ties. On coming here, if they unite with any church at all, they are apt to turn to one in which they can consistently uphold their real beliefs.

Mr. Hudson takes a practical interest in all local discussions, and intelligently answers many of the important questions which the Utah metropolis is perpetually asking. He admits candidly that the "woman suffrage question seems on the surface to be more complicated here than elsewhere on account of the influence of the Mormon Church over Mormon women." But this difficulty is, he thinks, seeming and temporary rather than real and permanent. In referring to it, he stated the results of his own observations as follows:—

With the passing away of the older generation the Mormons will cease to be a peculiar people. They are rapidly assimilating with the common life, now that isolation and persecution are no longer present to weld them together. The spirit of the time is as potent in Salt Lake as in New York or Boston, and Salt Lake rules Utah. Even the new fads and conventions in thought and taste and manners spring up and meet you here, along with the new styles in hats and bonnets. There is an eager desire here to be up to date, and this alone will make church domination difficult. Moreover, the women both in and out of the Mormon Church are showing a disposition to investigate public questions for themselves in preparation for the coming responsibility; and such a spirit will not submit to church dictation. Any effort of the elders to control their political action will tend to weaken their own authority and disintegrate the church. They will doubtless attempt it. Old systems rarely change to fit themselves to new conditions. And this will introduce for a time a complicating and demoralizing element into the political life of the new State. But the muddle will clear itself; and the moral power of liberated womanhood will be, upon the whole, a healthful factor in solving the problems that lie before us.

The writer has most heartily enjoyed sojourning in this lively city, full of society events, concerts at the Tabernacle or Beehive, where five hundred well-trained Mormon voices unite in magnificent choruses, trips to the great resort, Saltair, which for rich and poor, aristocrat and plebeian, Mormon and Gentile, old and young, is a rendezvous unrivalled elsewhere in America for the immensity of its ball and assembly-room, the saltiness of its lake, and the indigo blueness of its sunset skies. At no time, perhaps, in all its unique history, could a visit to Salt Lake City have been more satisfactory than the present. While political pyrotechnics abound and surprise one in all public places and in all private homes, while the new order of life has crowded out the old to all outward appearances, still there remains the inquisitive spirit which leads one to ask questions audaciously. The answers all touch upon three features of Salt Lake City life,—that of the past, the present, and the future. The spectator grows more confused. For most emphatically the bright Salt Lake City of to-day means that of a dark yesterday, and by no means a quite cloudless tomorrow.

THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

The assistant secretary and Miss Close are in charge of everything at headquarters this week. The secretary and treasurer are in Washington, serenely confident that everybody and everything will be cared for during their absence. It is too early at this writing to speak of anything that the Conference has done, but that it will strike some blows that will tell for the truth as we understand it.

The new books this week are as follows: "Parables by the Lake," by W. H. Thomson, M.D., LL.D. (Dr. Thomson is a son of Dr. Thomson, author of "The Land and the Book.") The author of this book was born and spent his youth in the land of Palestine. It will no doubt have a wide reading. Price $1.50. "The Christ of To-day" is by Rev. George A. Gordon, minister of the Old South Church, Boston. This is not the place to discuss this book. Probably it will receive attention from our Unitarian writers in due time. The book is attracting considerable attention from Unitarians, especially that part of it which alludes to them in the chapter on "A Supreme Christology." It is difficult for a plain layman to understand why the men who can say such things as are said in this book—and there are many of them—cannot take their places under the Unitarian name. "The Saratoga Declaration," which is the definite and unanimous expression of the Unitarian Church, surely covers all the very nice distinctions which Dr. Gordon draws between some of the "first great leaders" of Unitarianism and those who now carry its banners. It further appears that this book has much more in common with Unitarianism than it has with the Calvinistic theology. Why not all join hands under the simple declaration of love to God and love to man, and let theological opinions be determined by each individual? No doubt the fathers were good and wise, but wisdom did not die with them. Light will continue to break forth from the word till time shall be no more.

VISITS.

The last visit noted under this head was at Taunton. Wednesday, 16th, South Middlesex Unitarian Club, at Young's Hotel. A large number of "solid men" gathered about the table, and, after a good dinner had been disposed of, listened to Mr. Batchelor and Mr. Dole, with a few words from the treasurer sandwiched in between. Mr. Batchelor told them about the Washington Conference and what was expected of it, and exhorted them to go and help. Mr. Dole proposed an excellent plan for missionary work; to wit, make your own churches so helpful, so interesting, that all the world will want to get into them, so that they may enjoy with you the blessings and privileges so precious and so great. Thursday evening a guest at the "Harvard Club," in the parlors of the old Second Church, the students and ministers,—a club that should have the earnest, cordial, and regular help of our older ministers. This club is related to the Unitarian ministry, as the Sunday-school is related to the Church. The future work of the Church can be greatly moulded and influenced by this organization if it is only used.

Friday evening, First Parish (Dorchester) Unitarian Club,—a vigorous organization, with men in it adapted to every branch of its work, speakers, writers, poets, workers. No fear need be entertained that anything will be overlooked or neglected in this parish, where there is somebody to look after everything. If all our four hundred and fifty parishes were animated by the spirit that dwells in this old parish, we should conquer the world in time.

CONTRIBUTIONS.

Contributions to the American Unitarian Association will now be in order, and the treasurer hopes that the spirit of the Conference will so thoroughly inspire the Unitarians of the whole Church to move en masse along the missionary lines of our work that the contributions will come in as never before. Let every plan that is adopted for collecting these contributions have this feature,—that every Unitarian in the parish shall be personally asked to help. Taking up a collection on Sunday is the worst possible way to do it.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

WHAT UNITARIANS BELIEVE.

The question is often asked by those outside our Church, "What do the Unitarians believe?" and sometimes the impression is given that we do not have very strong or deep religious convictions. Often, too, those within the Church have similar impressions. One of my parishioners, reading the enclosed statement, said, "I like it, but I thought Unitarians had no creed." "I think that is a mistake," I replied: "we have a thousand creeds. We believe in all things true and good." Will you not print the enclosed service used at the First Unitarian Church, Somerville, last Thursday evening, as one of the many statements of the things commonly believed among us? W. H. PIERSON.

SERVICE OF DEDICATION AND CREED.
Read responsively by the congregation and the minister.

DEDICATION.

Minister.—We dedicate this church, O Father, to thy name, to thy worship and truth, and to that religion which is love to God and love to man.

People.—Glory be to the Father, the High and Holy One, as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end!

Min.—We dedicate this church to righteousness, to freedom of thought, to the perfection of character, and to the service of our fellow-men.

Peo.—To these best and highest things we would now, O Lord, in thy name, dedicate this church.

Min.—We dedicate this church, O Father, to sacred human ties, to friendship and brotherhood, to love of children and youth, and their consecration to the service of this church, to the purity of home life, and to comfort and sympathy with all who mourn or are in sorrow or want.

Peo.—Peace be to young and old who enter here. For our friends, our brethren, and companions' sake, we will never cease to say, "Peace be within thee."

Min.—We dedicate this church to the blessed memory of those who have lived and labored with us and are no more. We dedicate it to those who shall worship and labor here after we are gone.

Peo.—So dedicate we this church. Our fathers thou hast called to thy higher praise, and gathered to their fathers must all the children be. The dead and the living, O God, praise thee.

Min.—We dedicate this church to undying hopes, to faith in things unseen and eternal, and to those moral and spiritual duties and influences to which we should be loyal above all things else.

Peo.—So dedicate we this church. O house of the Lord's praise, peace be to them that love thee!

THE CREED.

I believe in God, the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth.

So we believe.
I believe in Jesus, beloved prophet of God, born of Joseph and Mary, crucified under Pilate, author and founder of the Christian faith.

So we believe.
I believe in the Bible, book of religion, book of prayer and psalm, legend and history, and in every Scripture which shows not only the infirmity, but also the dignity and value of the human soul.

So we believe.
I believe in the Church, the Holy Church, throughout all the world, and in the spiritual fellowship of devout men of every race and clime.

So we believe.
I believe in the forgiveness of sin and in the grace of God,—though evil bears its penalty and pain,—and in that sympathy of man which is a foretaste and pledge of love divine.

So we believe.
I believe that out of sorrow cometh joy, out of darkness light, out of struggle success, and, amid all the mystery and trouble of earth, have hope of heaven and eternal peace.

So we believe.
I believe, for this present life, in the beauty of noble words and deeds, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are honest and just, whatsoever things are lovable, gracious, and of good report.

So we believe.

The Sunday School.

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—On Monday, October 14, the Union held its opening meeting of the thirteenth season at the Church of the Disciples. Mr. Frank B. Thayer of Boston, the new president, greeted the new members, and introduced Rev. A. M. Lord of Providence, who spoke on "Unsolved Sunday-school Problems." The problematic element in the Sunday-school is the challenging voice of the great world. To know what to teach grows more difficult as we find the religious use of other books than the Bible, and as we learn more and more about the nature of childhood. The problem of the relation of the Sunday-school to the church and of the church to the school may be solved if the church makes the school interesting and the school makes the church so. Each should be a recruiting ground for the other. Rev. A. P. Reccord of Chelsea considers the Sunday-school itself an unsolved problem, but thinks that reverent superintendents, an able corps of teachers appointed by a committee of the parish, and thoroughly instructive teachers' meetings would help us to solve it. Miss Glidden of Neponset finds one problem in the fact that so few men are engaged in Sunday-school work; another, in the indifference of the parents; a third, in the unwillingness of the children to accept a substitute teacher; a fourth, in the gap caused by young men and women leaving the church when married. Mrs. James Beatley enumerated several problems that she had encountered, but at the same time offered a solution of each. Rev. E. C. Guild of North Pembroke urged the teachers to impart religion by (1) having it themselves, (2) by means of sympathy, love, and effect of good example to the little ones. Rev. B. F. McDaniel of Newton thought we should not allow the schools to be simply an annex of the church, and we should use the guilds as a helpful agency in cultivating the affection of the young people for the church.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning: announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

REV. JOHN DUMONT REID, having satisfied the Committee on Fellowship of his fitness for the Unitarian ministry, is hereby commended to our ministers and churches. W. L. Chaffin, Chairman. D. W. Morehouse, Secretary.

ASHEVILLE, N.C.—Unitarians and other New England people who expect to spend the winter in Asheville and vicinity will find it to their advantage to open correspondence with our minister at Asheville, Rev. Henry A. Westall.

ATLANTA, GA.—The date of "Unitarian Women's Day" at Atlanta Cotton Exposition is changed from November 18 to an earlier time to accommodate those who attend the Washington Conference. It will be either the 30th or 31st of October.

BROCKTON, MASS.—The installation of Rev. Rush R. Shippen as pastor of the First Unitarian Society of Brockton, Mass., will take place on Thursday, October 31. Rev. Eugene R. Shippen will preach the installation sermon.

BROOKLINE, MASS.—Rev. John Snyder of St. Louis will preach in the First Parish Church in Brookline on Sunday, October 27.

CANTON, MASS.—Rev. Henry F. Jenks completed last summer ten years as pastor of the First Congregational Parish. Last Thursday being his birthday, the parish celebrated the double anniversary by a reception to Mr. and Mrs. Jenks in the pleasant parish parlor and a generous birthday gift.

CHELSEA, MASS.—The Unity Club of the First Unitarian Church offers for the ensuing winter three courses of study: "Social Science, based on Kidd's 'Social Evolution'"; "French Revolution, based on Dickens's 'Tale of Two Cities'"; and "Shakspeare." The club's reception to the new pastor, Rev. A. P. Reccord, on Wednesday, October 16, was like a reflected sound of "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" About one hundred and fifty persons were present, including Rev. George W. Cooke, agent of the National Bureau of Unity Clubs, and representatives from the Young People's Societies of the First Baptist, Cary Avenue Baptist, Horace Memorial, Central Congregational, Universalist, African Methodist Episcopal, Walnut Street and Mt. Bellingham Churches of Chelsea, and the Bethel of East Boston. Monday, October 14, under the auspices of the Women's Alliance, Rev. M. J. Savage lectured on "American Wit and Humor"; and on October 28 Rev. Thomas Van Ness will lecture on "Street Views and Incidents of St. Petersburg."

STOW, MASS.—A very pleasant social event in connection with the Unitarian society of this town occurred on the even-

WOULD YOU HAVE THE HANDSOMEST

GLOVES?

THEN WEAR ONLY THE GENUINE DUCHESSE,

Which come in all the popular styles, dressed and undressed Kid, button and Foster lace, long and short wrists,

And cost no more than other makes.

CALL AND INSPECT, OR SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

All Gloves fitted when desired, and every pair warranted.

CHANDLER & CO.,

SOLE AGENTS.

WINTER ST., BOSTON.

Agency Dr. Jaeger Sanitary Woollen System.

ing of October 4 at the house of Mr. Isaac Fletcher, when a company of over seventy of the parishioners of Rev. J. S. Moulton (who boards with Mr. Fletcher) surprised him, and presented him with a handsome pocket-book containing ten crisp five-dollar bills. The presentation was made by Mr. W. A. Wood, superintendent of the Sabbath-school, who stated that the cause of the gathering was the fact that Mr. Moulton had labored faithfully and successfully as their pastor for ten years. Following the presentation were very appreciative and touching remarks by the pastor, after which a bountiful repast was served.

WASHINGTON, D.C.—At a special meeting of All Souls' Church, held October 16, the resignation of the pastor, Rev. Rush R. Shippen, was accepted; and resolutions were passed bearing grateful testimony to his fidelity as a pastor, his energetic ministrations as a preacher, his consistent Christian life, and his influence throughout the city, and tendering to him and Mrs. Shippen assurances of enduring love and gratitude.

WEST DEDHAM, MASS.—Rev. Obed Eldridge has been obliged, on account of his health, to resign the charge of the Unitarian society in Dover, Mass.

MONTANA INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.—Rev. A. A. Spencer, in his report to the United States government, says: "The great event of the year to this school has been its transfer to the United States government. This was consummated on the first day of July, 1895. For nine years previously it had been conducted as a contract school between the American Unitarian Association and the United States government. But now, more and more, it has become the settled policy of the government to do away with all contract schools as soon as possible, and to assume full and exclusive responsibility for the education of its Indian wards. The American Unitarian Association has been prompt in recognizing the justness of this policy, and so has voluntarily surrendered the school into the hands of the government. The school buildings have been transferred at a mere nominal sum, and the school property sold to the government at a reasonable valuation. The school is now running under the immediate care, support, and control of the United States Indian agent at Crow Agency, Montana. This school will never lose the sincere good wishes of its founders and former friends. I am positive it is earnestly hoped by the American Unitarian Association and the denomination it represents that success and usefulness shall ever attend the school, and that its free, liberal, and unsectarian policy and its family system of administration, for which it has stood from the beginning, shall continue to be dominant and uplifting characteristics." Mr. Spencer might have added that the hope of the friends of the school for its continued prosperity are assured for the present, at least, by the retention of himself and his corps of workers in the positions they have filled so long and in so satisfactory a manner. Mr. Spencer and his family are deserving of the gratitude of the Unitarians of America for the self-denying faithfulness with which they have devoted themselves to this work. It is to be hoped that some friends of the school will keep up a feeling of interest, so far, at least, as to send some Christmas presents for teachers and scholars. Packages sent as early as November 15 by freight directly to Rev. A. A. Spencer, Custer, Mont., Northern Pacific Railroad, will reach the school in time to help on the Christmas merriment. Letters should be addressed to Mr. Spencer at Blakeley, Mont. No more contributions of money or clothing are needed for the school, as the United States government provides everything.

NATIONAL ALLIANCE.—On Friday, October 11, at 10.30 A.M., the Executive Board met at 25 Beacon Street, fourteen being present. The corresponding secretary reported 26 new Branches during the year. The total membership is now 7,684. A very interesting letter was read from Rev. Mr. MacCauley in Japan, which caused some discussion. Whether or not it is wise to have foreign missions, the Alliance is in sympathy with the solitary man representing Unitarianism in Japan. It was voted that the money on hand already appropriated for books for the library in Tokio should be expended at once, and that the Branches should be asked to send each at least $1 the coming year. The contributions need not be limited to $1, but that amount from each would supply all that are now asked for to complete the first requisition. One new life member, Mrs. J. W. Winkley, has been added to the list. The new "Study Class Leaflet" on "Unitarian Belief" has been distributed to the Branches, and additional copies may be had at 25 Beacon Street. The movement at Willimantic was discussed, and the needs of Chattanooga were also presented. Mrs. Chaney reported concerning the Unitarian booth at the Atlanta Exposition, and wished to urge as many of the Branches as could do so to send representatives to the fair. Letters from Miss Everett show that much interest in Unitarians is already awakened. Emily A. Fifield, Recording Secretary.

SOUTH MIDDLESEX CONFERENCE.—The eighty-ninth regular session of the South Middlesex Conference was held Tuesday, October 15, in Billerica. Rev. Loren B. Macdonald conducted the devotional service, taking for his subject "The Optimism born of Faith in God." At 11.40 A.M. the president took the chair, and, after the reading of the minutes of the last meeting, made a brief address of welcome and congratulation. There being no business before the conference, Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford was introduced, to speak on "What the Higher Criticism has done for the Bible." At the close of the address a collection was taken, amounting to $19.50. After the singing of a hymn, the conference adjourned till 2 P.M. The conference reassembled at the time appointed for the afternoon session; and, after a hymn had been sung and the roll of the churches called, Rev. Mr. Heizer opened the discussion of the morning subject. The discussion was continued by Rev. Messrs. McDaniel, De Long, Bygrave, Livingstone, Macdonald, Staples, Cooke, and G. C. Wright of Lowell. At 3 P.M. the conference adjourned.

CHANNING CONFERENCE.—The sixtieth session of Channing Conference was held in the Unitarian church, Norton, Mass., on the evening of October 8 and the following day. Rev. E. A. Horton preached the sermon to a well-filled house, taking for his text some passage in Isaiah about breaking down walls. The walls that are tumbling are the walls of sectarianism that separate reason from revelation, science from theology, the Church from the world, and life from death. The spirit of sympathy, of brotherhood, of co-operation, of hospitality of thought, is gradually levelling the old-time, hurtful barriers between religious believers. It augurs well for man. The Church is a necessity because the religious sentiment is an ineradicable part of humanity. The Church is to grow broader in its fellowship, and to become a more and more powerful factor among the forces which make for civilization. Stand by the Church, and help it to grow into its noblest form and service.

The next morning the devotional meeting was led by Rev. H. L. Buzzell of Fairhaven, who took for his theme the need of a deeper religious life. Rev. Messrs. Young, Hoagland, Furman, and Rev. Mary A. Leggett took part in the meeting. President Job C. Tripp opened the business hour of the conference with congratulations to the Norton society on the improved appearance of the church, which has been renovated inside and out recently. An interesting feature of the secretary's report was the reading of an autograph letter from Rev. Dr. James Martineau, sent in response to a vote of the conference at its last session, extending greetings to him, as was understood, on the occasion of his ninety-ninth birthday. I am sure the readers of the Christian Register would like to see it in print:—

"REV. WILLIAM H. SPENCER:—

"Dear Brother,—Among the many congratulatory greetings which cheer and bless the close of my ninety-ninth year, there is not any that speaks more home to my heart than the message which, enriched by your own and Mrs. Spencer's, you send me from the Channing Conference, as embodied in the resolutions passed at its recent fifty-ninth session. To influences shed on me in my youth from your country, and especially from Channing's early writings, I largely owe my 'call' to the ministry and the ultimate direction of my thoughts and aims in it. And nothing can be more welcome or more affecting to me than, at the end of my career, to receive, under the very seal of his name, a responsive benediction from the field of his labors and the disciple of his spirit. I tender through you and to you my heartfelt gratitude for so touching a recognition. If on a smaller scale and under the resistance of an older world, it has been granted to me in some measure to fan the flame which Channing kindled, and foster the pure fervors of his faith, life would have given me all that my most earnest prayer could ask.

"Ever truly yours,

"JAMES MARTINEAU.

"P.S.—No importance attaches to the relative dates of your resolution and my birthday. But the terms of your private letter seem to imply that Dr. Smith's, Dr. Hale's birthday, and mine coincide on April 3. Mine, however, is not due till April 21. Our beloved Dr. Furness, born on April 20, says, 'I know I am a day younger than you, but how many years older I cannot tell.' I am happy to be, anyhow, the associates of one or all these dear sharers of my longevity."

"35 London Square, London, W. E.,
"April 16, 1895."

The treasurer's report showed a balance on hand of $1,812.41, of which $1,045 has been appropriated for the prospective church in Vineyard Haven. We expected that church would materialize last spring in time for summer use; but the builder consulted estimated the cost of it $600 more than the architect's estimate, from plans submitted and accepted by the conference. The committee having the matter in charge did not feel authorized to pledge the conference to this extra cost without a formal vote upon it. This was obtained. A committee, consisting of Rev. Messrs. George W. Cutter, A. M. Lord, Paul R. Frothingham, President Tripp, and Treasurer Sheldon were elected to proceed as soon as practicable with the construction of a building suitable for the place, costing about $2,100. In response to a petition for a little temporary aid from the church in Brooklyn, Conn., $100 was voted, the same amount also to the church in Tiverton. The conference voted to raise by apportionment among our churches $600 during the year. The by-laws were amended so as to hold our spring meeting the last instead of the first Wednesday in April.

"How to enlist Young People in Church Work" was the topic for discussion. Rev. W. F. Furman opened the discussion with a carefully prepared paper. He emphasized the importance in home training in habits of devotion. Children should be taught a "living faith in God and in Jesus as the hope and goal of the world's salvation." Unity Clubs and church guilds, and even a pledge such as the Christian Endeavors take, are valuable auxiliaries of church and home influences. Rev. Mr. Forbes said he believed the root of the trouble was in the home. A mother said to him that she believed her child should be "left free to grow up as naturally and beautifully as the lilies of the field in religious matters." The speaker did not believe in such "horticultural Unitarians." Even the lilies needed cultivation. It is the duty of parents to have some beliefs about the great cardinal doctrines of deity, duty, and destiny, as Rev. Mr. Potter once characterized them. If they are indifferent to the church, the children will be to the Sunday-school. How to enlist the parents in church work is the deeper question.

The last regular speaker of the day was Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer. Mrs. Spencer said she did not covet such organizations as the Christian Endeavors for our young people of the liberal faith. It is not good for our young people to be alone, not good for them nor for the older people to be thus separated. They should work together.

Such organizations are stimulating and helpful in certain ways; but there are counterbalancing dangers, both social and religious, connected with them. The Sunday-school must do a large part of the education of our young people in the principles of our rational, spiritual religion; and, thanks to the Unitarian Sunday School Society East and West, we have a wealth of material with which to do the training. The Sunday-school, like the church, should stimulate and direct not simply how to get new carpets for our church and new gowns for our minister, but to go out in large, general philanthropies. The speaker deprecated the tendency seen among some Unitarians of copying the ways of a good many Episcopal churches in having "parish charities," emanating from "parish houses." Separate lines of this sort drawn in philanthropic work hinder the growth of true, scientific, civic charity. She had found the best method to be enrolling the young people in a Lend a Hand Club, and having the members year by year choose some city or State charity for which to work, thus schooling them in the performance of civic duties, tying on their church work to the great life of the world.

Devotionally, she believed our young people grow most healthfully in the spiritual life, not by any hot-house forcing of the religious sentiment and its expression by means of "pledges to take part in meetings," or by separate "young people's meetings," but rather by the use of rich liturgical forms, by companionship with devout elders, by required attendance upon the devotional part of the public worship (and excuse from the preaching, where this is practicable, in case of small children), and by all the means of spiritual culture which they can share with the parents.

It is difficult to solve the amusement problem. Our young people in cities, as a rule, have too much excitement, amounting to social dissipation, but not those in the country. The church should accommodate herself to local needs, remembering that whatever truly recreates, and makes mind and body fresher, stronger, and better equipped for useful work and the cheerful bearing of life's burdens, is right, and whatever enervates the moral purpose or weakens the mind or lessens bodily strength for daily tasks is wrong.

The subject being open for volunteers, several speakers addressed the audience. Rev. Mr. Lord and Mr. Frothingham thought, with Mrs. Spencer, that there was danger of fumbling too much with the emotional nature of children. Rev. Mr. Knapp half believed that the Sunday-school had hurt about as much as it had helped the church, by dividing the allegiance of the children. Perhaps more ritual, more of what appeals to the æsthetic sentiments, would attract more of the cultivated-youths. Rev. Mr. Mott believed the young should be taught more generally, so as to ground them thoroughly in the principles of our liberal faith.

While the different speakers laid stress on different agencies, they were quite agreed that the way to enlist young people in church work is to enlist them, to set them at work, put them early into responsible positions, make them feel that the church business is their business, and, above all, that its business has vital relations with the good of society, with the welfare of the State.

The discussion was divided in the middle by devotion to a bountiful collation served in the church vestry. Autumn leaves and flowers tastefully arrayed about the pulpit gave their benediction. The day was pleasant, and at every session a good-sized audience thoroughly enjoyed the exercises. The one-subject plan proved so satisfactory that it will be tried again. The president was empowered to appoint two delegates from the Channing Conference to the National Conference. He appointed Mrs. Spencer for one. The other is not known to the secretary at the time of writing. After a vote of thanks to the Norton society for their generous hospitality, the conference adjourned.

W. H. S., Sec'y.

If there is one truth truer than another, it is that no man or nation ever neglected a duty that was not sooner or later laid upon them in a heavier form, to be done at a dearer rate.—Lowell.

Business Notices.

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" relieve Throat Irritations caused by cold or use of the voice. The genuine sold only in boxes.

Are your eyes good? Do not trifle with them, but use a good Lamp; and no better can be found than the Miller, which gives a light at once strong, soft, and steady.

The china loving cup is the one thing this season that has taxed the dealers to keep up with, although its use is more as a flower-holder. China brush and comb sets and collar boxes are among the novelties at Jones, McDuffee & Stratton's.

An Interesting Sight.—A "Chair Exhibit" is now in progress at the Paine Furniture Company warerooms in this city. It is wonderfully interesting and well worth a visit. They have collected the most curious easy-chairs of all nations and periods, and placed them on sale. You can make some rare purchases in this exhibition at low prices.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

At Newton, 17th inst., by Rev. S. W. Bush, Rev. Philip S. Thacher, of Needham and Alice Morton, of Newton. At Clark's Island in Plymouth, 19th inst., by Rev. Charles P. Lombard, Albert M. Watson, Jr., and Henrietta C. Walker.

Deaths.

In Jamaica Plain, 30th ult., Mary A. Walker, widow of the late James P. Walker.
In Taunton, 15th inst., Mrs. William B. Crandell, in her 88th year.
In Minneapolis, Minn., 13th inst., William Abbot Pike, only son of Frances W. A. and the late Rev. Richard Pike, formerly of Dorchester.

MUSIC FOR CHOIRS

"Anthem Tribute"

By L. O. Emerson. Just published. A new anthem book of uncommon interest and excellence. The fifty-three compositions in the volume have been composed and selected for the especial use of amateur choirs, and will be found fluent, melodious, and impressive in a high degree. An attractive variety of theme and treatment is an especial feature.
Boards, $1.00, Postpaid.
Per doz. $9.00, Not Postpaid.

"McIntosh's Anthems"

A new collection of rare completeness and excellence. 110 pieces. Round or character notes.
Boards, $1.00, Postpaid.
Per doz. $9.00, Not Postpaid.

"Sunday Anthems"

By W. O. Perkins. Containing the latest choir music from the best sources.
Boards, $1.00, Postpaid.
Per doz. $9.00, Not Postpaid.

"Emerson's Easy Anthems"

Boards, 80 Cents, Postpaid.
Per doz. $7.20, Not Postpaid.

"Trowbridge Collection"

A comprehensive collection of standard music.
Boards, 75 Cents, Postpaid.
Per doz. $6.75, Not Postpaid.

"Emerson's Choice Anthems"

Boards, $1.00, Postpaid.
Per doz. $9.00, Not Postpaid.

"Gabriel's Anthems"

Boards, $1.00, Postpaid.
Per doz. $9.00, Not Postpaid.

Full descriptive circulars of any book, on application. Correspondence solicited.

Oliver Ditson Company
453-463 Washington St., Boston
C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

LIBERALISM AND ROMAN CATHOLICISM.*

BY REV. BROOKE HERFORD, D.D.

[Abstract of the Dudley Lecture delivered at Harvard University, Oct. 16, 1895.]

"The third lecture to be for the detecting and convicting and exposing the idolatry of the Romish Church, their tyranny, usurpations, damnable heresies, fatal errors, abominable superstitions, and other crying wickednesses in their high places; and, finally, that the Church of Rome is that mystical Babylon, that man of sin, that apostate church, spoken of in the New Testament."—Extract from the Will of Judge Paul Dudley, 1750.

As one reads the title of this lecture in the very words of Judge Dudley, one's first feeling is of wonder that even so late as a hundred and fifty years ago a thoughtful and educated man could write such words about any form of religion.

The wonder partly ceases when it is remembered that it was hardly as a form of religion that the Romish Church presented itself to the minds of New Englanders in the first half of last century. It was not till forty years after Paul Dudley's death that the first little Catholic church was set up in Boston. So that of the religious fervor and the quiet charities by which Catholicism has in later times won respect in England and America he could know little. To the men of his day it was simply a foreign ecclesiasticism which had claimed tremendous powers over the governments of Europe, and still pushed those claims wherever it could.

It is not surprising that in his old age, seeing the Puritan spirit of absolute exclusion beginning to give way, and looking onward to the possibility of Catholicism, even, sometime claiming an equal foothold in New England, he should desire that at least some intellectual argument should be permanently maintained against it in this great centre of New England education.

However, all that is past,—so past that it is a little difficult to realize that things ever were really so. Alike in America and England not only have the old exclusions and disabilities so long maintained against Catholics been removed, but they actually enjoy in these countries a freedom and a security greater than they have even in many Catholic countries. Especially what may be called the liberalism in each desires them to have the most entire freedom and equality, both of action and opportunity. Perhaps there could be no stronger instance of this larger modern spirit than the fact that, when these Dudley Lectures were revived a few years ago after a period of suspension, one of them was assigned to an eminent Catholic ecclesiastic. That was well. It was good to let the world know in such an unmistakable way that America—at any rate at the heart of its most progressive learning—no longer bears any grudge against Rome nor desires any "protection" except that of open argument and equal laws.

And yet, having shown that, and having given the first place to Catholicism's voicing of itself, it is perhaps as well for a word to be given,—not, indeed, from any antagonistic position, but from that calm and dispassionate standpoint which Harvard occupies to-day, whatever it may have done in Dudley's time. Catholics will certainly not regard it as an exaggeration if I say that the Church occupies an important public position. It is not simply a church analogous to the other churches of our time. It is a great public institution. No party, no statesman, can leave it out of account. Its claim is the most tremendous that is made by any church or institution in the world. The fact is, the claim of the Catholic Church is rarely understood by Protestants, and but imperfectly by many of its own adherents. It claims to be the representative of the Omnipotent Creator among men, and as such entitled to the same absolute submission as God himself. It is, indeed, over "faith" and "morals" that its authority is specialized; but, as "morals" have to do with almost every action and relation of life, and the Church itself is the sole judge of how far this jurisdiction applies, it practically means religious absolutism. The claim may not be pressed to this extent. It is seldom pressed to-day in England and America,—or, at least, it would be truer to say it is seldom pressed at first. The usual aspect of Catholicism in free countries is that of one of the churches, standing apart, indeed, but with a courteous word for others, and content to urge its antiquity, its lofty part in history, its stately ritual, and its offer of a sure resting-place from the perplexities and doubts of the human soul. But its larger and ultimate claim is always there; and, as individuals are drawn within its lines, its authority closes more tightly upon them, often in ways which touch not themselves alone, but the whole community of which they form a part. It is therefore, a matter of public concern that this great claim to the religious overlordship of the world shall be distinctly known and examined and answered. It is here where this foundation of Judge Dudley's may, in the essence of it, be just as useful as ever, securing that this criticism and answer shall be deliberately given from time to time. It is a thankless task to undertake, and one I should hardly have attempted had it not thus been laid upon me. But, having been thus committed to me, I dared not shrink from it, and will give, as I understand it, the answer of Liberalism to the claims of the Roman Catholic Church.

THE CLAIM OF INFALLIBLE AUTHORITY.

Of this primary claim, to be an infallible divine authority in faith and morals, I must speak first, because not only all else rests upon this, but also this has such a distinct attraction to society in these days of widespread questioning and doubt. The perplexity of individual responsibility, of having to think out one's own faith, and judge each for one's self of truth and duty, presses very heavily upon many hearts; and to these there is something inexpressibly restful and attractive in a system which lays down all truth and duty with the certainty of a divine and absolute authority.

But is the authority genuine and really divine, or is the whole claim one of those "usurpations" and "fatal errors" which Judge Dudley perceived, and desired to have men permanently warned against? That is the question, and the answer is not really very obscure. There is no need to enter into any of the textual or historical points which are commonly regarded as lying at the root of the papal claim.

The real impossibility of the claim is seen, not so much in the inadequacy of its origin as in the impotence and falsity of its results. If there really were, indeed, such a permanent agency of direct communication of God's truth, one cannot help feeling that in so many ages it ought to have clearly told upon human knowledge. It ought surely to have brought men a little earlier to the truth on any subject about which it claimed to be able to speak. It ought to have been able to deliver its followers, earlier than others, from the ancient superstitions of the world. But what do we actually find? That, again and again, in the gradual progress of human knowledge as to the nature of the world, the Catholic Church has not only not anticipated the general intelligence of its time, but has actually lagged behind it. Nor has this been only on subjects of which it has taken no cognizance and on which it has pronounced no opinion. It has pronounced opinions, but it has pronounced the wrong ones. I pass by for a moment the question of its actual treatment of Galileo; but it stands broadly on the page of history that the Copernican theory was excluded as false, heretical, and contrary to Scripture from all Catholic teaching for generations after it had been accepted by the world; that it was not till 1757 that the ban against teaching it was removed by Benedict XIV., and not till 1822 that it was admitted to be true by an edict then ratified by Pius VII.

OPPOSITION TO THE PROGRESS OF SCIENCE.

Indeed, it is difficult to speak too strongly of this general opposition of the Church to the progress of science and to the exposure and extinction of what the educated world now recognizes as superstition. The Church did not merely tolerate the belief in witchcraft (it may be said to do so still in Catholic countries): it everywhere stimulated the persecution of those accused of the crime. "The Puritans did the same," it may be replied. True; and therefore, as Edwin D. Mead aptly puts it,—“therefore we say that the Puritan churches were far from infallible.” None are readier to say this than the present representatives of the Puritans themselves. But the Catholic Church has no such frank admission, and, if she does not any longer stimulate the superstition, does nothing in Catholic countries to uproot it.

But the fact is that, even on the closer inspection of careful scholarship, the claim fails equally. This century of Science has placed the question of such an infallible revelation as the Church claims under conditions which never existed before; and the examination of ancient documents, which has become almost a branch of science, supplies the final link in the evidence against it. And here, in this last matter, we are upon the Church's own special ground. In science, indeed, the Church claims that her infallibility is saved by the fact that, while Galileo was condemned by the Congregation of the Index, the papal brief which would have added the stamp of technical ex-cathedra infallibility was not issued. Even this is doubtful, in the light of more recent documentary evidence; but everything short of this was done. Both Paul V. and Urban VIII. instigated the proceedings against Galileo, so that, as Prof. Tomlinson remarks in his careful monograph, "All that can be said is that the two popes were in error as men respecting the theory, but not as popes."

INFALLIBILITY IN REGARD TO THE BIBLE.

But, if the Church thus just technically saves her claim to infallibility in regard to that matter of science, not even such a technical plea can be put forth in regard to her decrees on the canon and inspiration of Scripture. The fatal mistake of Rome, which is coming every year into stronger light, was when, at the Fourth Session of the Council of Trent, she undertook to show that she revered the Bible just as much as Protestants did, by decreeing its absolute verbal inspiration. True, Protestants were affirming the same thing, but even then, as some of Luther's critical judgments show, with variations of emphasis and loopholes for fuller knowledge; but the Council of Trent decreed, authoritatively and finally, the divine authorship of every part of the Bible, even of what we call the Apocrypha, and this so absolutely as to make the writers simply inspired amanuenses. She thus raises up against her all the real Biblical criticism of the world; for it is every day becoming more evident to scholars of all sects, Catholics included, that that older claim of absolute verbal inspiration for the whole Bible is simply contrary to fact. Catholic scholars are very quiet upon the subject, few books are published about it, and many people are quite unaware of it; for the chief emphasis of the Catholic appeal to the world is not to the Bible, but to the Church. Efforts have been made to obtain from Rome some distinct permission to give up verbal inspiration, but in vain. Cardinal Newman (as I am reminded by one who knew him as a fellow-Catholic) tentatively tried to take refuge in a sort of inspiration "as to the substance of passages," but his efforts practically came to nothing; and at the Vatican Council of 1869 the Tridentine decree was reiterated in terms equally as strong and explicit as before. Moreover, the recent encyclical of Leo XIII. on the study of Holy Scripture in the Church has, if anything, made matters worse by reiterating some of the most obsolete ideas respecting the Scriptures, and insisting on their being read and interpreted exclusively in the light of the teaching of the Fathers. Here is the point at which all real scholarship is absolutely united against statements on which Catholicism has staked its infallibility. Simply the facts are not as Rome insists that they must be received. There can be no real question nowadays of reconciling the cosmogonic ideas of the fourth century Fathers with modern science. Thus some of Rome's best scholars have already been compelled to withdraw from their allegiance, while others are hesitating between what they are obliged to accept as doctrine and what they know to be the facts.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM AND LIBERTY.

But there are other points which touch the leadership claimed by Catholicism in our modern world more closely than these questions of theoretical infallibility. Perhaps there is no question on which men—not the foes of Catholicism, but its well-wishers—are more exercised than this: How does the Catholic Church really stand in regard to liberty?

At first sight there is much that is encouraging. We find leading Catholics among the most emphatic eulogists of this America, the very raison d'être of which is its large, trustful, self-governing liberty. We find Catholic ecclesiastics taking part in public affairs and discussing legislation and statesmanship with the avowal of principles of liberty which sound like echoes of the Declaration of Independence, and especially to the front with intelligent interest and help in the great problems of labor and social economy.

So full and hearty, indeed, are these expressions of liberty that it seems almost carping and ungenerous to go behind them, and to ask: Do they really represent Catholicism in its permanent policy, or are they merely local accommodations to the circumstances in which it finds itself here and there? The claim of the Church is that it is always and everywhere the same. Other churches have acted, at this or that time, as if they believed that they would be always the same; and sometimes, when inevitable changes have come, they have been very slow to acknowledge them. We have seen orthodox Protestants, whom Calvin would have indignantly disowned, even if he had not burned them along with Servetus, publicly declaring that they stand by the old faith of Calvin. But their more thoughtful leaders frankly admit the changes, and we know that the advance is real, not a mere local accommodation to the thought of others, and liable to be disowned to-morrow. But how is it with this apparent advance of Catholicism toward liberty? Is it really changed, or is it indeed always the same, and this a mere temporary and local keeping of its real principles in the background?

"Always and everywhere" the same, is its claim. We have then to compare this modern tone of freedom in free countries not only with its older tone, but with its character elsewhere. We want to know how far the liberality which Catholicism professes and pleads for here is carried out among its own people or allowed to others in parts of the world where it still holds paramount power. We are the more entitled to ask this, because the Catholic Church is not, like Protestant Episcopacy, a group of federated national churches, each of which can go on its way without interference from the rest. It is one church, with an infallible head, and claims to be everywhere the same in dogmatic teaching. So that what perplexes the student of modern Catholicism is that, while in England and America it stands forth as the champion of liberty, in countries where it is in the ascendancy nothing is heard of liberty, and nothing is known of it. How much liberty did Rome allow in Austria so long as it could make its concordat on its own terms? Or take it in Spain,—or even in Belgium, under the recent revival of the Catholic régime. What about liberty of worship? What about liberty of education? The simple fact is that the Catholic Church holds an entirely different tone when pleading for the right of equality in free states and when dealing with the appeal of other religious bodies even for toleration, let alone equality, in states where it holds paramount power. If any one wants an illustration of this, let him read up the official pleas put forth by the authorities of the Romish Church during the struggle in England for Catholic emancipation, and compare them with the claims which are now habitually made from the same quarter. The point which was most anxiously questioned, both in Parliament and throughout the country, and with a sincere desire to know the facts, was whether Catholics were really free to render a complete and undivided allegiance to the civil government of their country, or whether, as Catholics, they were subject to such instructions and authority from Rome as might conflict with their own free judgment and action as loyal citizens. Especially were questions pressed as to the present status of the claims which in the past

A Noteworthy Exhibit.

As a special feature for this fall, we have attempted the collection of a complete line of the Easy Chairs of all countries and periods,—French, English, Dutch, Flemish, etc., from the sixteenth century to the present time.

Such a collection has never before been made in this country. We have over 300 different styles, and every one is a unique and striking pattern. Bear in mind that these are not the ordinary American easy-chairs, which are already familiar, and which can be bought of any maker.

We have over twenty of the so-called "Egyptian" frames, with outlines of extreme comfort. There are forty-eight American Colonial chairs, including some superb winged fireplace designs. We have nearly a dozen Dutch models of the seventeenth century, with huge ball feet.

Every chair in the collection is marked at a price which, in some cases, is actually lower than is paid at auction for the wrecks of the last generation's cabinet-work.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

*The full text of Dr. Herford's lecture, of which this abstract presents about two-thirds, may be had in pamphlet form of Geo. H. Ellis, 141 Franklin Street, Boston. Price ten cents.

had created some of the worst scandals of papal interference among European kingdoms. "Did the pope claim any temporal jurisdiction? Did he still pretend to a power to depose kings, release subjects from their allegiance, and incite them to revolt? Was faith to be kept with heretics? Did the Church still teach the doctrines of persecution?"* To all such questioning, answers came in abundance from the highest Catholic authorities in the kingdom. Parliamentary committees were held in 1824 and 1825, and various high Catholic dignitaries were examined, all of whom scouted the idea of any obligation to obey the pope in civil matters or to believe that he is infallible. And solemn declarations to the same effect were put forward by the Vicars Apostolic who in those days ruled the Catholics of Great Britain; while the hierarchy of the Roman communion, in its "Pastoral Address to the Clergy and Laity of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland," declared on oath their belief that it is not an article of the Catholic faith, neither are they thereby required to believe that the pope is infallible. The strongest and most influential of these Catholic exponents was Bishop Doyle, who exhausted language in repudiating either idea. "Our obedience to the law," he said, "and the allegiance which we owe to the sovereign are complete and full and perfect and undivided, inasmuch as they extend to all political, legal, and civil rights of the king or of his subjects"; while in his "Essay on the Catholic Claims," addressed to the prime minister, Lord Liverpool, he broke out into the following still stronger language: "What, my lord, have we to do with the proceedings of popes, and why should we be made accountable for them?" †

And so the measure of Catholic emancipation was passed, and I do not think any Englishman now regrets it. But, all the same,—emancipation attained,—the Catholic hierarchy has since carefully explained away every one of the plainest meanings which the people and statesmen of the time understood, and were intended to understand, by these statements. In all fairness, let it be said that their authors understood them in the same sense also. They stated what they believed at the time. But, really, no Catholic can claim a mind of his own; and they have had to retract in obedience to Rome. For, since then, the infallibility of the pope, so emphatically and authoritatively repudiated in 1826, has been absolutely decreed by the Vatican Council; and this, it must be remembered, covers not merely all matters of "faith" and "morals," but also whatever concerns the government and discipline of the Church, the limits of this large category being only determined by the same authority. This may appear at first sight a vague claim, not really touching the practical matters of civil government and allegiance. But this charitable interpretation is rendered impossible by the fact that within this very generation, especially in the Syllabus and Encyclical of Pius IX., every one of the special interferences with civil life and action which have most roused the hostility of modern civilization, and which the friends of Rome have liked to regard as really, if not formally, dropped, have been distinctly reaffirmed, under cover of anathema against those who would teach otherwise. The liberty of speech and of the press; the liberty of conscience and worship, and that in countries called Catholic the free exercise of other religions may laudably be allowed; the teaching that the Church may not use force,—all these ideas have been directly and explicitly condemned; while, by the equal condemnation of all who hold that bishops and Ecumenical Councils have "transgressed the just limits of their power, or usurped the rights of princes," every worst wrong in history—from the persecution of heretics to the power of deposing rulers and releasing subjects from their allegiance—is claimed as a right capable of being used wherever needed, and the Church itself the only judge of the need!

I do not mean that all this is likely ever to become any great practical danger in America or England. I think national patriotism is too strong. I cannot help believing that in any great emergency, in which some "usurpation" of Rome might come into conflict with men's duties as Englishmen or Americans, the spirit of loyal citizenship would prevail every time, just as it did with English Catholics in the time of the Armada. But, then, the steady welfare and progress of a nation do not depend upon these decisions in such great emergencies. They depend upon municipal self-government, and the innumerable questions of law and order and civil policy, which are constantly intertwined with "morals," if not with "faith," and so can at any moment be included in the scope of Catholic authority. It is in such lesser matters that we need our citizens to exercise intelligence and freedom. Let the Catholic leaders urge what seems to them the course most consonant with Catholic principles, as the religionists of any kind are entitled to do; but let them do it as one of the elements of free citizen judgment. But, when the Catholic Church claims not only this general advice, but the absolute direction of the action of Catholic citizens, then—and it has done this again and again—it makes a claim which is just as much a "usurpation" as in the time of Judge Dudley, which must always be a perplexing mischief, and is only not dangerous, because it can so seldom be enforced. So it needs to be understood that all this eulogizing of American liberty on the part of Catholic ecclesiastics has behind it necessarily an attitude of mind toward Rome and her authority which is wholly inconsistent with it. One is glad to hear such professions of liberty: one cannot help believing that they are, often, personally sincere; but the local and personal attitude does not alter the real character of the institution itself, which was a burden upon liberty in the past,—and claims to be always the same,—and still is the same wherever it has the power.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM AND TRUTH.

But this discrepancy, between the Catholic eulogies of liberty in Protestant countries, and both its permanent claims and its practice in countries where it is in power, touches a great deal more than the question of liberty. It concerns very closely the attitude of Catholicism in regard to truth.

It is one of the strong points made by Catholics that, alone of all religious bodies, they have absolute, reliable, unchanging truth. The ordinary Protestant reliance on the Bible they treat as mere delusion. The reliance on the individual reason and conscience, which Liberals regard as the ultimate ground of belief, they ridicule as a mere ignis fatuus leading men only into bogs of doubt or cloud-lands of speculation. No! To the longing of the common heart for some clear truth Catholics reply that they alone have truth. That which the pope pronounces, ex cathedra, to be truth, that must infallibly be so. Thus on the matter of truth they claim to be before all others.

And yet how far does this go—even if it were so—into the deep reality of truth? Truth, in the deepest fact of it, is a spirit in the heart, not a mere statement about some external thing. At least, it must be first a spirit in the heart,—the spirit that reverences the fact as it is. It must reverence the fact close by; and so it shall grow into the faculty which reaches out and has a chance of apprehending the further fact, say, of ages past, or of realms and worlds outside our personal ken and knowledge. So a man's deepest relation to truth is determined not by his having some special source of information about heavenly things, and submitting his own thinking to that, but by his having a clear open eye to the fact of things close about him, and standing by that fact, and refusing to say or do anything at variance with that. Now, this spirit of truth is a very great thing, far more important to the life of man than any list of alleged truths. When Paul Dudley ordained a lecture for exposing not only the "tyranny and usurpation" of the Romish Church, but also its "heresies" and "fatal errors," he probably had in his mind some of its doctrines about divine and future things. The world has gone forward since then. It has become sceptical as to any church having special information about those more distant verities. Certainly, the only religious teachers who will win much attention to their claims of divine truth are such as are palpably trustworthy in the matter of human truth, honest and straightforward and sincere in all the common dealings and relations of life. Now, in all this—and I speak no mere opinion of my own, but what I know to be the misgiving of even the most liberal and friendly observers—the Catholic priesthood seems curiously weak. It has elevated mental reservation and evasion into a system, so that the world is always puzzled how far to receive Catholic assurances and declarations at their "face value." It officially sanctions such misrepresentations of history as its own best scholars are ashamed of; and even in regard to the most sacred matters of faith it admits pious frauds such as no other church in Christendom would allow for a moment.

Let me give an illustration or two. It is not without significance that two of the most disliked expressions, for subtle double-dealing and for skilful reasoning apart from any real truth,—"Jesuitical" and "casuistry,"—have grown up from one of the chief orders of Catholicism and from one of its chief methods of reasoning. I have been struck with this: that, even from the best outside friends and admirers of Catho-cism, it is almost impossible to obtain any clear answer when you ask them what they believe to be the truth about the charge that Catholicism teaches that faith need not be kept with heretics. As for history, Catholic history strikes the average mind about as railroad geography does. Every one knows how the railroad companies, in those neat little maps which illustrate their folders, represent their own lines by broad straight lines from end to end, while rival railways are either left out altogether or put in thin and devious lines, as if of no account. Yes, that makes very pretty maps; but it is not geography! It is about the same with Catholic history. Of course there have been real Catholic historians, who have written fairly even about such subjects as the Reformation; but, take the histories which are specially written and officially recommended for Catholic education, and the comparison of the railroad folder-map is none too strong. Everything is right. The line is perfectly straight. The trouble is it is a little too straight. You find Luther represented simply as an ambitious, turbulent, and vain hypocrite, whose protest against indulgences was due to his anger at their sale not being given to his own "Augustinian" order, but to the Dominicans; while Tetzel was a learned and excellent man, whose success in their sale was due "to the faith and devotion of the people," and whose masterly defence of them was burned at Wittemberg simply out of dislike of free speech. You find the enormities of the Inquisition explained away as the excesses of individual Catholics, but which the Church disowns. You find the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day explained away as a merely political uprising of loyal Frenchmen, with which religion had nothing to do; and the medal and Te Deum with which Pope Gregory XIII. had it celebrated at Rome were in thanksgiving not for the massacre, of which he was kept ignorant, but for the preservation of the French king from death and of the French nation from the horrors of a civil war. If any one would study in closer detail the minor untruthfulnesses of exaggeration and suppression with which Catholic school-books abound, he will find a curious collection of them in Edwin D. Mead's pamphlet on "The Roman Catholic Church and the Public Schools." Mr. Mead is well known as one of the fairest of American writers, and by no means sparing in his exposure of the meannesses and persecutions perpetrated by Protestantism; but, as he points out, there is no denial or suppression of these things in Protestant histories. They are recorded and deplored as the blots upon times when no church understood freedom or Christianity. But Catholicism cannot admit that it has had anything to mend or learn. Its misrepresentations in this direction are such as are entirely without parallel among other religious bodies, except to some extent among some of its Ritualist imitators. Nearly all the valuable inventions of the world are summed up as "due to Catholics." The Holy See has been "God's instrument in conferring upon Europe all the real good she enjoys." Much is said about the Salem witch trials, but nothing about the incomparably greater numbers put to death for witchcraft in Catholic countries; and, perhaps, the climax is in this choice summing up of the comparative history of Catholicism and Protestantism by Bishop Gilmour: "To make converts, Catholicity has ever appealed to reason; Protestantism, like Mohammedanism, to force and violence!" No wonder Mr. Mead winds up his examination with the pregnant verdict: "This is not history."

[Dr. Herford then gave a number of illustrations derived from personal observation and Roman Catholic Records concerning the absence of truthfulness.]

THE INSTITUTION MORE THAN THE SOUL.

Perhaps it may seem hard measure to argue against an institution from such acts of individuals. There is no church but has among its clergy some less worthy than others; some, perhaps, against whom things as tricky or as unfeeling might be told. But these things I have quoted, out of my own personal knowledge, have been official acts; and I know too well from others, whose experience has been like my own, that they are no extreme exceptions. They are not illustrations of what unworthy men may do in the name of the claims of Rome, but of what those claims lead to even in average men, in lowering the standard of natural truth and right.

Indeed, I think it all comes back to this: that, in Catholicism, the institution, exaggerated by these tremendous claims, has come to be so much more than the soul or spirit of it. I think, indeed, that this is felt by many of its own adherents. Even those who are entirely loyal to it constantly excuse, as necessary for the Church, actions and requirements which in themselves they cannot defend. I am not the only Protestant who has had considerable money intrusted to him by poor Catholics. The first time, I wanted to decline such a trust. "Why don't you place it with your own priest?" He is a very good man, isn't he?" "Oh, yes," was the eager reply. "He is a very good man, but still I would rather you took care of it for me. You see, if anything happened to me while I am gone, I know you would give it to my people all right." "Well," I said, "wouldn't Father — do the same?" "Well, I don't know"; and, after a pause, "Maybe he'd be wanting it for the Church."

The same kind of feeling is constantly coming out with regard to the Public Schools. You seldom hear any of the Catholic parents speak against the parochial schools,—"the Sisters' schools," as they call them. When they speak of them at all, it is usually as institutions which, "of course, are quite right," "of course the Church ought to have them," and so forth; but, all the same, every one who has had much to do with the Catholic poor in American cities knows perfectly well that they greatly prefer to have their children go to the public schools. They do not want them brought up apart. Before all things, they want them to grow up American citizens. When a Catholic school is opened in a dense district, at first numbers of the Catholic children are withdrawn from the public school, and swept into the Sisters' school. But, after a while, you as constantly hear that many of the children are one by one, some on one excuse, some on another, finding their way back to the old institution,—the school of the people. Only by the strongest appeals through pulpit and confessional, and by threats of withholding the sacraments, are the specially Catholic schools kept up in any strength.

And so it is in many things. The institution overrides freedom, overrides the parent. At times it comes out with the most eloquent pleas for freedom; but they are always qualified by that claim of the Church to obedience in every matter which comes within the range of its authority,—a range of which itself is the sole judge. So it has at times put forward the most plain-

AUTUMN WEDDINGS.

New things of China and Cloisonné just landed, by the steamers "Cambroman" and the "Sylvania," from Liverpool, and the "Chittagong" from Yokohama; also superb pieces fresh from the glass-cutter's wheel of American "Diamond-finish" Glass, adapted to Wedding Gifts.

Novelties of French Porcelain in Collar and Cuff Boxes.

Choice Lamps with exquisite shades.

Palm Pots with and without Pedestals.

Porcelain decorated Brush and Comb Sets.

Doulton China Loving Cups, 2 handles and 3 handles.

Carlsbad rich Glass Loving Cups.

Chocolat Pots, Handsome Pitchers, China Manicure Sets, Porcelain Tea Sets, China Salad Sets, China Dinner Sets, Old Blue Delft Plaques, Carlsbad Hock Glasses, Carlsbad Sorbet Cups.

Expensive specimens of Satsuma and Cloisonné, selected the present season by us at the source of production.

INSPECTION INVITED.

Jones, McDuffee & Stratton,
CHINA, GLASS, and LAMPS,
120 FRANKLIN.

* Gladstone on the "Vatican Decrees," p. 12.

† Any one desiring to refer to these matters more fully should consult the pamphlet by W. E. Gladstone, "The Vatican Decrees in their Bearing on Civil Allegiance."

spoken and unmistakable claims for parental rights in choosing the education of their children. "By the law of nature," says Cardinal Manning, "fathers and mothers have the guardianship of their own children"; and, again, "Parents have the right to control the education of their children." But, when this comes to be interpreted, it turns out to be simply a plea not for parents to obey their own judgment, but to obey their priests.

Thus, while there is so much that is beautiful and admirable in Catholicism,—in its venerable services, in its frequent heroism in dark ages, in the spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice which it wins from its votaries,—yet the whole free life of man is overweighted and dominated by the organization to an extent unknown in any other church in Christendom. This is the conviction not of the enemies of Catholicism, but even of those who are most friendly, and most desire to see the Catholic Church take its true place among the helpful institutions of the world. There have been few men more appreciative of all religious institutions, more fair and kindly in criticising them, than James Freeman Clarke; and this is his testimony: "All the evils of the Roman Catholic Church have come from this source [the organization of the Church being set above the religion of the Church]. It has made conformity to its ceremonies, submission to its authority, the essential thing. Hence its persecutions, its Inquisition, its resisting truth, its arrogant claims, its desire for wealth, its lust of power, its insatiate ambition." And Edward Everett Hale, writing to me of the Roman hierarchy, says: "They have never made the world believe that they regard truth first, second, and last. They have made the world believe that they regard the Church as first, second, and last."

Do I say all this in any spirit of hostility? Not for a moment. There is need, in this confused and doubting and struggling modern life, for all the forms and ways in which the great spirit of Christianity has embodied itself among men. If any one would see how great—to the simple student of history and of man—may seem the work that the Catholic Church has done, and might still do, let him read the essay of James Darmesteter, the Jew, on "The Religions of the Future," and the possible destiny of the Catholic Church, if this "admirable instrument of unity and propaganda," as he calls it, could rise to its true height. "If the Church misses its opportunity," he says, in closing, "if, in the name of an immutability which is simply a fiction of dogma, contradicted by its history from the very beginning, it opposes the summons of the future with a non possumus, the necessary work will be done otherwise and with greater difficulty."

It is in that spirit that the best modern Liberalism owns the possibilities of the Catholic Church as a venerable and marvellous human institution. But the same Liberalism just as earnestly and emphatically rejects its fatal claim of being the one only divine institution, the infallible representative of God. It is a claim which has all along been fatal to the highest spirit of truth, and the fancied authority of which has encouraged tyranny and spiritual oppression. Whether the needed reform is possible, who can tell? But, meanwhile, not its enemies, but its best well-wishers, are those who would try to clear it from such exceptional and tremendous claims, and to set it free, in wholesome human liberty and in frank and manly truth, to do its part in the further religious development of man.

SPONGE FARMS.

When the sponge fisheries of the Bahamas and the Florida coast showed signs of exhaustion, attempts were made to grow sponges. Sponge farming has proved a profitable industry, and hundreds of acres along the Gulf Coast of Florida are devoted to it. The site for a sponge farm usually chosen is a creek, into which the salt water flows freely. The process is very simple.

It is only to drop into the water stones and other substances for sponges to fasten themselves to, and then to dam up the lagoon so that the sponge seeds shall not be blown out to sea. The farm requires little attention when it is once started. The seeds were at first obtained from the fish commissioners, but lately they have come direct from the sponge fisheries. In the autumn the farmer buys a seed supply of sponges, taking care to get both the male and female cells. During winter the sponge seeds are usually kept in small enclosures, where they develop. The spores are liberated early in spring. They swim about, the eggs grow rapidly, and soon attach themselves to the rocks or coral under water. The sponges grow slowly, and are rarely pulled until the end of the third year. And then only the largest are gathered, the smaller ones being left to produce new seeds and grow larger. Sponge farming has decided advantages over deep-sea sponge fishing. The danger and difficulty of the latter are eliminated. The sponges may be easily and regularly gathered in the smooth and shallow water of the farm, and under proper cultivation they are of better quality and command higher prices. Moreover, if no enemy or disease invades the farm, a large crop is assured every year.—Selected.

Literature.

"THE UNIVERSITY HYMN BOOK."*

It is a pleasure to hold so beautiful a specimen of the book-maker's art as the new "University Hymn Book," published by Harvard University for use at the daily prayers and the vesper and Sunday services in Appleton Chapel. A better example of handsome typography has never issued from the University Press. The music has evidently been printed from an entirely new font of type, the paper is heavy, the margins sumptuous, the binding a rich black leather, with gilt edges and lettering. There is but a single hymn on each page. Many hymns cover two pages, words and music being set opposite each other; and a few hymns extend over four or six pages. The pages are not numbered, the hymn number alone standing at the top. The indexes are ample; and the book is enriched by biographical indexes of authors and composers, compiled by Rev. Charles F. Russell, which are models of their kind, and which minutely trace the origins of every hymn and tune.

The work of editing this hymn-book has extended over eight years, and has been the volunteer service of many of the ablest of American preachers and musicians. In 1887 four of the preachers to the university for that year—Phillips Brooks, D.D., George A. Gordon, D.D., Edward Everett Hale, D.D., and Alexander McKenzie, D.D.—made a choice of the fifty hymns which each deemed indispensable to the proposed collection. In 1890 Lyman Abbott, D.D., and Brooke Herford, D.D., revised the list, and made additions. These lists were taken as the basis of selection, the final choice and arrangement being left with Prof. Francis G. Peabody, D.D. Within the last ten years many excellent hymn-books have been published. A wealth of material has been collected. Every language and literature has been ransacked. Every hidden song traced and brought to light. After all this labor, here are the two hundred odd hymns which these competent judges declare to be of permanent value, and upon which Harvard University places the seal of its approval. This is not a comprehensive, but a discriminating, collection. It is well known that only a small proportion of the hymns in the large collections are ever used. Yet, of well-known modern books, the "Hymns of the Church Universal" has 612 numbers, the "Plymouth Hymnal" has 638, the "Evangelical Hymnal" has 647, and the "Hymn and Tune Book of the American Unitarian Association" has 885. The "University Hymn Book" contains only 288 hymns. This is indeed the winnowed grain of the harvest of sacred song. It is interesting to note that of these 288 immortal hymns 77 are by American authors; and, though the fact is nowhere proclaimed and is probably unknown to the compilers, a careful search reveals that 92 of the hymns can claim a Unitarian origin. Whatever may be the errors and shortcomings of Unitarianism in the eyes of its neighbors, the importance of the Unitarian contribution to the poetry of religious feeling cannot be disregarded. A communion that can produce so many and such noble hymns must be pervaded by a genuine Christian piety.

The dominant note of this hymn-book—let us be thankful that the good name is not perverted into the modern Anglicanism, "hymnal"—is its Christian manliness. The prevailing spirit of the hymns is cheerful, sanguine, and confident, as befits a collection which is primarily adapted to the use of large congregations of young men. The hymns are rarely meditative. They are not metrical definitions of doctrine. They are not poems mainly useful for devotional reading. They are hymns to be sung. They are, for the most part, expressions of grateful praise, of invitation, of hope, or of resolution. At the same time the more tender and personal experiences of the Christian life are not left without a door of utterance.

* THE UNIVERSITY HYMN BOOK. For Use in the Chapel of Harvard University. Published by the University.

The editors have scrupulously regarded the strict verbal accuracy of the hymns. The practice of altering hymns to suit the individual taste or theological prejudice of an editor has grown to alarming proportions. Scores of fine hymns have been so mangled in successive collections as to have become almost unrecognizable. The University has set its countenance against the perpetuation of these altered forms. Scholarship and integrity have alike prescribed that the authors' exact words must be used. Hymns have occasionally been abridged by the omission of irrelevant or infelicitous verses, but there is not a garbled hymn in the book. Theologically, the hymns express the religious feelings and desires that are common to all Christian sects. The orthodoxy or heterodoxy of a hymn has not been called in question. The only tests for admission have been intrinsic literary merit and power to express spiritual experience. Preachers of every denomination can find here dear and familiar hymns, but no local or transient dogmatism mars the pages.

The same high standards which dictated the choice of the hymns has prevailed in the selection of the tunes. This work has been done with rare skill and loving zeal by Mr. Warren A. Locke, choir-master of the University. With unflinching sense of fitness, the words have been set to the tunes which best express their meaning. Each tune has distinct character. There is in the book no "emptiness of fluent noise." With the possible exception of "Bethany" and "Coronation," there is no trivial music. Sometimes it has been found necessary to break the familiar associations of hymns and tunes; but, when this has been done, those who cherish the old associations must often confess that the new setting is the worthier. The same manly and invigorating spirit that breathes in the hymns is to be found in the tunes. Many of the finest of the old German chorals have been utilized, while the productions of the modern English school of Dykes, Barnby, Stainer, and Hopkins have been largely drawn upon. The American contribution is by no means so important as in the case of the hymns. We are still musically a dependent and provincial people. There are only eleven American tunes in the book; and these do not, as a rule, compare well in musical richness and spiritual value with their neighbors. This is not in any sense a compromise book. Its musical standard is high, but experience is rapidly showing that it is as easy for a congregation to sing fine music as it is to sing trivial music. To secure good congregational singing, familiarity, not simplicity, is the important thing. This book is another sign of a true reformation of taste in the matter of church music.

The adoption of this book will greatly enrich the worship in American schools and colleges. By the omission of a few purely academic hymns, and the addition of hymns for baptism, communion, and other religious occasions not observed in the college chapel, its unequalled resources can be made available for ordinary congregations. Such an edition is in preparation for use in several well-known churches.

RHYMES OF OUR PLANET. By Will Carleton, author of "Farm Ballads," etc. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers.—Mr. Carleton hit the popular fancy and touched the popular heart in a few of his early poems; and ever since he has been "Dropping buckets into empty wells, And growing old in drawing nothing up."

Once in a great while he manages to write something that approximates to the quality of his original successes; but all that he has written deserving of popular favor could be compressed into a volume of the size of his latest one, which has just come to hand. There is one good thing about it,—that it is not so formidably big as the half-dozen volumes that have preceded it, and costs only half as much. Much of the work is very slovenly, the writer allowing himself lines which are defiant of all prosody. Moreover, having won his reputation as a master of realistic homeliness, he indulges in such evasions as "white pearls of toil" for big drops of sweat upon a farmer's forehead. "Farmer Stebbins at Football" is the most timely poem in the collection, and is in Mr. Carleton's most characteristic manner; but even here we have "zephyr breaths" and "angry waves of strife,"—phrases which are not precisely in the manner of rough farmer-folk.

ECHOES OF THE PLAY-HOUSE. By Edward Robbins, Jr. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—The history of the drama which tries to record not its literary development, but its triumphs, as illustrated by actual performances, has a difficult task cut out; for no words can revive adequate impressions of the manner in which one star differs from another in glory. For instance, the reader accepts such a statement

The Girl and Her Church

BY RUTH ASHMORE

The most careful article ever written on the relations of a girl to her church, its religious and social life. In the October issue of

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

10 Cents on all News-stands

The Curtis Publishing Company

Philadelphia

as that Peg Woffington was charming, but still he wonders uneasily about her "squeaky voice." The book does not claim to be a complete history, but is rather presented as "remembrances of some past glories of the English stage"; and Betterton, Bracegirdle, Oldfield, and the rest pass before us, gently remembered, as would have pleased them best. These chronicles of players who have played their parts and gone their ways are naturally diversified by many anecdotes, and have considerable interest even to the ordinary reader; while for him who is versed in matters histrionic it offers a convenient book of reference, including a record of the main happenings on the stage from the time when young men acted in petticoats up to that June night of 1776, when Garrick played King Lear for the last time.

COLLEGE GIRLS. By Abbe Carter Goodloe. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.—It is perhaps not unfair to compare this book with the recently published Harvard, Princeton, and Yale stories. One of this trio has not happened to come under our observation; but, considering the others, the most prejudiced reviewer could hardly help admitting the superiority of this, the latest, the most original, the freshest in manner, the most varied in subject-matter. There are fourteen stories in all, not by any means equally good, but all clever, and some deserving earnest words of commendation. As a rule, the more serious ones are the best. They not only strike a deep, true note, but they show good dramatic instinct, and indicate other and more ambitious work to come in the future. Still, the fun and sparkle of the lighter stories make them occasionally quite as good in their own way. The illustrations are by Charles Dana Gibson.

THE FORCES OF NATURE: A STUDY OF NATURAL PHENOMENA. By Herbert B. Harrop and Louis A. Wallis. Columbus, Ohio: Harrop & Wallis.—In the space of a hundred and fifty pages the authors have endeavored to present a compendium of all the physical sciences. The book is, so to speak, a kind of charcoal sketch of the universe. The scientific specialist may find it superficial, but the general reader will find it interesting. If the book should persuade the reader that he knows all or a great deal about the universe, it would be unfortunate; but, if it suggest to him that there is a great deal more to know on every subject than is here indicated, it may be very useful. If not profound, it is certainly interesting.

Miscellaneous.

"The Handbook of the New Public Library in Boston," compiled by Herbert Small, with contributions by C. Howard Walker on "The Architecture of the Library," and by Lindsay Swift on "The Significance of the Library," is published by Curtis & Co., and will be sent postpaid for sixteen cents in stamps. It is an indispensable aid to the proper understanding of this beautiful building, its art, and the significance of its collections. The illustrations are numerous, and the book is especially valuable for sending to friends outside the city, who may be interested in this "the most important of all American libraries."

Literary Notes.

Anthony Hope's new romance, "Chronicles of Count Antonio," is to be published immediately by D. Appleton & Co., in a handsome volume, with a frontispiece by S. W. Van Schaick.

A number of quaint West African prototypes of the "Uncle Remus" stories, collected by the late Col. A. B. Ellis, are to appear in the November Popular Science Monthly, as illustrating "Evolution in Folk-lore."

Rudyard Kipling's new "Jungle Book," to be published by the Century Company, November 10, will contain a great number of ornamental cuts,—initials, emblematic head-bands, etc.,—made by Mr. Kipling's father. The advance sale of this book to the trade is very large.

Robert Grant's final paper in "The Art of Living" series, which appears in the November Scribner's, deals with "The Conduct of Life," and contains some scathing criticisms of certain aspects of spurious Americanism and very timely comments on the multi-millionaire society out of which has grown the "Four Hundred."

Macmillan & Co. will publish at once, in their "Ex-Libris Series," "Bookbindings, Old and New: Notes of a Book-lover," by Brander Matthews, which will contain much new matter relating to bookbinding of the past and the present. It will contain, also, a chapter on "The Grolier Club of New York." The book will be profusely illustrated with fine examples of ancient and modern bookbindings.

The November Century is to be an "Anniversary Number," celebrating the beginning of the twenty-sixth year, and inaugurating the use of a new font of type and new paper. It will contain first chapters of Mrs. Humphry Ward's new novel, a discussion of "The Issues of 1896," by Theodore Roosevelt (Republican) and ex-Gov. Russell of Massachusetts (Democratic), contributions from Bret Harte, Howells, and others. The right to reproduce a number of Tissot's remarkable paintings illustrating the life of Christ has just been secured for the Christmas Century.

Books Received.

From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.
A Victorian Anthology, 1837-95. Selections illustrating the Editor's Critical Review of British Poetry in the Reign of Victoria. Edited by Edmund Clarence Stedman. Price $2.50.
Anna Poetae. From the Unpublished Note-books of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Edited by Ernest Hartley Coleridge. Price $2.50.
The Constitution of the United States at the End of the First Century. By George S. Boutwell. Price $3.50.
Little Miss Phoebe Gay. By Helen Dawes Brown. Price $1.00.

From Roberts Brothers, Boston.
In the Okefenokee. A Story of the War Time and the Great Georgia Swamp. By Louis Pendleton. Price $1.25.
A Jolly Good Summer. By Mary P. Wells Smith. Price $1.25.
My Honey. By the author of "Miss Toosey's Mission." Price $1.00.
Through Forest and Plain. By Ashmore Russan and Frederick Boyle. Price $1.50.
Frowzie, the Runaway. A Fable for Children. By Lily F. Wesselhoft. Price $1.25.
Dorothy and Anton. A Sequel to "Dear Daughter Dorothy." By A. G. Plympton. Price $1.00.
Joel: A Boy of Galilee. By Annie Fellows Johnston. Price $1.50.
The Mushroom Cave. By Evelyn Raymond. Illustrations by Victor A. Seares. Price $1.50.
Under the Stable Floor. A Christmas Story. By M. Carrie Hyde. Price 50 cents.
Yan and Noddie of Tappan Sea. By M. Carrie Hyde. Price 50 cents.
Goostle. By M. Carrie Hyde. Price 50 cents.

From D. Appleton & Co., New York.
Uncle Remus. His Songs and his Sayings. By Joel Chandler Harris. New and Revised Edition with One Hundred and Twelve Illustrations. By A. B. Frost. Price 60 cents.

From the American Book Company, New York.
Contes et Legendes. Hième Partie. Par H. A. Guerber. Price 60 cents.
The Academic French Course in Accordance with the Latest Grammatical Rules adopted by the French Academy. By Antoine Muzzarelli. Price $1.00.
Music Reader. By Frederic H. Ripley and Thomas Tapper. 5 numbers.
The Music Primer. By Frederic H. Ripley and Thomas Tapper. Price 30 cents.

From Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York.
The Three Apprentices of Moon Street. From the French of Georges Montorgueil. Price $1.50.
Famous Leaders among Women. By Sarah Knowles Bolton. Price $1.50.

From Fowler, Wells & Co., New York.
How to study Strangers. By Temperance, Face, and Head. By Nelson Sizer. Paper covers. Price 70 cents.

From Macmillan & Co., New York.
Miscellaneous Studies. A Series of Essays. By Walter Pater. Prepared for the Press by Charles L. Shadwell. The Carved Lions. By Mrs. Molesworth. Illustrated by L. Leslie Brooke. Price $1.00.
The Crooked Stick; or, Pollie's Probation. By Rolf Boldrewood. Price $1.25.

From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.
The Sketch Book. By Washington Irving. The Author's Revised Edition. Edited by William Lyon Phelps.
The Art of Living Long and Happily. By Henry Hardwicke.

From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.
Little Rivers. By Henry Van Dyke. Price $1.25.
Children's Stories in American Literature. By Henrietta Christian Wright. Price $1.25.

From Laird & Lee, Chicago.
The Heart of a Boy. A Story by Edmondo de Amicis. From the 166th Italian Edition, by Prof. G. Mantellini.
From the Open Court Publishing Company, Chicago.
Darwin, and after Darwin. By the late John Romanes, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S. Price $1.50.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.
Said the Wind One Day. Words by George Cooper. Music by Frances A. M. Bird.
Star Violets. Music by Frances A. M. Bird.
"Sleep, Baby, Sleep." Words from the German. Music by Frances A. M. Bird.
Forget-me-nots. Words by F. F. B. Music by Frances A. M. Bird.
Pussy Willow Polka. By Sara H. Reed.
If Summer Skies were always Blue. Words by Belle Willey Gue. Music by Fanny Snow Knowlton.
La Sultana Gavotte. Intermezzo. For the Pianoforte. By F. Boscovitz.
Mohican Waltzes. Composed by Richard Robitzek. For Pianoforte.
Four Ship-mates. Song. Arranged by Charles Page. Written by Fred Conran. Composed by Felix McGlenon.
Never Told. Song. Words by Clifton Bingham. Music by Otto Cantor.
For Love of a Poor Young Man. Song. Words and music by Edgar Selden.
My Soul thirsteth. Sacred Song. Words by Samuel G. Young. Music by Sir Jules Benedict.
Souvenir d'Arditi. Waltzes. For Pianoforte. On Themes by Luigi Arditi. By Geo. Lowell Tracy.

Temperance Cause Made Interesting!

Temperance lectures are many; good temperance lectures are few; choicely illustrated temperance lectures are almost non-existent. But the demand is great, and we offer to meet it. How? By furnishing good Lanterns on easy terms, and keeping 10,000 choice temperance views, which we rent at twenty-five for a dollar.

Send for free literature.

RILEY BROTHERS,

Branches: 16 Beekman St., New York.
BOSTON: 244 Washington St. CHICAGO: 106 La Salle St.
KANSAS CITY (Mo.): 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS: 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA: 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO: 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND: 411 Couch St.

WANTED 5000 MORE BOOK AGENTS
men and women, for the fastest selling book of the times
DARKNESS & DAYLIGHT in NEW YORK
With 250 new illustrations from flash-light photographs.
Introduction By Rev. Lyman Abbott.
A Christian woman's thrilling story of years of rescue work "In His Name," alive with intense interest, touching pathos, humor and story. Most splendidly illustrated, 86th thousand in press. Bishops, Ministers, etc., say "God speed this woman's endowment." It sells at sight, and pays Agents from $50. to $100. a month. W. W. Pay Freight to all points, Give Credit, Extra Terms, Premium Copies, and Free Outlets. Write for terms and specimen engravings to HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Conn.

Timely Warning.

The great success of the chocolate preparations of the house of Walter Baker & Co. (established in 1780) has led to the placing on the market many misleading and unscrupulous imitations of their name, labels, and wrappers. Walter Baker & Co. are the oldest and largest manufacturers of pure and high-grade Cocos and Chocolates on this continent. No chemicals are used in their manufactures.

Consumers should ask for, and be sure that they get, the genuine Walter Baker & Co.'s goods.

WALTER BAKER & CO., Limited,
DORCHESTER, MASS.

Charles Scribner's Sons New Publications

PROF. BAIRD'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS IN FRANCE

NOW READY:

The Huguenots and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes

By HENRY M. BAIRD. 2 vols., 8vo, $7.50.
These two volumes conclude Prof. Baird's great historical series on the Huguenots:

The Rise of the Huguenots in France

With Map. 2 vols., 8vo, $5.00.

The Huguenots and Henry of Navarre

With Map. 2 vols., 8vo, $5.00.

The Set, 6 vols., in a box, $15.00.

UNC' EDINBURG

A Plantation Echo. By THOMAS NELSON PAGE. Illustrated by B. W. CLINEDINST. Small folio, $1.50.

Uniform with the illustrated editions of "Polly," "Meh Lady," and "Marse Chan."

ENGLISH LANDS, LETTERS, AND KINGS.

Queen Anne and the Georges. By DONALD G. MITCHELL. 12mo, $1.50.

Continuing the former volumes, "From Cell to Tudor" and "From Elizabeth to Anne."

CONSTANTINOPLE

By F. MARION CRAWFORD. Illustrated by EDWIN L. WEEKS. Square 12mo, $1.50.

WOMEN OF COLONIAL AND REVOLUTIONARY TIMES

A series designed to portray the lives and the times of some of the eminent women of the Colonial and Revolutionary periods.

First Volume Now Ready: MARGARET WINTHROP. By ALICE MORSE EARLE. 12mo, $1.25.

Other volumes in preparation.

A BACHELOR'S CHRISTMAS

and other stories. By ROBERT GRANT. With 21 full-page illustrations by C. D. GIBSON, IRVING R. WILES, A. B. WENZELL, and C. CARLETON. 12mo, $1.50.

THE MOGUL EMPERORS OF HINDUSTAN

By EDWARD S. HOLDEN, LL.D. With illustrations. Crown 8vo, $2.00.

CRUISING AMONG THE CARIBBEES

Summer Days in Winter Months. By CHARLES A. STODDARD, D.D., editor of the N.Y. Observer. 12mo, $1.50.

CAMEO EDITION. New Volumes.

A Chosen Few. Short Stories. By FRANK R. STOCKTON.

A Little Book of Profitable Tales. By EUGENE FIELD.

Reflections of a Married Man. By ROBERT GRANT.

The Opinions of a Philosopher. By ROBERT GRANT.

Each with etched frontispiece, 16mo, $1.25.

COLLEGE GIRLS

By ABBE CARTER GOODLOE. Illustrated by C. D. GIBSON. 12mo, $1.25.

"The stories are all excellent in quality, and some of them are exceedingly bright."—Boston Advertiser.

THE REVOLUTION OF 1848

From the French of IMBERT DE SAINT-AMAND. With Portraits. 12mo, $1.25.

A new volume in the popular series on the "Famous Women of the French Court."

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

153-157 Fifth Avenue, New York

The Flower of Modern British Poetry.

MESSRS. HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND COMPANY take great pleasure in announcing

A VICTORIAN ANTHOLOGY.

Selections illustrating the Editor's critical review of British poetry in the reign of Victoria ["Victorian Poets"]. Selected and edited by EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN. With brief biographies of the authors quoted, a fine frontispiece portrait of Queen Victoria, and a vignette of the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey. Large crown 8vo, bound in attractive library style, $2.50; full gilt, $3.00; half calf, $4.50; full levant, $6.00. Large Paper Edition, limited to 250 copies, printed on paper of the best quality. 2 vols. 8vo, $10.00, net.

Mr. Stedman has availed himself of the vast range and richness of the field of poetry in Great Britain during the last sixty years to prepare a book of rare value and attractiveness. It is a companion volume to his critical work on "Victorian Poets." Mr. Stedman has devoted to this work the same conscientious care which he bestows on his original volumes. The book is typographically beautiful, is printed on the best paper, and bound in a very attractive style.

ANIMA POETÆ.

Selections from the unpublished Note-Books of SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE. Edited by ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE. 1 vol. 8vo, uniform with Coleridge's Letters, $2.50.

A book in general character like Coleridge's famous "Table Talk." The topics treated or touched upon are varied, and all are marked by that affluence of intellectual light, that free play of imagination, and the literary charm which belong to Coleridge.

MR. RABBIT AT HOME.

A Sequel to "Little Mr. Thimblefinger and his Queer Country." By JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS, author of the "Uncle Remus" books. With 25 illustrations by OLIVER HERFORD. Square 8vo, $2.00.

With Mr. Harris to tell stories and Mr. Herford to illustrate them, an irresistible and most delightful result is assured.

A QUESTION OF FAITH.

A Novel by LILY DOUGALL, author of "Beggars All," "The Zeit-Geist," etc. 16mo, $1.25. This novel bids fair to surpass in popularity Miss Dougall's previous novels, which have gained her a host of readers. A leading feature of the story is the unwillingness of a lover to trust thoroughly the girl he expects to marry. A religious element enters into it, not disturbing, but adding zest.

LITTLE MISS PHOEBE GAY.

By HELEN DAWES BROWN, author of "The Petrie Estate," etc. With colored cover design and other illustrations. 16mo, $1.00.

A charming companion book to Miss White's "When Molly was Six," but intended for girls of ten years or thereabout.

OVER THE TEACUPS.

By OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES. In the exquisite Birthday Edition, uniform with this edition of the Breakfast-Table Series. 2 vols. 16mo, $2.50.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

Published this Day:

NUMBER 104

THE OLD FARMERS' ALMANACK For 1896.

ROBERT B. THOMAS.

WILLIAM WARE & CO., Publishers, Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Pebbles, Pearls, and Gems of the Orient. Selections from Eastern Wit and Wisdom. By Rev. C. D. B. MILLS. 238 pages. Cloth, full gilt, $1.50.

The Home.

THE OLD LOVE-SONG.

Play it slowly, sing it lowly,
Old, familiar tune.
Once it ran in dance and dimple,
Like a brook in June:
Now it sobs along the measures
With a sound of tears.
Dear old voices echo through it,
Vanished with the years.

Ripple, ripple, goes the love-song,
Till in slowing time
Early sweetness grows completeness,
Floods its every rhyme.
Who together learn the music
Life and death unfold
Know that love is but beginning
Until love is old.

Play it slowly,—it is holy
As an evening hymn;
Morning gladness hushed to sadness
Fills it to the brim.
Memories home within the music
Stealing through the bars;
Thoughts within its quiet spaces
Rise and set like stars.

—W. C. Gannett.

AT A FRONTIER POST.

"The old order changeth, yielding place to new." The isolated frontier post becomes the thriving town, cattle graze where the buffalo roamed. The ranchman gazes after the retreating forms of scout, trapper, and soldier. A few more years will doubtless find our little army concentrated near the large cities, and few "army girls" will look back upon such a summer as that which my sister and I passed at Fort Abraham Lincoln in 1876.

We were then little flaxen-haired girls, and my father's company of infantry formed part of the garrison of Fort Lincoln during the absence of the Seventh Cavalry on their summer campaign against the Sioux.

Old Fort Abraham Lincoln consisted of two forts. The infantry post, built for four companies, was perched on a bleak hillside. The cavalry post was spread out below on the Missouri River bottom. Neither fort had any regular defences: nothing but a single block-house, called "the tower." This commanded a wide view of the surrounding country, and was therefore occupied night and day by sentinels as a lookout station.

Back of the tower ran a deep ravine; and the low river bluffs were "criss-crossed" by "coulées," or dry gulches. Through these ravines and coulées Indians might easily creep within striking distance of the post. The helplessness of the garrison in case of surprise was so evident that an outpost, called "Camp Clark," was established on one of the surrounding hills, about two miles from the lower post.

What a glorious sight the Seventh Regiment of cavalry presented as it passed in review! The spirited war-horses, splendidly ridden by troopers in holiday garb, with arms glittering in the sun, marching to thrilling strains of music, roused us children, who had but recently come from a distant infantry post, to intense enthusiasm. We never doubted that those riders were enough to defeat all the Indians we had ever heard of.

Preparations for the campaign sped quickly to a close, till one morning the sun hid his face behind a veil of mist, as though refusing to look upon the warriors setting out, all unconscious of their doom. From our porch we could see manly forms, clad in army blue or in fringed buckskin, break away from the last embrace of wife or sister, and, waving a cheery good-by to friends, hurry away to join their troops.

Soon through the mist there began to sound strange cries. "Can any of the soldiers have been getting drunk by way of a final celebration?" was our first thought. No: as the sounds came nearer, we could discern the forty Ree scouts singing their war chant as they moved along. Next came the band of the Seventh on their white horses, playing "The Girl I left behind me," saddest of all airs to an army woman, in spite of its careless lilt. Even we, who had no dear ones in those gallant ranks, could not repress the tears.

Next the gray-haired Gen. Terry and his staff passed by; and not far behind we saw a slender form in buckskin, accompanied by a lady "passing fair,"—Gen. Custer and his wife, at the head of the Seventh Cavalry. It was a brave show, and our small hearts leaped and exulted. Were we not a soldier's daughters? But why were we not a soldier's sons? We chafed at the fate which made us miserable girls, till the showy forms on horseback passed out of sight, and the close files of the infantry took their places. There was a steady quietness about the little column which showed that it was made for business, not for show.

Behind the infantry came the Gatlings; and, last of all the baggage-wagons wound their slow length along, closing up a procession about two miles in length.

When I recall those long-vanished days, I know that we children felt but slightly the importance of the expedition against the Sioux and the dangers it involved. We had heard many jests about the "scarceness" of the Sioux when their presence was really desired. We thought there might be fighting, but that the expedition would more probably have a holiday march. Of course there were anxious women in the garrison who cherished no such illusions, but I am trying to picture events as they appeared to a romantic child of ten years.

The three companies of infantry and the detachment of cavalry left to garrison the fort soon settled down into the usual routine of duty. The pickets occasionally desecrated parties of Indians, and the possibilities of a surprise were often discussed. We decided that the stone building of the post-trader would prove the best refuge for non-combatants in case of attack.

Still, we did not abide in continual fear, but rambled over the hills in search of wild flowers, though we were strictly forbidden to venture beyond Camp Clark. What we really dreaded was passing the kennel where Gen. Custer kept his hounds. How our legs used to quake when the hounds "gave tongue," as we went by their enclosure! There is one large, smooth rock on the hillside where I often sat for half an hour or more, trying to gather courage for a dash past the pack.

Indoors we said our lessons, read all the books we could lay hands on, and acted with profound seriousness dramas of our own composition. We issued, too, a weekly paper, toward which we stood in the triple relation of editors, publishers, and sole contributors.

Of Mrs. Custer we caught occasional glimpses when she came to call on our mother or when we received permission to go to see her. A sort of fairy lady she seemed to us children, deeply read in the "Arabian Nights." Indeed, would not "Coral Lips" or "Cluster of Pearls" have recognized a sister in this lady with dark hair and rosy cheeks, whose kind smile was ever ready, and who knew so well how to charm children with stories of rides, hunts, and masquerades?

The general's library, too, with its skins and trophies of the chase, formed a very satisfactory setting for the romances we were constantly weaving. How our fancies, which had always been cooped up in a set of "double quarters," revelled in the spaciousness of Headquarters House! To us it was a palace, and the beautiful young wife of the general was its princess.

A loyal subject I was to that princess, though my lady had done no more for me than lend me a book or two and greet me with a pleasant smile; while the only act of open homage I can remember having paid her was the presentation of some yucca blossoms. Girls of my age burn their incense in secret, and I cannot help feeling even now that the telling of my then unrevealed worship is an act of treachery to the child who bore my name.

So the summer wore away till one June morning, the 25th, we were awakened by the infantry alarm,—the "long roll" on the drum. Instantly the whole garrison was in motion. There was mounting in hot haste by the officer of the day, while the "dough boys" and the cavalry detachment took up the line of defence previously agreed upon in case of attack.

Soon the roar of cannon was heard: the "Parrott" was inquiring the intentions of a band of Indians whose appearance had caused the commotion.

Presently three from their number were seen making their way toward the post, where they exhibited papers testifying to the especial "goodness" of their hearts and kindness of their dispositions. Even if we suspected that these guileless souls might find the peace path ending in Sitting Bull's camp, what right had the military to interfere?

That morning, after the Indians had dwindled to specks and disappeared, we raced gayly as ever over the hills, with two ladies of the Seventh Cavalry. And that morning three hundred men of the Seventh Cavalry, wearied by twenty-four hours in the saddle, charged three thousand Indians in the far-away valley of the Little Big Horn!

A few days more brought in the Fourth of July, the hundredth birthday of the nation. It was celebrated in the usual manner; and in the evening the enlisted men gave a ball, to which they invited the officers and ladies of the garrison, some of whom attended and danced till a late hour.

The night of the 5th of July was oppressively hot. Every breath seemed a burden, and the mosquitoes raged outside the bars. We lay courting the sleep which would hardly come, and waited for the dawn.

My next distinct recollection is of voices in the parlor, and the sound of my mother's sobs. After a while she stole back to the room where we children had lain, troubled by a vague dread of we knew not what. Then we listened with positive unbelief to the tidings which the steamer "Josephine" had just brought, together with the wounded and their escort from the Custer battlefield to the Lincoln hospital.

This tale of a steamer, with a ghastly freight of forty wounded men, seemed a fearful spectre which the morning sun must dispel. It could not be that those gallant horsemen whom we had seen ride away had lain dead, with white faces turned to the mocking blue sky, while we had been filling up the days with trivial joys and sorrows! Yet how old seemed our grief when, little by little, the truth forced itself upon our hearts!

The news had been brought to the infantry quarters; and the day was yet young when the infantry officers, their wives, and the medical staff, who had been holding a hurried consultation, decided that they might not grant to the ladies of the Seventh the poor boon of a few more hours of ignorance. The news might reach them through their kitchens.

Arrangements were therefore made to inform all the stricken women at the same time. Reveille was sounding when my mother rang the door-bell of the lady of the Seventh who lived nearest us. As she did so, a shriek arose from the bereaved women in the "laundress row," where the wives and children of the rank and file dwelt; and my mother knew how wise was the haste which seemed unkind. So the woful tidings spread to all. Then the tasks of the day resumed their tyranny, as they always must in spite of sorrow.

That night, the night of the 6th of July, it happened that my father was officer of the day,—executive officer of the garrison,—in virtue of his position, which was second in command. In that capacity he had reiterated the usual nightly commands to each sentinel. In case of alarm or other imminent danger, he was to discharge his gun as a signal.

About midnight a shot was heard from the direction of the tower. In a flash we had a vision of the deep ravine, overgrown with bushes, now, perhaps, the lurking-place of hostile Sioux. And the hospital was close by where the helpless wounded were lying!

But there was scant leisure for thought. The long roll of the infantry drums shook the air. Every man in the three scant companies fell into line. From the hill resounded the shrill notes of the bugle, with its fearful iteration of menace; and then came through the night the voice of the cannon on the hill. It seemed as if Death spoke in that solemn tone.

My father buckled on his sword to make, with his orderly, the tour of the sentries' posts,—a ride of three or four miles, since the upper and lower posts and the outpost at Camp Clark must all be visited. Delaying but a moment to tell my mother what to do in case the enemy broke in over the defenders, he was gone.

We neither said much nor wept when left to ourselves; for "duty" is a word which silences a soldier's family. But Apprehension clutched so tight at our hearts that they almost ceased to beat in his iron grasp.

We had heard that day things fearful for children's ears,—stories of torture and mutilation. I tried to banish the fearful images from my mind, and to pray for my father's safety; but, though my whole being went out in supplication, words would not come.

"Wait till we hear the rifles: then we shall know that fighting has begun," I could hear my mother whisper. How our strained ears listened in sick dread for the sound of volley firing between the deep accents of the cannon, still fired at intervals from the hill! Throughout the suspense I tried to keep quite still, so that my anxious mother might not feel my terror deepening hers.

Thus we waited. The darkness weighed down upon and added to the burden of dumb agony against which we fought; though, like dreamers struggling with a nightmare, we seemed to have lost all power of speech or motion. But it is a physical impossibility for the mind to continue long in such a state of tension. As our ears caught no hostile war-cry nor ring of musketry, we gradually began to breathe more easily.

Then, by the early light of dawn, we saw the companies file quietly back to their stations; and even before my father returned we learned it had been a false alarm. A sentinel, stricken with epilepsy, had fallen at his post, and, in so doing, by accident or by design discharged his piece. The relief guard at the tower, believing him to have fallen by a hostile bullet, gave the alarm.

Many other memories of that summer crowd up before me as I write; but some seem too sacred for print, and some, perhaps, belong to history, with which I claim no right to meddle. I have but striven to reproduce a bit of that frontier army life which in a few years will have taken its place with the things which were, but are no more.

Who could have dreamed that I, who trembled at the very name of Sioux, should within ten years be teaching the children of those dreaded warriors to read and spell! Edith Manley, in Youth's Companion.

A LITTLE BUSINESS WOMAN.

A poor family the Millairs were,—not of the wretchedly poor sort, actually suffering for want of food and clothing; but they often found it hard work to "make both ends meet," as the saying is.

They lived in a little house on the edge of a great common, where their one cow was pastured. All through the summer and autumn Antoinette and her two little brothers took turns in watching the cow, lest she should stray away so far that they might be unable to find her. Sometimes the children found it pleasant,—this being in the open air for hours, with little to do. If they could have been together, it would have been a happy play-spell for the three; but, while one watched the cow, the others were obliged to keep busy about something else, so that it was often very lonely for the watcher. During the pleasant summer weather it was not so bad, at least so far as Antoinette was concerned; for she found that she could read and watch at the same time, and spent many hours sitting under the shade of a friendly old tree, glancing up from her book often enough to call back the cow when that animal was about to stray. But when the cooler weather came on, and the girl, wrapped up in a heavy blanket, found it too cold and damp to sit on the ground, and was compelled to keep moving about in order to drive off the chilliness, it was anything but pleasant. But one day, wandering about among the tangles of weeds, shivering now and then, Antoinette grew thoughtful. She began to wonder if this must go on, if she could never have a chance at school, if her little brothers must grow up without an education. "I could learn a great deal from books by myself," she said, thinking aloud, "if I only had money to buy the books; but father has all he can do to buy us all food and clothes. If only there was some way by which I could earn a little money!" Presently, as she moved about, the fringes of her blanket caught in the tiny hooks of a tall plant that grew in abundance upon the common. She turned to disentangle herself; and, just then her brother appeared, having been sent to take her place.

"What's the matter, Nette?"

"Nothing, only these troublesome weeds are always catching into things. I wonder what they are good for, anyway."

"Why, don't you know? They use them in cloth mills to rough up the cloth. Raising a nap, I believe they call it."

"How do you know?"

"When I went to the mill where Joe works, I saw them. They fasten the heads of these teasels into a round thing that turns very fast,—a revolving cylinder, they call it; and the cloth passes over rollers under this and is scratched by the little hooks. It was the queerest thing I ever saw, and about the cutest, too!"

"I should think," said Antoinette, thoughtfully, "that a machine with little hooks all over it would be better."

"That is just what I thought," returned Johnnie, "but a man there said they had tried one that somebody invented, but they threw it aside; and he said there had never been anything tried that worked as well as these teasels."

"Well, I must go home," said the girl; and she drew her blanket closer about her, and set off on her dreary walk across the common. That night she tossed restlessly upon her pillow; and for a day or two she went about very still, and with a look on her face that, had any one noticed it, would have told of a new idea slowly taking shape.

Joe, of whom Johnnie had spoken, was a cousin who worked in a factory a few miles distant. He was an orphan and Mrs. Millaird was accustomed to perform many little services for him. A day or two after the talk which I have recorded, the good woman said:—

"I wish I could send these socks to Joe. The weather is growing so cool he will need them."

"O mother, let me go, and take them!" exclaimed Antoinette.

"You, child! Why, what can you be thinking of?"

"Yes: let me go," persisted the girl. "I could get a ride part of the way. I have never seen the factories, and I am so tired of the old common!"

The mother was astonished, and would have refused outright; but something in the little pleading face restrained her. Then the father said:—

"Why not? The child can go as well as not. She is old enough to take care of herself for a day's pleasure. I can put her on Neighbor Dubois's market wagon, and she can come back with him at night."

So it was settled, and the next morning Antoinette set off. In due time she arrived at the factory, found her cousin, who was very glad of the stockings as well as of the dainties which his aunt sent in Antoinette's basket. He managed to show the little girl over the establishment, but was much surprised when she insisted upon seeing the superintendent of the mill.

"What can you want with him?" asked Joe. "Are you going to try for a place? Because if you are, I tell you it is no use. They won't take any hands as young as you are."

"It isn't that. But I must see him!" And so he took her to the office.

"Shall I come in with you?" he asked.

"No. I want to see him alone."

The timid, shrinking child stood before the man whom all the workmen feared, and told her simple story,—how the common was covered with those burrs which she had seen in one of the rooms, and she wanted to ask if he would buy them if she should gather and bring a quantity to the mill.

"Why would you do it?" he asked, not unkindly.

"Because I want to earn some money."

"What for?"

"I want some books, so that I can learn more and be able to teach my brothers. We are too poor to go to school, and I thought, if I had books, I could study by myself; and, seeing all those teasels, I thought maybe you would buy them."

"Who sent you?"

"Nobody. That is, nobody sent me about the teasels. Mother sent some things to my cousin, and I planned to ask you this myself. Nobody knew I thought of it."

The superintendent looked down into the beseeching eyes watching the expression of his face. To her it was an important matter; while to him, a man who wrote out his orders for materials by the ton or by the thousand, the few seeds which a child could gather on a village common were too insignificant to be noticed.

"So you want to earn some money?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, my child, gather all the teasels your common affords; and I will pay you a good price for them. And see here! Does anything else grow on your common?"

"Yes, sir. There's horseradish growing along by the ditches."

"Horseradish! Well, do you suppose those brothers of yours would gather and put up a few bottles at a fair price?"

"I think they would, sir; and, if they don't, I will."

"All right."

When she had gone, and the man turned to his books again, he said, half aloud:—

"What did I do that for? If anybody had told me half an hour ago that I would stoop to such small transactions, I should have laughed at him. But, someway, I couldn't help it!"

And this is how Antoinette became a business woman.—The Pansy.

INDIAN WALKERS.

All travellers in South America are impressed by the wonderful endurance of the Indian couriers of Peru and Bolivia. A Frenchman declares that they filled him with admiration. The manner in which they journey over the Cordilleras on foot he pronounces astonishing.

They climb and descend at the same pace. They speak rarely, scarcely ever complain, and never stop. If the traveller halts for moment to light a cigar, they are at once some hundreds of feet in advance.

The gait is slow, but without relaxation. That is what makes them such incomparable couriers.

Often, when a man has a journey of several days to make, he takes his wife along. She bears her baby upon her back, and the dog follows. The husband carries the provisions. And this is how they travel:—

The Indian chews coca and spins cotton. The wife sings to the baby, and spins also. They eat without halting, and make but the shortest stop to drink. Toward night, "to comfort themselves," they chew some "roasted beans." I was escorted by an Indian and his family who travelled after this fashion.—Youth's Companion.

HE GOT IT.

Among the passengers on the St. Louis train recently was a woman very much overdressed, accompanied by a bright-looking nurse-girl and a self-willed, tyrannical boy, about three years.

The boy aroused the indignation of the passengers by his continued shrieks and kicks and screams, and viciousness toward the patient nurse. He tore her bonnet, scratched her hands, and finally spat in her face, without a word of remonstrance from the mother.

Whenever the nurse manifested any sharpness, the mother chided her sharply.

Finally, the mother composed herself for a nap; and about the time the boy had slapped the nurse for the fiftieth time a wasp came sailing in, and flew on the window of the nurse's seat. The boy at once tried to catch it.

The nurse caught his hand, and said coaxingly: "Harry mustn't touch. Bug will bite Harry."

Harry screamed savagely, and began to kick and pound the nurse.

The mother, without opening her eyes or lifting her head, cried out sharply:—

"Why will you tease that child so, Mary? Let him have what he wants at once."

"But, ma'am, it's a"—

"Let him have it, I say."

Thus encouraged, Harry clutched at the wasp, and caught it.

The mother awoke again.

"Mary," she cried, "let him have it!"

Mary turned in her seat, and said confidently,—

"He's got it, ma'am!"—Selected.

A LITTLE HEROINE.

"Nannie, dear, I want you to hem those napkins this afternoon, without fail. Can I trust you to do it? I must go out for the whole afternoon, and cannot remind you of them," said Mrs. Barton to her little girl.

"Yes, mother, dear, I will. You can trust me," said Nannie.

Now Nannie did not like to hem napkins any better than you do; but she went at once to her work-basket, took out her needle and thread and thimble, and began work. Pretty soon she heard the sound of music. It came nearer, and at last it sounded right in front of the house. She dropped her sewing to run to the window, and then she stopped.

"No: I promised mother, and she trusted me," said Nannie to herself; and she sat down again and went to sewing. Soon the door burst open, and in rushed several little girls.

"Nannie, Nannie, where are you? There's a monkey out here and a trained dog, and they're playing lovely tricks! Come on!"

"I can't. I promised mother, and she trusted me," she answered.

They coaxed and scolded, but all to no purpose. So they left her.

Just as she finished the last napkin, her mother came in. "My little heroine!" she said, as she kissed Nannie.

"Why, mother, I didn't save anybody's life or do anything brave: I only kept my promise," answered Nannie, wonderingly.

"It is sometimes harder to keep a promise and do one's duty than to save a life. You did a brave, noble thing; and I thank God for you, my dear!" said Mrs. Barton.—Our Little Ones.

A FLORIDA CRANE.

When I was a little girl, my home was in Florida; and one of my friends at school was Annie Hunter. Annie had a pet crane, which had been caught on a Florida prairie, where there are always flocks of them. His color was a light silvery blue. His body was about as large as that of a turkey-hen; and his legs and neck were so long that, when he stretched himself up, he was almost as tall as a man.

Annie called her crane Stuart. He was fond of her, would come when she called him, and, when he saw her coming from school, would meet her and walk by her side.

I longed to be friendly with him; but, when I walked softly up to him, he would raise his head and look at me, with his long bill so close to my face that I was afraid he would pick my eyes out.

He had a fancy for picking at bright buttons. He spent much time in the yard and garden, but would walk into the house like one of the family, and liked to come to the table to eat bread and potatoes.

Now, you will not think that such a pet could be of any use. But he was useful. He filled the place of a watch-dog. He slept on the back porch at night, and no one dared to enter the yard without first calling some of the family.

No chickens were stolen from the yard. No stray dog came prowling around here. He was fierce and watchful, and fought with his large, strong wings. I am sure that he could have beaten down a large boy.

Anna R. Henderson, in the Presbyterian.

STORY OF A BELL.

A very pretty story is told of the way in which a church bell was paid for. The bell hangs in the church tower of the little town of Grosslasmtz in the north of Germany. On it is engraved its history, a bas-relief representing a six-eared stalk of wheat, and the date, Oct. 15, 1729.

The bell was wanted in the village, because the one already there was so low of tone that it could not be heard at the end of the town. But the people were poor; and where was the money to come from? Every one offered to give what he could, but the united offerings did not amount to nearly enough.

One Sunday, when the schoolmaster, Gottfried Hayn, was going to church, he noticed growing out of the churchyard wall a flourishing green stalk of wheat, the seed of which must have been dropped by a passing bird. The idea struck him that perhaps this one stalk could be made the means of producing the second bell they wanted so much.

He waited till the wheat was ripe, and then plucked the six ears on it and sowed them in his own garden. The next year he gathered the little crop thus produced, and sowed it again and again till at last he had not enough room to do so longer. Then he divided the seed among a certain number of farmers, who went on sowing it until, in the eighth year, the crop was so large that, when it was put together and sold, they found that they had money enough to buy a beautiful bell.

And there it hangs, with its story and its birthday engraved upon it, and above the legend a cast of the wheat-stalk to which the bell owes its existence.—Exchange.

Impoverished

* Blood

whether due to the inheritance of some scrofulous disorder, or caused by a depleted condition of the system, is the cause of much agony. A terrible complexion, foul eruptions, and loathesome ulcers are but outward symptoms—the sufferer should remember that all of the great organs of the body are likewise diseased, and the day cannot be long distant when death must surely ensue.

Bovinine

when taken for this trouble, is a means of salvation. It creates new flesh tissue and pure red blood corpuscles, and by giving strength to the great vital centres of the body, it enables them to perform their functions naturally, and thus dispel the existing poisons by the natural channels. It is not a medicine, but a powerful food preparation and invigorant, and is endorsed by over 25,000 physicians.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

"BREVITY IS THE SOUL OF WIT."

GOOD WIFE! YOU NEED

SAPOLIO

A TOAD FOR A BAROMETER.

In a conservatory in Plainfield, N.J., is a wonderful curiosity in the form of a living barometer. This indicator of weather changes is a diminutive tree-toad, whose apartment is so arranged that the slightest change in the density of the air is foretold with wonderful accuracy. The toad was caught at Feltsville about a month ago, and Mrs. Lissignolo placed the little reptile in a large glass jar. Standing at an angle in the jar about two-thirds full of water is a small but perfectly formed ladder, and upon this the toad rests continually, never moving a muscle except when a change in the weather is to occur.

When the earth is dry and the skies clear, the toad squats contentedly upon the topmost rung of the ladder. Just as soon as a storm approaches, and many hours before it can be seen or felt in New Jersey, the tree-toad begins to descend the ladder step by step. The nearer the storm comes, the lower the toad goes, until at close approach of stormy weather it sits half submerged in the water. The little fellow has been christened "Mr. Dunn of Plainfield."

Last Sunday was beautifully bright and clear, both by day and when the moon arose in gorgeous display at night; but all day long Mr. Dunn persisted in submerging himself in the water, with only the tip of his nose showing above the surface. He could not be tempted to climb out and enjoy the beautiful day. Sunday night came the furious rain-storm that lasted several days. "Mr. Dunn of Plainfield" gave earlier notice of the storm than the head of the Dunns in New York.

The board bill of the Plainfield Dunn is inexpensive, inasmuch as he eats nothing apparently. He gets fresh water regularly and often, and obtains sustenance from that, just as a fish does. He refuses all offers of flies, bugs, and leaves.—New York Tribune.

Charities and Reforms.

THE NEW ENGLAND HOSPITAL.—The annual meeting of the New England Hospital for Women and Children will be held at Copley Hall, Tuesday, October 29, at 3.30 P.M., and promises to be a great success. Addresses will be given by Dean Hodges of Cambridge, Dr. Maurice H. Richardson of Boston, Dr. Emily Blackwell of New York, and Julia Ward Howe of Boston. It is hard to realize that this institution was the pioneer in the great movement for women physicians. The good work it has accomplished during the past thirty-three years is incalculable. In its early days of poverty and unpopularity, when it meant social ostracism to espouse openly the cause of women physicians, there were several noble women who gave, without stint and with no pecuniary compensation, of their time and strength to the building up of this hospital, thus giving an opportunity of study and practice to women who by qualification and taste were led to the study of the art of healing and surgery. Several of these women are living to-day, and reaping the fruits of their labors. We ask no better proof of the success of this institution than the list of speakers who are to testify to the good work it has accomplished and the following patronesses who will insure the success of this meeting: Mrs. Charles Fairchild, Mrs. Alfred Bowditch, Mrs. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Mrs. Robert S. Peabody, Mrs. Samuel Cabot, Mrs. Henry S. Russell, Mrs. Moorfield Storey, Mrs. John Graham Brooks, Mrs. Henry Whitman, and Mrs. Augustus P. Loring. After the reports and addresses a tea will be served, giving an opportunity for social intercourse and congratulations. A cordial invitation is extended to all friends of the hospital to attend.

Temperance.

The Canadian Temperance League recently presented a gold medal to the pupil in the public schools of Toronto who passed the best examination in the study of temperance and physiology.

When any one wants to open a saloon in Mississippi, he must first get a majority of the voters of the place to sign his petition for license, and then he must publish the list in a local paper for three weeks.—Ram's Horn.

The cause of temperance in Europe has found great encouragement in the Anti-alcoholic Congress, which was held at Basle the latter part of August. There were about five hundred in attendance from different parts of Europe,—physicians, scholars, churchmen, laborers, men of every class and condition in life. There were several reunions of "The Blue Cross," and twenty-five of the attendant physicians formed a total abstinence association.

A new organization, the "Loyal Cadets of Honor," has been formed in Boston, having for its object the promotion of love, purity, and abstinence, and embodying in its plan of work many of the successful features of the older organizations for the promotion of temperance and purity, and also some peculiar features of its own. It is specifically planned for the young people during the character-forming period of life; and active membership will commence at the age of twelve, and cease at twenty-one. In this an effort will be made to give a pleasant meeting-place for the young, free from the dangerous influences of the saloons and other places that furnish attractions for young people. The meetings are made interesting by having just enough and not too much training. The general plan is to have an earnest and impressive rendering of the society ritual, a few crisp, concise remarks from older helpers, and then a good time, varying in character on different evenings. The organization is warmly indorsed by Parker B. Field of the Barnard Memorial, R. Kidner of St. Andrew's Parish House, and others. Any one interested in this work or in the young is earnestly asked to correspond with either of the following members of the Propagating Committee: Allanson M. Phillips, State Regent, No. 31 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.; William J. Stanton, State Secretary, No. 43 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.; Emily H. Osborne, State Treasurer, No. 10 Melrose Street, Boston, Mass.

Here and There.

That a plant appreciated by the cultivator in one country is but a weed in another is exemplified by the sensitive plant. In our gardens few are more welcome. In India it is such a pest that it is regarded with as much disgust as the Canada thistle, horse nettle, or other notorious plants are by the American cultivator. It is considered one of the vilest weeds in India.

Europe's first automatic restaurant appears to be a success. At the Italian exhibition in Berlin this peculiar mechanical eating-house attracts large crowds. A number of nickel-in-the-slot machines are arranged in rows around the walls, and dispense sandwiches, wines, or liquors, and even a cup of hot coffee. It is not necessary to wait for the waiter to get a meal. Ten pfennigs put in the slot of the respective machine will not only secure the required article, but the machine will clean the plate, rinse the cup or glass, and wipe it dry before the customer's eyes.—Journal of Commerce.

The German botanist, Alfred Möller, though not a sluggard, has gone to the ant and considered her ways; and a writer in Good Words tells of the wisdom which accrued therefrom. He discovered that tropical ants never eat the pieces of leaves which they may sometimes be seen carrying. Instead, they knead them for a quarter of an hour, forming them into doughy little pellets. These form a vegetable soil over which a fungus grows, on the surface of which appear little knobs of mushrooms about the size of a pin-head. These mushrooms are the only food of the ants, who work hard at fetching and kneading leaves all their lives.

Perhaps the oddest pavement ever laid is one just completed at Chino, Cal. It is made mostly of molasses; and, if it proves all the success claimed for it, it may point a way for the sugar-planters of the South to profitably dispose of millions of gallons of useless molasses which they are said to have on hand. The molasses used is a refuse product, hitherto believed to be of no value. It is simply mixed with a certain kind of sand to about the consistency of asphalt, and laid like an asphalt pavement. The composition dries quickly, and becomes quite hard, and remains so. The peculiar point of it is that the sun only makes it drier and harder instead of softening it, as might be expected.

Women Win

praise when successful housekeepers. One element of that success is

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

It imparts a brilliancy to silverware, easily and quickly, that will satisfy the most ambitious housekeeper. Never wearing or scratching.

Trial quantity for the asking.
Box post-paid, 15 cents.
It's sold everywhere.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York

GLENWOOD

RANGES AND HEATERS

MAKE HOUSEKEEPING EASY.

TWO GOLD MEDALS.

Made by WEIR STOVE CO., Taunton, Mass.

Hymnal.

AMORE DEI.

This Hymnal is steadily making its way into use in a large number of churches, and in all cases gives satisfaction.

If considering a new book, send for sample copies, which will be sent subject to return, if not adopted.

PRICES:

Cloth, 90 cents; Leather, $1.35.

By the dozen, per copy,

Cloth, 75 cents; Leather, $1.10.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Popular Works.

Baltimore American.—There is a tranquil, strengthening, uplifting power in these little books that makes one cherish for them, when they have been enjoyed and laid aside, the warm, grateful sentiment with which we treasure dear friends.

"As Natural as Life."
Studies of the Inner Kingdom. By Charles G. Ames, Minister of the Church of the Disciples, Boston. 109 pages.

"One of the most satisfying treatises we have ever read. The little volume is a spiritual poem, expressed in a human form called prose; but the beauty of its truth has root in the Infinite. It will prove a keen delight to the appreciative thinker."—Boston Ideas.

In Love with Love.
Four Life-Studies. By James H. West, author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," "Poems," etc. 109 pages.

"There is something singularly fresh and strong in Mr. West's way of putting things. Any one of these studies read at night would sweeten a man's slumber, and waken him in the morning to some better sense of his great opportunity."—John W. Chadwick, in the Christian Register.

A Child of Nature.
Studies of the Outward as related to the Inward Life. By Marion D. Shutter, D.D., author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. 111 pages.

"One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful."—Philadelphia To-day.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, each 50 cents.
Special gift edition, full gilt, each $1.00.

 For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

Just Published.

The Postulates of Revelation and of Ethics.

BY
THOMAS HILL, D.D., LL.D.

Contents:

PART I., POSTULATES OF REVELATION,—I. The Unseen Real; II. The Reality of Knowledge; III. The Infinite Knowable; IV. Final Causes; V. The Universe a Work of Art; VI. Power and Possibility; VII. Logic and Love; VIII. Beauty; IX. The Testimony of Conscience; X. The Infinite in Man; XI. Relativity and Reality; XII. The Universe a Revelation; XIII. Authority and Inspiration; XIV. Summary of Natural Sources of Religious Knowledge.

PART II., POSTULATES OF ETHICS,—I. The Field of Ethics; II. The Validity of Moral Perceptions; III. The Nature of Ethical Relations; IV. The Innocence and Sinfulness of Error; V. Love and Duty; VI. Determinism and Utility; VII. Duties Relative to Self; VIII. The Connection of Ethics with Religion; IX. Non-religious Morals and Moralists; X. Learning by Doing.

394 pages, with portrait, price $1.50.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

"Unity Pulpit"

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents.

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.
2. God in the City.
3. Reaping Time.
4. Called to be Saints.
5. Prosperity and Adversity. (By George W. Stone.)

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. F. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William L. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William E. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 9. THE BEATITUDE OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simons. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.

No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.

No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.

No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

Now ready:—

1. The Public Service of Religion.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889.
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

BENJAMIN OUSHING, M.D.

Dr. Benjamin Cushing of Boston passed away at his home on Percival Avenue, Dorchester, on Wednesday last, at the age of seventy-three. Dr. Cushing was born in Hingham, Mass., in 1822, and was brought to Dorchester when two years old. He fitted for college at Derby Academy in Hingham, and was graduated at Harvard in the class of 1842. During his college course he made a trip to Cuba for the benefit of his health; and this disturbance of his course, though he kept up with his class, prevented him from taking the rank which naturally belonged to him. On leaving college, he made a voyage to Calcutta in a sailing-vessel, and was gone about a year, doubling the Cape of Good Hope twice, the sea voyage occupying some eight months of that time. He began his medical studies under the supervision of Dr. Winslow Lewis of Boston and his uncle, Robert Thaxter. He entered the Harvard Medical School, and received his M.D. in 1846. Immediately after he went to Paris for medical study, and remained a year, Dr. George A. Gay and the late Dr. Henry Williams of Boston being fellow-students. Together they witnessed the first application of ether in the hospitals of Paris; and Dr. Cushing contributed but recently an interesting article to the Medical and Surgical Journal, describing this event. In 1847 he began the practice of medicine in Dorchester, Mass., with his uncle, Dr. Robert Thaxter, whose daughter, Anna Quincy Thaxter, he married in 1848.

During the Civil War Dr. Cushing served a few months as a volunteer surgeon at Fortress Monroe. He took a high standing in his profession. He was on the Consulting Board of the Boston City Hospital, chairman of the Visiting Board of the Danvers Asylum for the Insane, and was an authority on alienism. He was interested in securing a State Dipsomaniac Hospital in Massachusetts, and gave much time and thought to the preliminary discussions which led to the establishment of the institution at Foxboro, which, he thought, ought to be conducted more as a hospital than as a penal institution. He was a member of the Massachusetts Medical Society and of the Dorchester Medical Club.

He visited Europe in 1866 and 1875. He was a member of the New England Historic Genealogical Society, and had a deep interest in the local history of Dorchester. During his sickness for the last fifteen months he beguiled the hours by correspondence with Mr. Thomas Mowle, the curator of the museum in Dorchester, England, who warmly reciprocated his interest in that interesting old town. He served on the Dorchester school committee for some time, and was influential in introducing drawing in the schools. He was likewise much interested in the history and fortunes of the First Church, Dorchester, and was instrumental in introducing a paid choir. His love of music was one of his distinguishing features, and the last weeks of his sickness were made brighter by vocal and instrumental selections furnished by family and friends. He was a man of strong individuality, independent opinion, united with a rare modesty. This brief outline of his external career cannot do justice to that quiet, kindly, and humane service which he constantly rendered in the community where he was respected and loved.

Spiritual Life.

No soul is happy until it has learned that to be happy is not a necessity.—M. C. Klingelsmith.

It is not the people who are helping the world who are pessimistic over the condition of things: it is the idle on-lookers.—M. J. Savage.

The decoration and enlargement of the heart are the direct end of truth, and without this result knowledge is not power, but is treasure buried and forgotten—like the fabled gold of Capt. Kidd—by some unknown sea.—David Swing.

Out of hearts ploughed by contrition spring flowers fairer than ever grew on the hard ground of unbroken self-content. There bloom in them sympathy and charity for other erring mortals and patience under suffering.—Sacred Heart Review.

Every thought we think, every word we speak, every action we perform, every opportunity of service neglected or improved, is a seed sown by us, the fruit of which shall multiply either untold miseries or myriad blessings.—William M. Taylor.

The great secret of all peace lies in the ascendancy of some strong love. Love—the admiring or reverent direction of the heart on some object—is the positive power of our life; and on its free action, on its due match against the problems it undertakes, depend the tranquillity and unity of existence.—James Martineau.

Education.

It used to be argued that there was no demand for courses of lectures in pedagogy in the universities of this country,—that there would be no students to take the courses, even though they were offered. Perhaps the best answer to this argument is the number of students pursuing such lines of instruction wherever offered. Out in California, at the Stanford University, Prof. Earl Barnes's three most important courses had the following number of students enrolled the opening week of this term: history of European education, 115; history of American education, 70; psychology of childhood, 103.—General Education.

Dr. C. A. Clinton of San Francisco Board of Education has made a special study of the effect of cigarette smoking among the public school children of that city, and expresses himself in the following unmistakable language: "A good deal has been said about the evils of cigarette-smoking, but one-half the truth has never been told. Cigarette-smoking blunts the whole moral nature. It has an appalling effect upon the system. It first stimulates and then stupefies the nerves. It sends boys into consumption. It gives them enlargement of the heart, and it sends them to the insane asylum. I am physician to several boys' schools, and I am often called in to prescribe for palpitation of the heart. In nine cases out of ten, it is caused by the cigarette habit. I have seen bright boys turned into dunces and straightforward, honest boys made into miserable cowards by cigarette smoking. I am speaking the truth, that every physician and nearly every teacher knows."—Phrenological Journal.

Science.

The remarkable discoveries of Dr. Garman of the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy of Cambridge are thus described in the Commonwealth: "These queer fishes which Dr. Garman has studied belong to the genus Anableps, the haunts of which are in warm waters from South to Central America. There are several odd things about them. In the first place, they bring forth their young alive instead of depositing eggs in suitable places and leaving the rest of it to good fortune. In the second place, they have a very curious eye: it is the exact counterpart of the divided spectacle lens which is so commonly in use, one-half for far sight, and the other for reading. This is literally true: the eyeball of the fish is divided into two portions by a black curtain, so that there is an upper half-eye and a lower half-eye. The division begins very early in the development of the young fish, there being first a little encroachment of the black border into the eyeball, and, having entered it, finally stretches clear across horizontally. So the fish has two half-eyes in each socket. Anableps is a fish of rather large horizontal proportions; and, as he swims, his head lies partly out of the water, the water-line being, in fact, just at the division in his eye. The upper eye he uses for vision through the air, seeking for food in the vegetables floating on the surface. The lower half of his eye he uses for vision through the water, and thus gets timely warning of the approach of his enemies."

Two Mince Pies, equal to our Grandmother's, from each package of None-Such Mince Meat, without the worry and work. For sale by all Grocers.

MERRELL-SOULE CO.,
Syracuse, N. Y.

Boys' Knockabout Suits

$5.00

Sizes, 4 to 14 years.

This serviceable, Strictly All-wool School and Play Suit is in every respect what its name implies, a KNOCKABOUT SUIT. The fabric has been selected, and the Colors in their Non-soiling essentials have been chosen with a view to combining in a Boys' Suit all those attributes of strength, neatness of appearance, and wear-resisting qualities which are so sought after by parents to stand the test of real hard wear which the average wide-awake boy gives his clothes. The Trousers are fitted with our patent "Cavalry" or double cloth knee, and extra pieces and buttons accompany each suit.

$5.00

The name KNOCKABOUT is original with us, being our own idea and copyright, and the suits are of our own exclusive manufacture.

A. SHUMAN & CO.,

Shuman Corner

Boston.

CLASS TABLE SET,

60 Pieces,

Thin Blown and Etched,

$13.75

Complete.

12 WATER TUMBLERS, 12 CLARET GLASSES, 12 CHAMPAGNE TUMBLERS, 12 SHERRY GLASSES, 12 FINGER BOWLS.

Packed 1 set in case, and delivered free of breakage to any part of the United States.

Abram French Company, 89, 91, 93 FRANKLIN ST.

Literary Lectures

—FOR—

UNITY CLUBS, WOMEN'S ALLIANCES, Etc.

By Rev. GEO. H. YOUNG

—ON—

Madame de Stael. Jane Austen.
Elizabeth Frye. Mary Lamb.
Louisa Alcott. Charlotte Bronte.
George Eliot. Jane Welsh Carlyle.
Dorothea Dix. Margaret Fuller.
E. B. Browning. Alice and Phoebe Cary.

For circulars and terms address

LAWRENCE, MASS.

Series of attractive lectures.—Lawrence American.
Delightful lectures.—Lawrence Eagle.
Large and select audience gathered to enjoy the literary treat offered. Mr. Young is a very interesting speaker, and held the attention of his audience closely. All who listened to this lecture will be anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity offered for the remainder of the course.—Portsmouth Times.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

29. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. I. The Theological Method. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
30. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. II. The Socialistic Method. By WILLIAM POTTS.
31. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. III. The Anarchistic Method. By HUGH O. PENTECOST.
32. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. IV. The Scientific Method. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
33. ASA GRAY: His life and work. By MRS. MARY TREAT.
34. EDWARD LIVINGSTON YOUNG. The Man and his work. By PROF. JOHN FISKE.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites
many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods
in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus,
love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR OCTOBER.

The Glory of the Present Hour. Rev. Frank L. Phalen.
Perhaps To-day. Rachel B. MacMullin.
Salvation: What it is and is not. H. W. Crosskey, LL.D., F.G.S.
Hidden Treasures. Maud L. Cotton.
Savonarola: A Sketch. I. S. Fletcher Williams.
Somewhere. Philip Falconar Deane.
The Vision of Rabbi Zeb. E. L. R.
Praying to Christ. Martha Perry Lowe.
Toleration in Religion. Edwin Burt Beckwith.
Passing Joy. Elizabeth Hill.
The Growth of Religion.
A Vacation Glimpse of England. J. T. Sunderland.
An Epitaph. C. Leech.
Divinity in Humanity. W. H. Fish, Sr.
The Shrewd Layman.
Types of the Spirit. William M. Bicknell.
The Mist. Hattie Tyng Griswold.
The National Conference.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women; Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work, Christopher R. Eliot; Literary Notes.
Children's Corner.
NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*. Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

JAMES KAY APPLEBEE

is open to engagements for PREACHING or LECTURING. Address: ALLSTON, MASS.

CHURCH
CARPETS

AT MANU-FACTURERS' PRICES. JOHN H. PRAY, Sons & Co., CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY, 658 WASHINGTON ST., OPP. BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON.

Pleasantries.

A countryman gave an order at a book-store, and among other items called for "2 Sambux." He wanted two Psalm Books.

Little four-year-old Ray, being asked why he did not put his knife in his pocket, replied, "My pocket hasn't got any floor in it."—Youth's Companion.

When little Rupert saw a vender's horse whose ribs were plainly visible the other day, he said to his nurse: "O Ellen, just look at the horse with corduroy skin!"—Harper's Round Table.

"Well, we have a feminine attorney among us now," said one Pittsburg lawyer to another. "Yes," was the reply. "What relation is she to us, a sister-in-law?"—Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph.

Little Fred, visiting in the country, and seeing for the first time a pair of oxen attached to a cart, ran in to his mother, exclaiming: "O mamma, mamma! Come out and see this cow-buggy going by!"—Selected.

Dog Fancier: "Yes, madam, I have all kinds of dogs here. Is there any particular kind you wish?" Old lady (who reads the papers): "Oh, anything that's fashionable. Let me see an ocean greyhound."—Standard.

Hoax: "I was trying to think of a man's name to-day, and I couldn't. Then all of a sudden a shower came up." Joax: "Well, what had that to do with it?" Hoax: "Everything. His name was McIntosh."—Erle Messenger.

Doctor: "Well, my little fellow, you have got quite well again. I was sure that the pills I left for you would cure you. How did you take them, in water or in cake?" "Oh, I used them in my blow-gun."—The Standard.

Roy's grandpa (to Frankie, aged five): "Frankie, Roy's grandpa was a little boy like you once." Frankie: "My grandpa wasn't never a little boy, I know. Coz I was to his house a great while ago, and he wasn't then!"—The Standard.

The vexed question of conjugal obedience was settled by Spurgeon in a characteristic way. In an address at the marriage of the daughter of a friend he spoke thus to the bride about her future lord: "Let him be the head, and do you be the neck, and turn him which way you please."—Gleanings.

An Afterthought.—He: "I never saw anything like this tide. Here I've been pulling steadily for ten minutes, and we don't seem to have moved a foot." She (after a pause): "Oh, Mr. Stroker, I've just thought of something: the anchor fell overboard awhile ago, and I forgot to tell you. Do you suppose it could have caught on something?"—Truth.

Here are some sample questions and answers from a certain New England school. Teacher (after a lesson in physiology on the names and structure of the teeth): "Now, John, name the teeth." John (hesitatingly): "The teeth—the teeth—are the cupids, the bicupids, and the morals." Teacher: "What is the opposite of 'orthodox'?" Boy: "'Paradox.'"—Boston Transcript.

Papa was speaking of Dr. Kane's remark in his book on arctic exploration to the effect that Esquimaux women have a habit, apropos to nothing in particular, of "bursting into a gentle gush of woe." There were some wonderings by several members of the family circle as to the reason of this, when Master Hall, eight years old, said, "Perhaps it's because they eat so much blubber!"—The Presbyterian.

"My father," said the small boy to the woman who was calling on his mother, "is a great man. He knows what time it is without even looking at his watch." "What do you mean, Tommy?" asked the visitor. "Oh, when I holler out and ask him what time it is in the morning, he always says it's time to get up. And, when I ask him what time it is in the evening, he always says, 'Time to go to bed, Tommy.'"—The American.

An old Highland sergeant, in one of the Scottish regiments, was going his rounds one night to see that all the lights were out in the barrack-rooms. Coming to a room where he thought he saw a light shining, he roared out, "Put oot that light there!" One of the men shouted back, "Man, it's the mune, sergeant." Not hearing very well, the sergeant cried in return: "I dinna care a tacket what it is! Put it oot!"—Army and Navy Journal.

A recently published book on railway systems contains this new version of the old story of an aged lady's first journey by rail. As the train was pitched down an embankment, and she crawled from beneath the wreckage, she asked a passenger, "Is this Stamford?" "No, madam," replied the man, who was pinned down by a piece of timber. "This is not Stamford: it's a catastrophe." "Oh!" cried the lady. "Then I hadn't oughter got off here."

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON, EUROPEAN PLAN, J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....	$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....	22,217,399.94
	$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

New York, N.Y., 11 West 86th St. (adj. Central Park). A Boarding & Day School for Girls. Mlle. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Fall term begins Oct. 1. Kindergarten begins Oct. 15.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION

for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods: large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. E. W., Christian Register.

COOK'S TOURS.

ESTABLISHED 1841.

HOLYLAND TOURS.

All Travelling Expenses Included.

Parties under Personal Escort will leave New York, Nov. 6 per S.S. Augusta Victoria. A Special Tour spending Christmas at Jerusalem and Bethlehem. Jan. 8 per S.S. Normania; Jan. 22 per S.S. Kaiser Wilhelm II.; Feb. 12 per S.S. Fulda; Feb. 19 per S.S. Normania; Feb. 29 per S.S. Werra.

Fares range from $675 to $1,225. Illustrated descriptive pamphlet free on application.

COOK'S NILE STEAMERS

will leave Cairo

Rameses III.....	Nov. 12	Rameses III.....	Dec. 10
Rameses Great.....	Nov. 26	Rameses Great.....	Dec. 24

and weekly thereafter.

Dahabeahs and Special Steamers for private parties. Programme of European Tours. Season 1896 on application.

THOS. COOK & SON,
New York, 261 and 1225 Broadway; Boston, 332 Washington St.; Philadelphia, 824 Chestnut St.; Chicago, 234 South Clark St.
Official Ticket Agents for all Trunk Lines.

Atlanta Exposition.

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors. Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Convenient to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin.

BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

Rooms To Let.

Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at 36 RUTLAND SQUARE.

The MAGEE RANGES ARE THE BEST

Examine the patent OVEN THERMOMETER, Pronounced by ALL COOKS to be the GREATEST IMPROVEMENT of modern times.

No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost over any others on the market.

The name MAGEE carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use.

Descriptive Circulars Free.

FOR SALE BY LEADING DEALERS EVERYWHERE.

MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY,
Boston. New York. Chicago.

Says Miss Parloa of the American Cooking School.

PIANOS

If no dealer sells Ivers & Pond Pianos in your vicinity it will pay you to write Rev. T. L. Eliot 6Aug96. A thoroughly reliable piano is what you want we will send you one. If you need time for paying let us send explanation of our Easy Payment Plan, the fairest and easiest.

Reduced prices for pianos that have had a little use. Don't buy before writing us.

IVERS & POND PIANO CO., 183 Tremont Street, BOSTON, MASS.

GEO. H. ELLIS,

Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1895.

NUMBER 44.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; The National Conference,	689
Serving Tables; The Art of Skipping; A Good Example; Ex-governor Ames,	690
CONFERENCE NOTES.	690
UNITARIAN NATIONAL CONFERENCE.
Our Gospel, by Rev. M. J. Savage,	691
Address of the Council, by Rev. George Batchelor,	693
The Women's National Alliance, by Mrs. Emily A. Field,	694
The Unitarian Outlook in Great Britain, by Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D.,	695
The Church and the Masses, by Rev. John Cuckson,	697
Our Congregational Polity, by Rev. F. L. Hosmer; Discussion by Rev. S. R. Calthrop,	699
Church Extension, by Rev. D. W. Morehouse,	701
Business Record,	703
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Gownswomen,	704
Stevenson's Youthfulness; Dr. Frank C. Burdington; Mrs. James P. Walker,	710
A Greek Inscription; Gold,	711
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	705
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	705
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	705
LITERATURE.
Book Notices; Magazines; Books received,	706
THE HOME.
Betty's Blazing Star, by Dorothy E. Nelson,	708
The New Boy at Fairmont; A Brave Woman; Can a Dog think? An Intelligent Horse,	709
POETRY.
Robert Beverly Hale, by F. H. R. P.,	704
October, by Katherine S. Mason,	708
Little Lake,	711
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	710
SCIENCE,	710
TEMPERANCE,	710
HERE AND THERE,	711
PLEASANTRIES,	712

SPECIMEN COPIES of the Christian Register will be sent free for four weeks to any one wishing to examine it. Application should be made with address in full to

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Editorial.

IN the discussion of social problems at the National Conference at Washington Hon. Carroll D. Wright was called on for a word. Mr. Wright said that the strongest feature of the whole movement for reform to-day lies in the fact that there is no solution. It would be easy to misunderstand and pervert these words into the language of pessimism or despair; but such was not the tone in which they were uttered, nor was it their real significance. There is no solution, according to Col. Wright, because the question is of the everlasting struggle of mankind upward and onward. "And what is there to solve," he asks, "except to keep that struggle up?" He showed that the facts which may be gathered on these questions have no force until they are electrified by the spirit and movement of religion, and a religion which embraces the whole welfare of humanity. It is easy in these days to find patent solutions for the labor question and all other social difficulties. Some of these would lead us into worse difficulties than those they undertake to remedy. Col. Wright puts the whole thing on a larger and broader basis; that is to say, on the necessity of human development. For an improved society we must have an improved man. This is what Lavelaye meant when he said, "More light, more justice, more love."

ANOTHER thought of Col. Wright is that, as we advance in the study of these questions, we are getting deeper and deeper in the complications that come of a higher intelligence. The more we advance in the study of social problems, the more we find that the whole subject is reticulated with difficulties. It is a higher intelligence and a higher sense of justice which enable us to recognize these difficulties at all. Ignorance and short-sightedness would not perceive them. It is just as in the physical universe. The discovery of the telescope revealed thousands of worlds unseen before by the unaided eye; and the discovery of the microscope has disclosed still another realm of existence, and made the problems of sanitary and medical science to-day far more complex than they used to be. But, while this growth in intelligence and in ethical perceptions renders these problems of reform more difficult, it furnishes us with forces better equipped to grapple with them. It is something to know what are the real conditions with which we have to deal. Only then are we prepared to meet them. Thus, while more knowledge reveals more difficulty, more justice and more love and more intelligence help us to grapple with them.

WE have claimed that there is a good deal of liberty exercised by the Roman Catholic laity independent of its clergy. This ought to be a matter of gratitude, and probably is among progressive Catholics. Our Roman Catholic contemporary, the Sacred Heart Review, however, makes it a subject of complaint. It protests against what it calls the danger of compromise. "Look for instance," it says, "at the large number of Catholic students at Harvard, at Yale, at Brown University, and other Protestant institutions. They are counted by scores, while Catholic institutions are deprived of the benefit of their presence. Even the Protestant Chautauqua, we are told, has had to provide accommodations for the Catholics who go there." The Review thinks this indicates that Catholic parents "are sadly lacking in loyalty and devotion to their principles." But there is another view to take of it; and that is that many Catholics find that such institutions as those named are conducted in no sectarian spirit, that they can attend them without having their religion interfered with, and that they can study history and science with much more freedom than when under the bias of sectarian instruction, whether Protestant or Catholic.

WE have heretofore refrained from making any comment upon the public dispute carried on in the newspapers concerning the relation of Prof. Bemis to the University of Chicago. We have withheld an opinion because we do not wish to pass judgment on ex parte testimony. The case is now pretty well before the public, Prof. Bemis having made personal declarations which have been answered by statements of President Harper and by Profs. Small and Butler. We have also had the opportunity of an interview with one of the trustees who has been connected with the university from the beginning. Mr. Bemis has charged the university with being under the influence of capitalists who found his teaching offensive, and therefore secured his discharge. He has failed, however, to produce any evidence whatever that the university has been restricted in its freedom by the gifts it has received. Profs. Small and Butler both make a most emphatic and unreserved assertion that the freedom of teaching has never been involved in the case, which would have been precisely the same if the subjects taught had been Sanskrit, psychology, or mathematics. President Harper absolutely denies statements which have been put into his mouth. The issue raised he characterizes as an entirely false one, and based on charges without the shadow of a foundation. This is one of those cases in which trial by newspaper is not easy, and the result is often to bring in a verdict before the case is fairly heard. To us it seems that the University of Chicago has treated Mr. Bemis with much consideration, and that its wholesome freedom of scholarship has not been successfully assailed.

AN association of men has been formed in Massachusetts to prevent the extension of suffrage to women. It has just issued a circular to show that women already possess under the law "certain privileges which are denied to men." Among the privileges enumerated are the exemption of women from the payment of a poll tax, from doing jury duty or military service. "Women selling liquors illegally, though on their own account, are not punishable therefor; but their husbands are held accountable. Women, though able through past accumulations or present earnings, are not obliged to support their husbands nor their children nor themselves, if their husbands are living." Not all of these privileges, however, are enjoyed exclusively by women. Male idiots and aliens are not obliged to pay a poll tax, to do jury duty or military duty. Non-citizenship and natural inferiority always secure certain exemptions, without regard to sex, so that the Man Suffrage Association is not correct in saying that all these privileges are denied to men. It probably meant to say "male voters." Even then, doctors and clergymen and men over forty-five have certain exemptions without losing the ballot. Does the Man Suffrage Association wish us to believe that, on the whole, the privileges women have without the ballot are greater than men have with it? Evidently, for it declares that, "with equality for suffrage, special privileges to women should cease," and it therefore, though it does not believe in women voting, somewhat inconsistently urges women to vote "No" at the State election on the suffrage question. If the Man Suffrage Association looks with covetous eyes on the special exemptions which disfranchised women enjoy, why not offer to change places with them? On the contrary, though male aliens are not liable to jury duty, to poll taxes, and to military service, we find them crowding the court-rooms in order to become naturalized, and give up these special privileges which they enjoy together with women. We doubt, therefore, if many women will be deceived by the gallantry of such logic.

WE suspect that the circular is similarly inaccurate when it says "that these privileges women desire to retain." Undoubtedly, some women do; but we very much doubt if the majority of women in Massachusetts demand the privilege of freedom from punishment for the illegal sale of liquors, or to be exempt from the privilege of supporting their own children when they are able to do so. On the contrary, we suspect that the women of Massachusetts would like to stop the illegal sale of liquor altogether, and that they would be in favor of punishing either men or women who did not support their children when they could. Such laws as these show the curious conception that men sometimes have of the nature of privilege, and what a botch they often make of it when they attempt to legislate for women. We assure the Man Suffrage Association that there are a large number of women who would not only be willing to pay their poll tax, but to do jury duty, and would be willing to be held personally responsible for the illegal sale of liquor to their husbands and brothers. In case of war, many of them would promptly go to the front with Clara Barton and Mary Livermore, and those who did not would render a service to the State at home quite equal to that rendered by their brothers in the field. We object to such discriminations in favor of women as those we have mentioned. With the adoption of woman suffrage, they ought to disappear. Let us have equal rights and equal duties, but not unjust discrimination against either sex.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The Unitarian National Conference, which was held in Washington last week, is the most representative of all Unitarian gatherings, not only geographically, but in every other way. It is an exposition of what Unitarianism is thinking, feeling, and doing to-day. To any one who wishes to know the attitude of modern Unitarianism in theology, social science, and religion, we should say read the full reports of the Conference.

The Conference has never struck a higher note nor sustained it better. It was sounded in the opening sermon on Monday night, and was held like a dominant organ point all through the week till the culmination in the platform meeting of Thursday night, when Mr. Savage, whose discourse had opened the Conference, spoke the closing word. The sermon sounded "Our Gospel," the last meeting presented "Our Outlook," and there was nothing between these two meetings that was not in some way gospel or outlook.

Great waves of discussion which had broken high in previous Conferences, arrayed Unitarians in opposing parties, and threatened collision and shipwreck of the barks manoeuvring for position, were wholly lacking at Washington. But there was no stagnation in the great calm which these storms of disputation had given place. It was the calm of spiritual unity, of a completed fellowship. It was the calm of the deep ocean, not of the way-side pool. And one could not help feeling the quieter tide of the spirit which rose to full height, and bore the whole Conference on its bosom. It was unalloyed pleasure to feel that no one was left out, and that brethren who had before come in under protest or had watched the Conference from the outside were standing and speaking on the same platform, urging the same cause, and advocating the same principles. These were some of the rich fruits of the last Conference, which, let us hope, will continue to bear fruit for years to come.

The organic spirit which has impelled Unitarianism with renewed energy and effectiveness in the last ten or fifteen years found new expression at the Conference. There was here not only an exhibition of spiritual motors, but plans for laying the wires to connect this energy with every department of our Church and associated work. Unitarianism is moving more and more toward unity of action as well as unity of sentiment. A new evidence of this is seen in the wise endeavor, unfolded and accepted at the Conference, to unite all the young people's societies in our churches into organic association.

It would be a mistake to suppose, however, that the denominational mechanism was uppermost at this gathering. It was, above all, an occasion for the development of that inspiration and motor power without which all organization becomes idle and rusty. In evidence of this, though it is difficult to transfer the personal force of the speakers to the printed page, we may refer to the earnest, living reports of our missionaries, and to the kindling sermon, essays, and addresses which will be found in this and the next number of the Christian Register.

The voice of the Conference strongly protested against the outrages upon Armenians under Turkish rule, and affirmed the responsibility of the treaty powers. There was an earnest declaration in favor of municipal reform, independent of party affiliation; a broad resolution in regard to temperance; and a resolution setting forth the basis of the National Conference as the best basis for religious unity.

The Conference was largely attended, and we have not heard from a single delegate who did not pronounce the meeting in Washington a great success.

SERVING TABLES.

The early apostles were shrewd as well as good. They were wise enough to let others do a share of their work. When they were busy preaching, and there were outside matters to be attended to, they thought it entirely out of reason for them to "leave the word of God and serve tables." They said that men of wisdom and business experience must be chosen to do these other things, and the apostle must be left free to attend to the ministry of the word. So they chose Stephen and Philip and Prochorus and Nicanor and Timon and Parmenas and Nicolas as "seven men of honest report." Stephen, having apostolic zeal as well, suffered martyrdom for his devotion to his faith; and so his fame as well as his name have come down the ages. Philip, too, took to preaching, and is better known for baptizing the treasurer of Candace, Queen of the Ethiopians, than for serving tables. But probably Prochorus and the rest of them smoothed the way of the apostles, and saved their precious time for better work than these honest men could do.

It is the work that is done out of sight that is like the famous oiled feather for making things run smoothly. This applies in homes, in churches, in business, in conventions,—in fact, in all places where human beings of varying ability and grace meet together.

The winter gives occasion for many times of meetings of conventions, conferences, Sunday-school unions, and similar gatherings. If for each there should be chosen not only those who arrange the spiritual and intellectual fare, but what might be called the housewife's duties, the looking after the details of the comfort and convenience of those who are to dispense the spiritual blessings, an era of reform would there find its inauguration. It is an old, old trouble, this neglect of minor things on large occasions. Way back in the time of the Exodus Moses had to give directions to "bring in the table, and set in order the things that are to be set in order upon it: to bring in the candlestick and light the lamps thereof," which, being interpreted, means a good, large table for the presiding officer, with a gavel that can make itself heard above the uproar of voices, a good drop light, well shaded from the eyes of both congregation and speaker, a pitcher of water, and a goblet. Flowers are not explicitly mentioned, but they might well come under the "things that are to be set in order upon it." A vase of flowers, not too large, is restful to the eyes as well as pleasant to look upon.

Ezekiel gives minute directions about tables also, several to be on each side arranged according to a given order. One might think this was an arrangement for reporters, so often forgotten even where meetings are to be reported. But the context shows that they were not for the slaughter of good papers into poor abstracts, but for the killing of animals. It was Daniel who had the really bad reporter in mind when he says, "They shall speak lies at one table; but it shall not prosper." But he did not prophesy correctly as to the papers themselves when he adds, "The end shall be at the time appointed." That rarely occurs at any public meeting.

There is yet another table that should not be forgotten in this service for the public good. That is a table supplied with pen, ink, papers, and envelopes, just as the housekeeper sets forth her guest-room for the convenience of guests. In the old days when envelopes were so costly that frugal people always turned those which they received wrong side out, and used them over again, this might have seemed rank extravagance; but it is a trifle in itself, and a thing of great magnitude in its convenience. But that lack is likewise one of long standing. Even Zacharias, in the temple, had to "ask for a writing table" before he could write a note about the naming of his baby, and from his time to this there has been more or less trouble in temples and halls to find a chance to write a necessary letter.

These are such trifles in themselves that it seems as though any well-appointed place for public gatherings would have them, but long experience shows that they must be looked after. The man who has to turn his back to an audience to catch the light on his paper, or who has to read with a kerosene lamp flaring in his face at the imminent risk of knocking it off from the little top-knot of a reading-desk, or, almost worse, one who has to stumble through his paper without sufficient light either before or behind, will welcome the observance of Levitical instructions as to candlesticks and candles translated into gas or electricity.

THE ART OF SKIPPING.

One result obtainable by the constant and systematic use of books is the power to wrest the secret of their value out of much which is accessory and comparatively unimportant to the mind experienced in similar lines of thought. There are many books which must be read leisurely and gratefully for pure enjoyment's sake, or for their power of inspiration; but there are many others that contain, compressed in a few pages, sometimes even in a single sentence, the heart of gold, to which all the rest is introduction or corollary. It is quite possible for some people, too, to read sentences as others read words, following the thought with no painful attention to detail. Anybody who is not just learning to spell can catch the meaning of a long word quite as quickly as a short one. The significance of the word "incomprehensibility," for instance, is imprinted on the mind as readily as a word of four letters, and in the same way a sentence may flash its meaning to the brain with little more delay than does a single word.

A man who can see at a glance whether or not a book has an especial word for him has an immense advantage over one who must read laboriously and conscientiously, fearing to miss the message he is seeking or the argument which the writer has worked out and carefully elaborated. We have known men whose instinct in this respect seemed infallible, to whom the important passage seemed to be a very magnet, drawing the hand to open at the right page, the eye to fall on the right paragraph with no preliminaries of search. This intuition of selection seems marvellous indeed to one who does not possess it; and yet it is not uncommon, and its practical value has been often tested.

It would be a good thing were such faculty of selection more fully developed in other lines also. The art of skipping is no mean accomplishment in this busy world, where there are only seven days in the week and where the common assertion that there are twenty-four hours in a day is continually disproved by actual experience. Many people are trying to do one thing so exclusively as to miss all sense of proportionate values. They seem trying to spell out every word and read every line in the great book of life, and so take things forever in detail, beginning at the paragraph first opened to them. Each trifle absorbs their attention and assumes magnified importance, but they never discover the relation of these trifles to the great world around them nor the significance of experiences not their own. They occupy themselves forever with the little things, never combining their words into sentences that follow the line of some universal thought. The words are necessary, the single sentences are also necessary; but, if we study them only for their own sake, disregarding the great purpose running through them all and binding them coherently together, life is over before we have grasped the idea of what it is all about.

Most of us have to learn the judicious art of skipping by stern experience, and then practise it vigorously. We face the fact that many opportunities must go unheeded, many good books must be left unread. There are many interesting people we have no time to know as we would like, many philanthropic claims asserting themselves which we cannot answer. The conscientious worker who has never learned to say "No," the woman who has acquired the lecture habit, and goes to clubs that other people may do her intellectual work for her; the busy man who lengthens his day at both ends, that he may add a few thousands to his increasing bank account,—all need to study the art of skipping, the secret of taking the important things, and serenely letting the rest go.

To separate wisely the unimportant affairs of life from those that are permanently valuable, this is indeed the art of living, the art which we spend our lives trying to master. Our years are a succession of opportunities offered and choices made. It is worse than useless to murmur because we cannot grasp all the gifts the gods provide, and turn them all to our individual use. If we choose wisely, they grow in value; but the worst of mistakes is that of wasting life in the vain endeavor to grasp all its good, and thus failing to hold even the blessings most rightfully our own.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.

A few weeks ago Mr. George W. Stone, the treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, received the following letter from Rev. F. Hayward, pastor of the Unitarian church at Marlboro, Mass. :—

My dear Sir,—A parishioner of mine, Mr. S. H. Howe, heard you speak last winter at a meeting of the Unitarian Club, and has since followed you in the words you have printed in the Christian Register with great interest and approval. Feeling that such faith and earnestness merit recognition, he desires to respond with the enclosed check for $100, which he would like to have you use as seems best to you for the cause you have at heart.

The gift was prompted by a recent reading of the Register, and of Mr. Horton's admirable paper, Every Other Sunday, and the feeling that it would be an excellent thing to circulate these publications more widely among those who do not or cannot now take them. It is, however, his preference that you should be left unlimited in the application of the money, even if you should think best to add it to the general fund of the American Unitarian Association.

With cordial greetings and good wishes,
Heartily yours,
EDWARD F. HAYWARD.

We call attention, not only to the gift, but to the spirit in which it was given,—that of a business man's generous appreciation of the work of the Association and its treasurer, his conception of the importance of our periodical literature, but his wise desire to have his gift applied where it would really be most needed.

EX-GOVERNOR AMES.

Ex-Gov. Oliver Ames, who passed away at his home at North Easton, Mass., last week, was born Feb. 4, 1831, in North Easton, his parents being Oakes and Eveline Ames. He received his early education in the public schools of his native town and in academies at North Attleboro, Leicester, and Easton. He then entered the shovel-works of his father, where he served an apprenticeship of five years, mastering the business in its most minute mechanical details. He then took a special course at Brown University, and at the age of twenty-two returned to the shovel-works. In 1863 he was admitted a member of the firm of Oliver Ames & Sons, and for several years personally superintended the mechanical business of the immense establishment. At his father's death, in 1873, the numerous financial trusts held by him devolved upon the son; and he became directly concerned in a fiduciary capacity with various corporations, banks, and institutions with which his father held monetary relations. Mr. Ames was elected to the State senate in 1880 and 1881. He was four times elected lieutenant governor, and three times governor of Massachusetts.

Mr. Ames was a Unitarian in religion. His chief characteristics were a genial, cordial disposition, freedom from hatreds or enmities, a quick, ready sympathy, a most democratic feeling and entire absence of aristocratic sympathies, a wonderful approachableness and affability, warm and ardent domestic affections. He was ready to meet all persons on equal terms. He had great financial and executive ability, marked by entire honesty and probity. He was perfectly pure in his social relations, absolutely temperate and interested in helping temperance work. His frankness was so utterly uncalculating as sometimes to become a fault, and exposed him to criticism, that he might have escaped otherwise. He showed a fine taste for music, painting, architecture.

Conference Notes.

The address of the Council was comprehensive and business-like.

The Register this week is large and weighty, but not heavy.

Mr. Savage's words were the Alpha and the Omega of the Conference.

Rev. F. L. Hosmer showed not only the strength of our Congregational polity, but some weaknesses of our application of it which Unitarians may well ponder.

Rev. John Cuckson presented a lofty ideal of the function of worship in a Christian church, and his address met with warm response from many hearers.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale was absent from the Conference, but not absent from its sympathy and love, as the warm resolutions sent to him in his bereavement and anxiety show.

A noble list of distinguished names was on the roll of the Washington church, as may be seen from the address of welcome by Hon. Carroll D. Wright. The historic bell ought to have been tolled for the Wednesday afternoon meeting.

Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., received a warm greeting. It was pleasant to see again his genial face among the hosts of the Conference, yet not quite natural to see him on a furlough from the English Unitarian army instead of being one of the active officers of the American. He brought a greeting from Old England, and gave a welcome address on "The Outlook of Unitarianism in Great Britain."

Metzerott Hall, where the Washington Conference was held, seats fifteen hundred people. An intelligent janitor who was present when Mr. Savage preached there on Monday night was overheard to say the next morning: "I went up in the top box, and took a look at the people. There never was such an audience in the place before. Every seat was taken, and all the standing places were full. It was a perfect sea of fades, and intelligence shone out of every one of 'em."

One of the most impressive scenes of the Conference was that of the Wednesday morning devotional meeting, when Rev. Dr. Furness made the address. To see this grand old apostle, ninety-three years of age, sitting on the platform surrounded by leaders younger in years, but not younger in spirit, and to hear his deep, rich voice through the hall, speaking on his beloved theme, and at last to receive his impressive benediction, was worth going to the Conference for.

That not every one who can keep a hotel is a commercial truism, and not every one can personally conduct with success a large party of travellers. Messrs. Nason & Durbin, who conducted a goodly host of visitors to the National Conference, must therefore be much gratified at the testimony they received from a large proportion of their travellers, complimenting them upon the way in which they had made and handled arrangements for the trip to Washington. Such a spontaneous and genuine expression of satisfaction is not the least pleasant part of a successful business venture.

At the last moment a hasty placard was prepared announcing the opening sermon of the Conference. This was confided to the man-of-all-work, who attached it to the placard board ordinarily used, without tearing off the previous announcement, which chanced to be a foot or two longer than the modest Unitarian sign. Passers-by were therefore informed that Rev. M. J. Savage would preach on

"OUR GOSPEL,"

WITH THE AID OF LUDICROUS COLORED CARTOONS."

Thursday evening, before the meeting was called to order, an envelope was passed to Mr. Batchelor from the audience, addressed to Mr. Morehouse. Mr. Batchelor explained that, at the close of the missionary meeting in the morning, he found two ladies waiting for Mr. Morehouse to write the address of the Association, in order that a check might be drawn. The envelope contained a check from one of them for $5,000, made out to the American Unitarian Association. On asking permission to announce the gift, which was made without conditions, it was replied that the announcement might be made, but that the lady, who was present, did not wish her name to be mentioned. Her previous generosity, however, has made her name familiar to all lovers of our cause.

We do not share Mr. Hosmer's objection to the church with the big "C." It is not nearly so bad to our thought as the word "denominational" with a big "D"; and it is not necessarily any more exclusive. To Congregationalists, whether Baptists, orthodox, or Unitarians, it is simply a collective noun, meaning an association of orthodox, Baptist, or Unitarian churches, as distinct from clubs, guilds, or organizations of a secular character. There is no other collective noun, whether we use the word "body," "denomination," or "fellowship," which is any freer from objection. We see no reason why Unitarian churchmen should surrender that word to Episcopacy or Roman Catholicism. On the contrary, we would spell the words "Unitarian Church" in capital letters.

Unitarian National Conference.

The National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches held its sixteenth regular meeting at Washington, D.C., October 21-24. We present this week the opening sermon, the official reports, some of the essays, and a full record of business. Other essays and addresses will be published next week.

OUR GOSPEL.

SERMON BY REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

"The glorious gospel of the blessed God."—1 TIM. i. 11.

"Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people."—LUKE ii. 10.

A certain section of the Christian Church has for a long period of years assumed to itself the name "evangelical,"—"the bearer of good tidings." These churches have claimed to be in some special sense the keepers of the good news of God. They have their "gospel" services, they publish "gospel hymns," they hold "gospel" meetings of every kind.

Another section has tacitly admitted, or has at least allowed the impression to go abroad, that it is not evangelical, that it does not represent and proclaim to the people the good news of God, that it has only the philosophy and the wisdom of men.

Yet these churches that claim to be, in some peculiar sense, the bringers of the good news of God, do not now place and have not been accustomed to place that which was the peculiar first great message of Jesus in the forefront of their proclamation: "The kingdom of God is at hand," "The kingdom of God is among you." They have placed this kingdom in the next world, where Jesus did not place it. They have built around it a wall which Jesus did not build, and they have set at its gates keepers whom Jesus did not appoint. They have given them passwords, shibboleths, terms of admission of which Jesus has never spoken. For there is only one place in all the gospel story where Jesus, of set purpose, deliberately declares who it is that shall enter into and become partakers of the divine kingdom, when he formally separates between the sheep and the goats, when he assigns to the right hand those who are to inherit the kingdom of the Father. And it is most noteworthy that not a single one of these conditions to which I have alluded does he anywhere speak of. He says nothing about the necessity of accepting a certain scheme of belief. It was not a question as to whether they held certain opinions about God or about himself or about the origin and nature of man. The one only condition which he there establishes,—and we would suppose that he would have felt it incumbent upon himself to set forth the true conditions there, if anywhere,—the one only condition to which he refers is the simple one of character and of human service.

I do not propose to-night to antagonize the beliefs of others any more than is absolutely necessary. I would that I might avoid one single reference which could in any way be construed into antagonism. I shall speak as briefly as may be, by way of definition, for the sake of clearness, and that we may realize our position, and understand the glorious gospel of the blessed God that is committed to our care. For it seems to me that we have so long been accustomed to think of ourselves as critics, as seekers after truth, rather than those that possess it, as only trying to find our way, those who are on the road and should lead the way, that we do not half understand how magnificent is the message which is committed to our keeping, and for the deliverance of which to the modern world we ought to hold ourselves responsible.

I shall, then, discuss for a little a few of the great essentials of the creeds, as they have been held in the Christian churches of the past. My purpose will not be to discuss whether they are true or false, and I wish you to bear that point in mind. That is too large a theme to enter upon in a popular discourse like this. I propose to ask, rather, whether these great beliefs, as they have been held and are held and proclaimed to-day by the so-called evangelical churches, even if true, are entitled to the name of "gospel,"—"good news"; whether the claim is valid that these old churches do peculiarly represent the gospel of Jesus, or whether it is to us, perhaps unknowing, that has been committed this precious charge.

Let me pause long enough for one preliminary word. If there are any here to-night who sincerely and devoutly cling still to the old faith, I beg they will give me credit for the same sincerity which I freely concede to them; and I beg that they will not think I am animated by any spirit of denominational discourtesy, but that I simply seek with all my soul, as I trust do they, to find, to stand for, and proclaim the truth of God.

Let us, then, note, first, the old doctrine of revelation. It is conceded on all hands, I suppose, if God exist, and if he loves his children, that he would not leave us without sufficient light and guidance to enable us to find the pathway in which he would have us tread. We might, then, naturally expect a revelation to be given to his children at some time and in some form. What is the claim in regard to this revelation as set forth in the old creed? I will try briefly to declare it.

During a period of four thousand years, according to the traditional estimate, God, by means of angelic messengers, through prophets, through inspired writers, delivered portions of his truth to a little people inhabiting a country about as large as the State of Massachusetts. The rest of the world was left to wander and stumble in darkness, finding its way as it might, according to the utterly inadequate light of natural reason, this natural reason perverted so that it had no power to discern the truth of God. At the end of this four thousand years a wider, newer revelation is given. Christianity becomes the dominant power of the so-called civilized world. Yet, after Christianity has been in existence for nearly two thousand years, this revelation is made known to hardly more than one-third of the inhabitants of the earth. The rest still wander and stumble in darkness. Then this revelation has been couched in such terms and delivered in such a way that thousands and thousands of the best scholars and the noblest men of the modern world do not see their way to accepting it as a divine revelation. Beginning in barbarism, with barbaric conceptions of God and men, the Bible rises as civilization rises, ever growing up toward a fairer and a nobler ideal. So these critics, to whom I have referred, are compelled to feel that the revelation bears everywhere the marks of human origin, human limitations and defects.

Then we must remember that, according to the revelation that has been made to the modern world, the human race was in existence at least a hundred thousand—probably two hundred thousand—years before the dream of Adam or of Eden ever entered the human mind. Here, then, are all these countless prehistoric millions on millions of men and women who never had even one single ray of divine revelation vouchsafed to them. I submit to you, men and women accustomed to think and to feel and to aspire, that, if this be true, it is not good news. It cannot, in any proper use of human language, be proclaimed as a gospel. It is not what we should expect to be the method of the loving and impartial Father who cares equally for all his children. The popular doctrine, then, as to revelation is not good news. Even if true, it is not entitled to be called a gospel.

Let us turn now to consider the character of God as set forth in the old creeds. I can only touch upon this briefly.

God, we are told, is infinite, a Being of all power, all wisdom, and all love; and yet this Being, who is all power and able to save all men, has vouchsafed his light and the message of his salvation to only the smallest part of his creatures. We are told that he is good; and yet for thousands of years he has been proclaimed as the embodiment of the principle that "might makes right." Paul, for example, says: "Who art thou that repliest against God? Has not the potter power over his clay to make one vessel to honor and another to dishonor?" Yes, we freely concede that the potter has power over his clay, because it is clay, and because it cannot possibly concern the clay whether it be made into one kind of vessel or another. But, if the vessels could feel, if they were capable of infinite pain, would the potter then have power over this clay to do with it merely as he pleased? Can we accept, then, this conception of God as a Being of infinite love, one who does what he will with his creatures, choosing one here and another there to be saved as monuments of his infinite mercy, and passing by the great majority of mankind in all ages, leaving them to suffer eternal pain as monuments of his so-called justice and his wrath? We submit that the infinite God, who has created the universe and all the creatures that live and breathe, is under a responsibility at least equal to his power,—a responsibility to his own character of justice and of love. And we submit that even Infinite Power has no right to do that which is wrong.

If God, then, be the one who has been pictured in the creeds, who makes human souls for happiness or torture merely as it pleases him, then we are compelled to say that, measured by any human standard of right or wrong, he is not Infinite Goodness, though he may be Infinite Power.

You remember that dreary, terrible poem of Tennyson's called "Despair," in which he refers to this conception of God:—

"I should call on that Infinite Love that has served us so well?

Infinite Cruelty, rather, that made everlasting hell,—

Made us, foreknew us, foredoomed us, and does what he will with his own!

Better our dead, brute mother, who never has heard us groan!"

This is the way the tender-hearted, magnificent poet expresses his indignation against that conception of an Infinite Power who rules the world according to his own whim and caprice. Read the poem for its terrible indictment of the old-time creed.

If there be this kind of God in the universe, we will bow our heads perforce, because we must; but we will not stultify our own sense of that which is tender and human and true and loving by calling him good. And, if I believed that there were such a God, I would not bend in worship at the foot of his throne. I would rather stand erect and bear the lightning of his wrath. If there be such a God, the proclamation of that fact certainly is not good news. It would be the saddest news that was ever brought to this poor, sin-stricken, discouraged, troubled, yet so far hopeful world.

Let me turn and consider the doctrine of man as held by the old creeds,—man created perfect six thousand years ago, so perfect that old Dr. South, in the time of Charles II., declared Socrates and Plato to be only broken remnants of an Adam. Yet at the first temptation he fell. This might not be so strange or so contradictory of the grace of God; but this first man was so constituted that in him all the unborn millions of the world fell, too. When children come into the world, in their helplessness and sweet infancy, they are under the anger of the Infinite One. They are born in such a way that they have no power to discern the right or to choose it when discerned. They must wait helpless until moved upon by the Infinite Pity, if so be that the Infinite Pity is for them. And so these countless millions of men, drifting, floating upon the tide of being, are hurried by the relentless years until they plunge moment by moment over the Niagara of Death, into the seething waters of torment below.

When I was a boy and attended the monthly missionary concerts, I used to be told—and that was the great motive for doing all that we could for missions—that the heathen by the thousand every moment, at every tick of the clock, were being plunged over into the abyss of everlasting woe. Is this the kind of humanity which the loving, wise Father has created? If so, we will accept it. We will bend our heads to the inevitable fact; but we will not contradict truth and goodness by proclaiming this message as a gospel of good news to the world. It is most assuredly not glad tidings of great joy to be proclaimed to all people.

Next we will consider the doctrine of the incarnation as bearing on this condition of things. I shall not deal with the subject of the character of Jesus so much as with the dogma of the incarnation as a part of the scheme of salvation, and note the logical outcome of it. For four thousand years God was presumably doing all that he could to save mankind. He sent prophets, angels, messengers: he inspired men to write and record his will. And, as the result, at the end of four thousand years there was one small people a part of whom were trying to be obedient. But the majority, even of them, were still astray concerning the truth of God and their relations to him. They were obdurate, stiff-necked, disobedient. At the end of this time God himself comes down to the earth. He takes upon himself our human form, becomes a man, lives, suffers, teaches for thirty years, and dies an ignominious death. Then he ascends on high to sit on the throne of the universe. He organizes his Church, and sends out his infinite Spirit to inform and inspire this Church, and lead it in its missionary operations for the salvation of the world. And, presumably, for the last nineteen hundred years he has been doing all that he can to save mankind; and yet to-day what is the result? The outcome of this stupendous miracle of revelation and incarnation is that hardly one-third of the world has ever heard of him. The majority of that third does not believe. Thousands do not care; and even in the churches themselves they tell us that there are large numbers of those who profess to accept this scheme who are not hopefully saved. I submit to you that, if this be true, it is the most stupendous and lamentable failure in the history of mankind. It is certainly not a gospel to be proclaimed as the good news of the blessed God.

A word now upon human destiny. This has been implied all along in what I have already said. The destiny of the great majority of the human race, after everything that God has devised and has been trying to do for it, is something so terrible as to be utterly inconceivable by the imagination of man. Not only we who dare to hold what we believe to be a brighter, more cheery faith, but those who have held the old ideas, have been pressed upon by the difficulties of it until they have bowed their heads and been unable to speak. Dr. Albert Barnes of Philadelphia, in his time one of the ablest leaders of the Presbyterian Church, has left his thoughts in this respect on record. I quote only his thought, not being able from memory to repeat the words. He says: Friends tell me that they have been able to find light on this problem. I have listened to their explanations, and have tried to understand them; but, when I look over the world and see millions on millions of men utterly careless, indifferent, and going down to everlasting death, and, when I remember that only God can save them and he does not, I am struck dumb. "It is all dark, dark, dark, to my soul; and I cannot disguise it." Albert Barnes, then, were he here, would join with me in saying that, even though he were compelled to accept it as true, he could not proclaim it as good news, as part of the good tidings of the blessed God.

I am aware that there are large numbers of men in all the churches who will say that they do not believe this doctrine; that they do not hold any longer these horrible conceptions of God and man and destiny. I am aware that there are exceptional men, occupying exceptional positions, who proclaim to their intimate friends their rejection of their ideas. But so long as they are published broadcast over the civilized world in all the great creeds of the great churches; so long as the Episcopal Church, for example, through its House of Bishops, has declared to all its communicants that "fixity of interpretation is of the essence of the creeds," and that they are to hold in all their old meaning unchanged forever; so long as no young man proposing to enter the ministry would be deemed fitted for a pulpit while rejecting any of these doctrines; so long as the American Board, which is the missionary organization of the freest of all the orthodox churches, refuses to send a missionary to the heathen because he dares to hope—he does not express it as a positive belief—that the heathen who have never heard of Christ in this world may possibly have an opportunity in the next; so long as all these doctrines are in the basis on which is organized the so-called Evangelical Alliance,—so long we have a right to say these are the general beliefs of the old churches. If they are, then certainly the old churches not only have no monopoly of the gospel of Jesus, but I submit that they do not preach his gospel at all. That which they preach, misnamed the gospel, is made up of bad science, of false philosophy, of tradition, of barbaric conceptions, of superstitions,—a scheme about Jesus instead of the gospel of Jesus. It seems to me that it is time for us to claim and to make proclamation to the world that we preach the gospel of the blessed God, that we proclaim to the world the good news of Jesus.

I ask you now to turn to the more grateful contemplation of some of the positive aspects of our glorious gospel.

What is our doctrine of revelation? We do not reject the blessed insights, truths, and revealings contained in this magnificent book called the Bible: only we hold that "the word of God is not bound" in covers, not bound in any book exclusively. We hold to the truth that has come through the lips of Confucius. We believe that a part of the divine revelation was vouchsafed to Sakya-Muni; that Zoroaster gave some part of the message of the Infinite to his people in Persia; that from the beginning of the world God has been revealing himself to his children who have been listening and catching some sentences of his blessed truth. We believe that in every nation, under every sky, in every age of the world, God's revelation has come as fast and as far as men have been able to receive it. We believe that there never has been more than one religion in the world, in the profoundest sense of that term. All men everywhere have been "feeling after God, if haply they might find him who is not far from every one of us." We do not believe that God has left any of his children to wander and stumble in darkness. All truth that has ever come to the world is, as far as it goes, a revelation of the divine. When the astronomer studies the heavens to find out the true system of the stars, he is entitled to say, with Kepler, "O God, I think over again thy thoughts after thee!" When history is accurately written, it is an unfolding of the method of God in his dealing with the origin, the growth, the decay, or the prosperity of nations. When we are studying the development of the moral nature, the growth of conscience, we are reading the revelation of God's law of righteousness written on the hearts and recorded in the lives of his children. When we catch glimpses, intimations, ideals, of those things that are finer and better than have ever yet been incarnated in the life of the race, we are anticipating that which is to be written on those new leaves of God's book, to be clearly read when they shall be turned, in his ever-progressive, always advancing, and never completed Bible.

All truth is from God, as all light is from the sun. Gas-light, electric-light, the light of the wood fire or of the coal in your grate, the gleam of the diamond,—all is sunlight, no matter through what medium it may come or in what country it may be seen. So all truth is God's truth, whether it come by the lips of a speaker in China or in the islands of the sea, whether it be called pagan or Christian. All truth that bears on the culture of the human soul, the development of human life, is part of the unfolding revelation of the divine. So we believe that God has never left any of his children without some rays of light, and the word of God anywhere is the truth of God. It is infallible, in so far as it is demonstrated to be true.

Is not this entitled to be called good news? We do not believe that God has pets and favorites, that the heavenly Father has vouchsafed only to us some rays of guidance, but that all men everywhere, from the far-off beginning until to-day, have been equally favored according to their ability to accept God's truth. God comes as fast as the world is able to receive him. He always stands at the door and knocks, not only here, but in India, in China, and all over the world. He comes to the mind as truth, into the heart as love, and into the character as righteousness. Millions of those whom we carelessly call pagan have reverently read some divine message written by the finger of God, and have been able to open wide the doors of their nature for the coming in of the divine.

What is our doctrine of God? We believe that he is not only Infinite Power, but Infinite Love; that he loves every child that he has created, and that he holds them close to his own infinite heart. We do not believe that there ever has been any gulf between God and his children that needed to be supernaturally bridged. We believe that he is nearer to us than our pulse-beat, nearer than the thoughts we think, nearer than the most secret feelings of our hearts. God is all power not only, but all love. As we look down the ages, hundreds of thousands of years, and see the first man beginning to lift his eyes toward heaven, we believe that God is by his side leading and helping him there. When he stumbles in his life or stammers in his speech, God holds him to his heart, and guards him as his child with unspeakable tenderness and care. Is it not good news to the world to believe that God is the Father of every child that has ever been created, has never for a moment forgotten his love, but that he is ever leading and lifting every one in his struggle toward the higher and the better life?

Let us note next our doctrine concerning the nature and origin of man. We do not start with a perfect man in the Garden of Eden six thousand years ago. We do not go up the pathway of history, which implies that the progress of man has been a descent. We go back and down the ages; and the Garden of Eden that we discover is a jungle, and the man Adam, the first of his race, instead of being a perfect and magnificent creature, we see close on the borders of the animal world. We discern him hardly distinguishable from the animal, having just climbed upon his new-found feet, having newly discovered his hands, having just turned his meaningless cry into a voice, just beginning to look about and above him with that infinite question in his eyes which has been the root, the mainspring, the motive force, of all human advance from that day to this. We discover no fall. We believe it to be scientifically settled—that is, established by the scientific revelation of God's truth—that there never has been any fall of man. Rather do we place, as the corner-stone of the theology of the future, the ascent of man! From that far-off age, ignorant, animal, climbing by a pathway watered by tears, stained by blood, stumbling, falling, rising again, making endless mistakes, but striving with infinite patience to correct those mistakes,—we believe, I say, in man's ascent up the ages. In those far-off, prehistoric times, man, as the result of self-sacrifice as noble as our own, laid the foundations of the world as it exists to-day. These men climbed on and up until we see such heights as those represented by the names of Homer, of Socrates, of Aristotle, of Plato, of Virgil, of Dante, of Goethe, of Shakspeare, such heights of spiritual attainment as Confucius, as Zoroaster, as Sakya-Muni, and, above them all, the magnificent figure of the meek and lowly Jesus, in whose presence we bow, Son of God and supreme product of humanity.

Man, then, has climbed until he has shown us such names, such characters, such achievements, such manifestations of all that is high in human nature, so that we are able to exclaim, "Now are we sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be!" For we believe that, as we go on to gain finer and finer and fairer and grander visions of the divine, this poor human race of ours is to be transformed and glorified. Man, then, has been progressively climbing up out of the animal into heart, into brain, into conscience, into soul. In thousands and thousands of cases in every land there have been men who have stood masters of themselves, masters of their conditions, looking lovingly in the face of the sweet heavens, conscious that they were children of the Highest.

This is our doctrine of the origin, nature, and progress of man. Is not this entitled to be called good news,—the gospel of the blessed God? Is it not full of inspiration? Is there not that in it which should kindle our enthusiasm? Should we not be fired by a message like this, not content until we have proclaimed it in every nation, every city, every hamlet, every home in all the world?

And what is our doctrine concerning Jesus and the incarnation? I say to you frankly that I speak for myself, but I think I speak for Unitarianism as well, when I say that we believe Jesus was man, born as we are; that he died as we die,—a man. I do not say a "mere man"; for I am not able to measure the depth, the height, the magnificence, of even "mere" manhood. I do not say a man "like us"; for Shakspeare was not a man like us, Dante was not a man like us, Socrates was not a man like us. He was at least differentiated from each of us of this generation by the magnificence of his genius, by the greatness of his natural endowments, by the power which he was able to wield over his time and over the world. I believe that Jesus was a man, and this is not to degrade Jesus: it is to lift humanity. They who tell us that they cannot comprehend Jesus unless they think of him as something more than human generally begin their argument by assuming a very low type of humanity, and then no wonder they are not able to include Jesus under that category. Rather do we look upon Jesus and see in him that which is possible in us all. As I read in the opening of the gospel the story of the birth, the childhood, and the life of Jesus, I cannot reconcile this reading with anything else than the humanity of the Nazarene. If his brothers knew that he was God, supernaturally born, how is it possible that they should not have believed on him? If his mother knew that she held in her arms the Almighty God of the universe, could she have wondered as he developed a precocious boyhood and an unusual knowledge? Could she have been timid about leaving him alone over night with his friends on the visit to the temple when he was twelve years of age? I cannot read the records, and believe that Mary herself understood anything other than that he was a lovable and wonderful child, as so many mothers have felt since.

Then, as I study the records of his heroism and of his death, I love to believe that he who expired on the cross that Friday afternoon was a man. If he was the Almighty God of the universe, would he have shrunk at facing that for the express purpose of accomplishing which he came into the world? It seems to me that that scene on the cross is theatrical, if he was God. But, if he was man,—if a man hangs there, and with his last breath prays for the forgiveness of his murderers; if a man hangs there, and, as he swoons in that last dreadful hour, there sweeps over him the chilling breath of a doubt as to his own mission, so that he exclaims in his weakness and agony, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" if, even then, with his hand growing numb in death, he still clings to the hand of the infinite Father in a faith that is mightier than death, dying thus for his faith, dying thus because he will be faithful to his message, dying thus that he may draw all other faithful souls after him to himself,—then can I bow in awe, in love, in reverence, glad that there is a son of God, my brother, a man like this, who indeed can be my elder brother, my friend, my inspirer in all coming time!

We believe, then, not in an incarnation that confines itself to one historic character. I believe, rather, that God is progressively incarnating himself in the human race; that in the very first man that ever lifted his eyes to heaven God was present, working through, informing, and lifting him. So, in all that is beautiful, all that is true, all that is tender, all that is high and fine in the human race, from that day to this, has been so much of the presence and gracious power of God.

As the years go by, God is more and more to become incarnate in the human race. The significant and central thought, to my mind, in the character and life of Jesus is his consciousness of oneness with the Father,—the same kind of oneness which he tells us he expects us to develop. As he is one with the Father, he wishes us to be one with the Father and with him. If he be not man, if being divine be different from the divinest humanity, then he cannot be my exemplar, and I cannot attempt to copy him. Dr. Lyman Abbott of Plymouth Church, the editor of the Outlook, said, in an article in the Forum three or four years ago, that he did not believe there was any difference in kind between God and Jesus and man. He believed that man was God minus infinity, and God was man plus infinity. Our conception of Jesus is that he is divine as man may be divine. Did you ever stop to think of it? If the Almighty God were determined to put all possible of the divine into the life of a single man, he could put in no more than the man could hold. That is, he could not possibly be anything more than a perfect man. Perfect man is that which Jesus has pointed out as the ideal for all of us to seek to attain. "Be ye therefore perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect."

And now I come to speak of one more point,—our gospel as to the destiny of the race. I do not believe that death came into this world as the result of the invasion of evil from without. I do not believe that death is the result of human sin or a token of divine anger. I believe that it is as natural as birth, that it is a part of the universal and eternal order of God. I believe that all men, as they pass through this experience which we call death, are five minutes after that experience precisely what they were five minutes before. I do not believe that there is anything in this experience that determines destiny or limits probation. Everywhere men are under the universal law of cause and effect, and under that law are creating their own character, their own heavens, their own hells.

What is our doctrine of salvation? We do not believe that the acceptance of any formal creed necessarily changes character. We do not believe that the partaking of any sacrament necessarily changes character. We do not believe that placing water or oil on the forehead necessarily changes the soul within. We believe not even that character is the condition of salvation. We go deeper than that, and assert that character is salvation, in this world or any other world; that there is no salvation beyond the limits of character. We have learned enough to consider as utterly shallow and antiquated the old idea that place determines hell or heaven. I used to imagine when I was a boy, and I used to dream over it as a part of that dreadful closing scene that filled my imagination, that, if I could only get through the gate before it was closed for the last time, I should be in heaven as really as Peter or John or any of the saints who were haloed with the glory of the past. But we know enough of this world and of human character to-day to take a deeper view than that. There are men and women whose houses are the receptacle of everything that money can buy, filled with art, with books, with musical instruments. They have at their disposal servants to come and go at their will, and yet they may be burdened with life-long sorrow and pain. And there are men living in rude hovels, in cabins, scattered over the land, with little money, living from hand to mouth, without books or music or pictures, lacking almost everything which men in civilized lands are supposed to care for, who have a song of joy and peace in their souls. We know, then, that salvation does not depend on where we are: it depends upon what we are. Gen. Grant used to say, during the last years of his life, that he had learned to recognize two tunes. He knew "Old Hundred," and he had heard "Hail to the Chief" played so often at his approach that he came to recognize that. Would the way to make Gen. Grant happy have been to take him to a symphony concert? Would you take a blind man to the top of a hill overlooking a river, and including a wide range of landscape, that he might enjoy the view? Would you take a man with no taste for books or reading to a library, and expect him to find it Paradise? We know, then, that, if men are to be happy, there must be adjustment between their tastes, their feelings, their desires, and their surroundings. Their happiness resides only in this adjustment. If a man is perfectly attuned physically, mentally, morally and spiritually to the universe, then the universe, with its million fingers, plays upon him; and the result is the music of happiness. If, then, you wish to be happy in the spiritual world, is there any other way than by cultivating the spiritual faculties, the spiritual tastes and feelings, so that you may be at home there? We cannot escape ourselves in this or in any other world. We have come at last to recognize the profound truth of those two lines from Omar Khayyám,—

"Heaven but the vision of fulfilled desire,
And hell the shadow of a soul on fire."

James Russell Lowell has put the secret in three lines,—

"Thou seest no beauty save thou make it first:

Man, woman, nature, each is but a glass
Where the soul sees the image of herself."

Let us remember, then, that in this world the result of every thought, every feeling, every wish, every purpose, every action, inevitably treads upon the heels of every thought, feeling, purpose, action; that day by day and hour by hour we are creating character under the changeless laws of God,—the laws of cause and effect. Let us also remember that neither in this world nor in any other shall we ever be able to get into any more of heaven than we first get into ourselves. We do not preach universal salvation in the sense that universal and perfect happiness comes the moment after death. We teach that in this world and in any other world men reap what they sow, that they cannot escape the results of transgressing the laws of God, that they find peace only as they discover and obey the eternal laws of the Divine.

Do you remember the old Eastern apologue that puts this truth with such force and vividness? A soul, recently freed from the body, is treading the unaccustomed pathways of the other world; and he hears behind footsteps as of one that pursues. He turns and sees a hideous shape upon his track, and, trembling with fear, cries out, "What art thou?" And the answer comes, "I am thine own actions: night and day I follow thee."

Here, then, are hints of our doctrine concerning salvation, concerning the destiny of man. Only we believe that, as God has almighty power and is almighty wisdom and almighty love, that somewhere and somewhere he will bring all souls unto himself. We believe that he will scourge his children, if need be, until they are whipped out of their sins, out of their wrong, and brought to recognize the inevitable and eternal conditions of good.

Is it not the good news of the blessed God that all men everywhere are his children, that he folds them all within his arms, that he follows them with pain in which is love, if they go astray, that he follows them with peace and happiness, if they find and obey his laws, but that no one can finally escape him? Each man may say in the words of Whittier:—

"No harm from Him can come to me
On ocean or on shore.

"I know not where his islands lift
Their fringed palms in air:
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond his love and care."

Here, then, are hints of the glorious gospel of the blessed God committed to our care. We, then, are entitled to say, to cry aloud: Good news! God has never left any of his children without a ray of guidance! Good news! There is no gulf between God and his children that needs to be supernaturally bridged! Good news! The world is not lost: God is forever guiding it and holding it, whether it is conscious of that guidance or not! Good news! Sin is only a means by which we climb into higher knowledge and development of soul and character! Good news! Pain and anguish and death are not our enemies or the enemies of God, but only ministers by which he trains and leads us into something better and higher than we have yet been able yet to attain! Good news! God is love, God is life, God is wisdom! God is caring for the world, and forever lifting it to himself! Good news!

"God's in his heaven, All's right with the world!"

O friends and fellow-religionists, if we may rationally believe in a doctrine of revelation, of God, of man, of Jesus, of destiny, so universal, so magnificent as this, ought we not to feel the finger of God touching each of us upon the forehead as with a chrism of divine consecration? Let us then pledge ourselves to God and to each other, so long as men are wandering in darkness, wandering in fear, misconceiving God, misconceiving themselves, and so falling and dying on every hand, that there shall come to us no rest until we have proclaimed this gospel of the blessed God in every home from the North to the South, from the East to the West, in all our land!

ADDRESS OF THE COUNCIL.

BY REV. GEORGE BATCHELOR, CHAIRMAN.*

The principal object of this address must be to present such facts as shall serve to bring into view the nature of our being, the purpose of our action, and the contents of our message to the little Unitarian world in which we live and to the greater world of which we are a component part.

1. ORGANIZATION.

The first fact which confronts us is a demand for more and better organization. The ears of this Conference are always open to that cry. For out of such a demand made thirty years ago this Conference came. Since that event the following things have happened:—

One hundred and fifty churches have been organized.

All the local conferences have been formed, excepting the Maine, New Hampshire, and Western.

The Ministers' Institute was created by act of your Council.

The Women's Alliance has come into existence, and become a national organization.

Unitarian clubs have sprung up, and have revealed a new possibility in the organization of men.

Unity Clubs, religious guilds, and Lend a Hand Clubs have been multiplied throughout the land.

The Sunday-school societies, East and West, have enlarged their work and greatly improved the quality of their publications.

The Ladies' Commission on Sunday-school Books has sifted literature for our children with signal success.

The Unitarian Association, which thirty years ago was a private corporation, has become a national representative organization.

Young men and women to-day are often impatient because our organization shows defects of many kinds; but they who can recall the life of a generation thank God for the progress we have made. We have better organization than ever before; but we see, as never before, that all these minor devices—clubs, guilds, conferences, the churches themselves—are but the incidental forms of an organized life which they may contain, but which by aid of machinery alone they can never produce.

2. THE CHURCH.

During these thirty years great things have been going on in the world of the spirit. The minds of men and women among us have been turned toward new problems of moment in the history of religious thought. There has been advance and retreat, the clash of ideas, the din of spiritual armor resisting the blows of intellectual weapons, the turmoil and tension of a life of struggle, out of which has come for us the one thing for which all these forms of organization exist. At Saratoga, last September, the complex forces in our body, which had been holding each other in tension in so many ways, passed through antagonism into a new and higher form of sympathy. At last, after a hundred years of labor and travail, our Unitarian Church was born into consciousness of itself as a unit,—humane in origin, divine in purpose, indivisible in destiny, self-consecrated to the service of the world. That dramatic climax was the fitting conclusion of a hundred years of Unitarian history in America. The natural consequence of that event has been a deepening consciousness of the value of the church as the organ of the spiritual life. From men and women of the most diverse beliefs there comes the expression of a new confidence in the church, and the desire to make it, under the law of perfect liberty, an institution which shall satisfy the intellect, sustain the conscience, implant the noblest sentiments, and give them perfect forms of expression in the common life of man. The true church must have its beliefs, its worship, its natural sacraments, and its practical work. We have made much of truth-seeking and truth-telling. These functions we must honor and magnify. But the conviction is growing that we can make much more than we have of forms which will give free expression to the sense of fellowship, which shall mark not only birth, marriage, and death with special sanctions, but also recognize and assist the successive births of the spirit. The human soul has certain permanent spiritual needs. The church which attends to these needs will prosper, although it may carry a load of superstition, bigotry, and unreason. The church which neglects the permanent needs of humanity will falter, although it may rejoice in its intellectual emancipation. It is our business henceforth to invite our churches to better forms of worship, by furnishing them, under the perfect law of liberty, with prayers, hymns, psalms, and forms of musical expression which will convey the best life of the ages into the hearts and minds of the people.

*The chairman of the Council being also secretary of the American Unitarian Association, this address, presented with the advice and consent of the Council, is also accepted and adopted by the Association as made in its behalf; and no other report will be offered.

3. THE CULTURE OF THE YOUNG.

The allies of the church in this work are the Sunday-schools, guilds, Unity Clubs, and Lend a Hand Clubs. Like all the other agencies of the church, they have the twofold object: to make the intellectual culture of the young increase their moral and spiritual power, and to give them work to do. This evening, under the chairmanship of Mr. Horton, there will be a meeting to consider the work carried on by these societies, with the conviction that the spiritual welfare of the young lies at the very heart of our denominational life. We are assured by workers in these various societies that they have a new desire to make them tend to the one common end; namely, to bring the young of every congregation into loving relations with the Sunday-school and the church. With this end in view a movement toward consolidation will be discussed this afternoon. Your Council and the directors of the Unitarian Association stand ready to assist all movements for the ethical culture and spiritual inspiration of our young people.

4. MISSIONARY WORK.

The foreign missions carried on by the Unitarian Association have always been, in contrast with the great operations of other churches, like a fine and almost invisible wire compared with the largest trans-oceanic cable. But along that little wire have travelled electric impulses of human sympathy. To some of us it is a satisfaction to know that in Hungary Channing and Parker are quoted as ideal patriots, and that an American Unitarian is always certain of a cordial welcome, because the service we have rendered there testifies that we are the friends of humanity. In Japan our modest mission is but an atom compared with the bulk of other missionary institutions; and yet some of us take pride in the fact that everywhere in Japan America is regarded as her truest friend, and Unitarians as typical representatives of the American idea. The effect upon the national life and progress of Japan of our Unitarian message, some of the most influential Japanese themselves being witnesses, is vastly out of proportion to our missionary equipment.

Our domestic missions come nearer to the knowledge and sympathy of our people. We have now five missionary superintendents. No one but a director of the Unitarian Association of long experience can know what an improvement has been wrought in our missionary methods. Thirty years ago our frontiers were infested with religious adventurers. Men of brilliant parts and damaged reputations fled to the outposts of civilization, where they often had a meteoric and brief career, leaving behind the disheartening memory of a moral catastrophe. Now the pulpits of all our missionary churches, and of all other churches that are willing, are supplied directly by our five superintendents, each in his own department. Now and then a black sheep from another flock breaks into the fold. But it will soon be certain that the churches shall be served only by men of good repute and tried ability. An onward movement is now inevitable. It is called for by the spirit of the people, by the needs of new communities, by the increasing number of men and women willing to work, but unable of themselves to found institutions which will be self-supporting.

Connecticut has become hospitable to our thought. We must have more churches there soon. The Middle States are prepared for many new churches. A few we must establish. At the South, Atlanta is, we hope, prepared for the immediate building up of a strong and influential Unitarian church. In the Middle West the ministry of reconciliation is in order. After that a new wave of progress. Ohio is good ground, and must be tilled. On the Pacific Coast new hopes spring up after a period of financial disaster. In all these departments the ministry at large is demanded. By preaching, by holding conventions, by the spread of Unitarian literature, by a wide diffusion of the ideas for which we stand, our constituency should be greatly enlarged without immediate reference to the founding of churches. But, to carry out this large purpose, it is also necessary to have influential churches as object lessons and centres of influence. The Unitarian Association is prepared to undertake these tasks with enthusiasm and energy. By the appointment of Mr. George W. Stone as treasurer, to give all his time to the financial interests of the Association, the churches have expressed in the most emphatic way possible their hope and desire to make our resources adequate to the demands made upon us. $150,000 for the current year will serve only to carry on the work which our constituents require of us, and which they often blame us for not doing. Seventeen years ago Dr. Henry W. Bellows, then chairman of the Council, said of the Unitarian Association: "It is its office to receive the fault-finding of the denomination. But the Council thinks all the criticisms it suffers are nine parts misapprehension, and the other part due to what is inherent in the case, and can only be mended by larger contribution in the churches."

In all our missionary work the women of the Alliance are heartily engaged. They give sympathy, money, and, what is of much greater value, personal service. They have raised for philanthropic work and the uses of the local parishes in which Alliances have been formed about $16,500; for the general cause, about $24,000 in all $40,500.

The ancient church at Plymouth made its appeal to the Conference last year, a committee was appointed, and has raised $2,500, making in all $36,500, and they now ask for $18,000 more. Is there not some one, or are there not several men and women, of means, who will not give money for our missionary purposes, but who would give to the First Church of Plymouth enough to enable the custodians of a rich historical inheritance to erect a suitable memorial?

5. THE MINISTRY.

We have three sources of supply,—the unsectarian Divinity School of Harvard University, the Unitarian Theological School at Meadville, and the ministry of other denominations. One of the inconvenient results of our progress is that the change in other churches takes effect with the ministry before it does with the laity. The result is an increasing demand for admission to our ministry and work under our auspices. Under these circumstances we say to the faculties of our schools that the needs of the Unitarian Church now require not many graduates so much as graduates of a high order. Let the sifting process which will surely be applied after graduation in the work of the churches be applied to the successive classes in the schools, so that no man shall come to Commencement Day who is merely a student, with no qualities of manhood which will fit him for vigorous service in these stirring times of change and progress. Some of our best men have come to us from other churches. Some, also, have come who are not capable of good service in any church. Some ask for our certificate of fellowship because it has value as a guarantee of social standing. Let the Fellowship Committee encourage no man to enter our ministry merely because he is of blameless character.

6. LITERATURE.

All literature is divided into two parts,—literature and denominational literature. It has been the good fortune of our Church to produce men and women who could contribute to the literature of the world. It has been our good fortune, also, to stand so near the common life of man that all humane literature has served our purpose. It has been our aim and is still our desire to produce denominational literature which may serve our immediate purpose for special reasons, but which shall be of such a quality as to escape denominational uses and become the common property of the world. Periodical literature is now the medium of communication between the best thinkers and the best readers. We have now such periodicals as the Unitarian, the Pacific Unitarian, the Southern Unitarian, the Christian Register, and the New World. The New World, sustained in part by the American Unitarian Association at first, now takes its place among the influential unsectarian organs of thought, known and respected throughout the world. While it is non-denominational, it needs further endowment, and asks for $20,000, which it cannot hope to collect from any Church but ours. The Christian Register needs a guarantee of $2,000 or $3,000 a year,—a need which would vanish, however, if every member of this Conference would send in five new subscribers. The Unitarian Association hopes soon to increase its store of publications which may be sent in answer to questions which come every week from remote parts of the country and the world.

7. RELIGIOUS UNITY.

A new sense of the need of unity pervades the religious life of the world. Among the many indications which might be cited are the Lambeth Proposals, the Grindelwald Conferences, the letter of Leo XIII. inviting the Protestant world to return to the Roman Church. Less notable, but nearer to us, are the Liberal Congress at Chicago in May, the one at Toronto in July, and numerous meetings of ministers of different denominations, such as those at Ayer and on Cape Cod, Mass. With the purpose of these meetings your representatives are most heartily in sympathy. But they hold that, to succeed, all such plans must look toward a voluntary co-operation of churches and individuals who are prepared for union. There can be no union under compulsion. There is no value in a union of the disintegrated remains of institutions that have been broken up for that purpose. The law of evolution in nature is that the highest forms of life express themselves in the most refined and beautiful variety. For four thousand years denominations—that is, groups of men and women drawn together by some common purpose and important enough to be denominated—have been the forms through which the advancing religious life of the world has expressed itself. Where there are no religious denominations there is no religious life. That they are numerous and active in any country is the token of a high stage of religious evolution. The true method of union is to go forward into sympathy and co-operation. The true type is a happy social union like that in which many families cordially unite for common purposes.

When the oldest men and women here present were young, evolution had not been mentioned; but the air was filled with the hope of progress. It was expected to be swift, direct, conclusive. With Tennyson the youth of that generation were looking forward to the time

"Till the war-drum throbbed no longer, and the battle-flags were furled
In the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world."

The war-drums are not yet silent; the Parliament of man has not yet been convened; the Federation of the world has not been accomplished. We assemble now with a more chastened hope, but with a more enlightened confidence. We accept the disappointments of the past as interpretations of the law of progress. But with Tennyson, sixty years later, we say:—

"Forward, then, but still remember how the course of Time will swerve, Crook and turn upon itself in many a backward streaming curve."

We have to report an increasing friendliness in other churches and a steadily enlarging fellowship. During the year your chairman has carried messages of good-will to the Quadrennial Christian Convention and the General Convention of Universalists in New England. Messrs. Lyon and Barrows represented us at the British anniversaries in London. Mr. Lyon was our delegate to the Hungarian Synod. By letter greetings were exchanged with the French Liberal churches assembled at Nimes, and plans are laid for a systematic correspondence with liberal Christians throughout the world.

8. UNITARIANISM AND DEMOCRACY.

How shall we meet the needs of a thinking democracy? How shall we commend religion to the multitude who have no interest in the church? An urgent sense of duty and a generous impulse to be helpful are stirring in the hearts of all our men and women of the most favored classes. But how shall they reach a thinking democracy? Certainly not by imitating the manners, adopting the forms of speech, and accepting the ordinary standards of the multitude who need instruction and guidance. Gained in that way, popularity is fleeting, influence is small, and the good done to a few is less than the injury to the many. Now, we trust in human nature. Let us say then that for the multitude of our fellow countrymen in America there is nothing too good, too great, too refined, too beautiful, too spiritual. What the Unitarian Church needs to put off, in order to commend itself to the heart of the people, is not its learning, not its refinement, not its respectability, not its ethical quality, not even the fastidiousness of its good taste; as witness the meetings on Boston Common. The bushel which hides its light is not made of these things, but of apathy, indifference, formalism, a fatal facility of faith that all things are going our way, and a lack of faith in the stuff of which our common humanity is made. There is nothing in a Unitarian Church too great or too good for a thinking democracy, whose favorite pictures are the Sistine Madonna and the Angelus. The forces which wrought for us in the past were great preaching, a noble literature, monumental lives. If, by lowering the standard of excellence, we could immediately create ten thousand churches, it would avail us little. Ten thousand liberal churches of no particular quality would simply be lost among the seventy millions of American citizens with their established institutions. But a thousand churches with a natural creed, simple and humane, with an order of worship dignified and inspiring, with something to mark with impressive sanctions the natural sacraments of human life and the progressive religious experiences of the people, with congregations alive to the spirit of the religion of Jesus,—such a band of churches would be a city set on a hill in sight of all the world.

The true American Church, when it comes, will have grown into the hearts and minds of the people. By the vigor of its leadership, by its courage in the presence of arrogant wickedness, by its tender sympathy for all who suffer wrong, by the wisdom of its counsel and the breadth of its charity, it will commend itself. It will be in the true line of apostolic succession, and will never need to show its historic credentials.

9. THE CHURCH UNIVERSAL.

The last thirty years have given us a revelation of the laws of religious progress as notable as that which marks any religious epoch in the history of the world. The application of the law of evolution to the institutions of society removed many an obstacle to faith. Religion is now seen to be not only one of the most important products of evolution, but also a constant power working in the progress of civilization. Thirty years ago, when this Conference was organized, for example, many believed that the Church Universal was but the creation of the hopes, the fears, the fancies, and the desperate longings of the human heart, projected upon a background of such mists and vapors as ignorance, superstition, credulity, and priestcraft. Before the light of science we knew that the vapors would melt and vanish, and we feared that even these solemn temples dissolving in the clear air of knowledge would leave not a rack behind. The vapors—ignorance, superstition, credulity, and priestcraft—grew thin, they melted away; and, as the pageant faded, they rewarded the eye of faith with the most glorious sight that ever dawned upon the soul of man. For these domes and gorgeous pinnacles of the Church Universal were not foreground, but background, Science dispelling the darkness and dispersing the clouds did not destroy the Church of the living God, but revealed it as the most permanent result of the progress of civilization. Religion abides and grows, and the Church Universal in all its changing forms is its growing body.

10. LOYALTY AND LIBERTY.

A careful study of this new revelation removes a doubt which pervaded our body thirty years ago. It was then held by the vast majority of Christendom, and admitted by many of our own most conscientious souls, that loyalty to the Church Universal implied an obligation to accept her authority, submit to her discipline, conform to her worship, and repeat the words of her creed. Now we learn that loyalty to the Church implies submission to the authority of the moral law for which she stands, acceptance of the truth of which she is the mouth-piece, and conformity in belief, discipline, and worship only in so far as they set us free to express the highest spiritual longings. Studying the new laws of religious progress, we learn that the ends which seem most important to the majority, in the Church Universal, are temporary ends, with something better just out of sight beyond; that the truths cherished by the majority in the Church Universal are only half-truths, with better things out of sight beyond. We learn that they who are faithful, wise, and far-sighted, may in utter loyalty serve the true ends of the Church Universal while they seem only to be rebels and antagonists. There have always been chosen individuals or groups of selected souls, loyal children of the Church, who, because they saw that better thing which was to come, did not obey so much as they commanded, did not learn so much as they spoke with authority, did not receive guidance so much as they gave it. Seeing these things in all humility, the Unitarian Church may note the vacant place at the head of the moving column, and earnestly desire the gracious power which would qualify it for promotion to fill it. In the swarming middle ranks there is no place prepared for us, and no place anywhere that we are called of Heaven to occupy unless we are qualified and willing to accept the leadership in ethics and religion.

11. BROTHERHOOD AND PROGRESS.

If we think of all the races, religions, and churches in the world as looking in one direction, each one occupied with the ends and ideas which are nearest, but all together slowly advancing toward the real ends and the whole truth, then we can say that we agree with them all, and that we are opposed to none, not even to those that are nearest to us nor to those from whom we differ most.

This Conference agrees with the Church Universal in believing that the kingdom of God upon this earth is only a part of a larger kingdom in a spiritual universe, and that our human duties and holy hopes would lose their meaning, were we not consciously living in the atmosphere of an eternal life. We differ, however, from the majority of the Church Universal, and probably must differ for generations to come, when we say that the highest duty and the supreme object for which the Church exists is the perfection of human nature and human society upon this earth. Putting this end first and highest, instantly a new glory falls upon this earth. Man assumes dignity. The daily tasks of family life are ennobled. An impulse is given to every work of benevolence, of reform, to education, culture, and social progress. The Church that is alive with this thought must become the fruitful source of everything which benefits mankind. Our duties are simple, but magnificent. From the religious kindergarten up to the church, through all our institutions one purpose must run; namely, to put before every growing child and undeveloped man the ideal of his own perfection, and excite a desire to attain to it. Then, that this human being so striving may have comfort in his sorrow, strength in his temptation, courage for his duty and the inspiration of progress, we shall strive to give him a happy outlook into the universe of infinite and eternal being. Further, also, because man was not made to live alone, it will be our purpose to set such human beings thus happily striving together in churches, that through their accumulated power each one may act for the betterment of human society with the momentum of the concentrated energy of many.

12. CONCLUSION.

This Conference has come to the place and time when it ought in spiritual things to assert itself with power. When we pass our superficial and technical differences, we find ourselves heartily agreeing as to our Church and our work. Just as we believe in the attraction of gravitation, in the revolution of the earth upon its axis, in its motion round the sun, in heat, light, and electricity as modes of motion in matter, so also we believe and trust and stake our spiritual welfare upon our belief in the realities of the spiritual life.

Believing these things, is it not possible for us to lay aside the sins that so easily beset us,—private creed-making and mutual criticism,—and join with one heart and with one voice to say these things, and then to do the works which shall manifest them with power?

THE WOMEN'S NATIONAL ALLIANCE.

BY MRS. EMILY A. FIFIELD.

In coming before the Conference so soon again to speak for the Alliance, I am forcibly reminded of Oliver Wendell Holmes's famous Katydid, who continually reiterated

"An undisputed thing
In such a solemn way!"

not that we have been merely "buzzing our wings" during the past year, or that our story is a secret. On the contrary, we are glad to proclaim it, and to sing our song as often as we have an opportunity.

Those who have watched the onward sweep of this movement, and its rapid growth during the past year, are glad the Conference came again so soon, and think they can show the advance of one short year to have been as successful as that of the previous three. The unfolding of the work has been marvellous, and is all the more remarkable in that it appeals only to the religious element, and is not dependent for its interest upon a popular agitation.

The women like to think that each Alliance Branch has helped to make the Unitarian Church the centre of culture and progress, representing in the community all that is best.

The leaven of the Alliance works a transformation in many a society, shaping and moulding its civic, educational, and religious life.

Between members themselves it has become a strong bond. The woman from Eastport travelling to San Francisco seeks the Alliance member for a friend, sure that they will be drawn together by community of views and interests. The Alliance is thus fulfilling its first design.

Nearly every one here knows that this organization is not an Association, but an Alliance of groups of Unitarian women, these groups being Branches of the National body.

With similar aims and purposes to those of the American Unitarian Association, just set forth by Mr. Batchelor, the methods of the Alliance are radically different. According to the Congregational polity, each Branch is complete and independent, electing its own officers, conducting its own meetings, and raising and spending its own funds. No money is disbursed from a central treasury,—there is no "general fund." The Executive Board suggests, devises, and advises, but does not execute; and representation is on the basis of numbers, each Branch being entitled to delegates to all national meetings according to the number of its members, and not dependent upon the amount of money contributed anywhere.

At the same time the Alliance believes that combination and co-operation are intelligent forces, and, while recognizing the Puritan principle of individual freedom, strives for that unity which is strength and power. If Branches preserve a close connection with the Executive Board, there will be no wasteful duplication of activities, but strength and energy will be concentrated and economized. The officers who are chosen from every section of the country need not take long journeys, at stated intervals, to confer with each other, but are kept always in touch with the work in hand, through monthly reports of the secretary sent to every absent member after the meetings of the Executive Board. The votes and motions of those unable to be present are received by mail. In this way every Branch and every individual member may know from month to month, not only what is contemplated by the officers, but what has been done and what is planned to be done by every other Branch.

This plan of reporting is peculiar to the Alliance. It is probably the only society in the country which has adopted such an idea. Four years' trial has proved these methods to be good, and no reason has been seen for changing them. The By-laws originally framed have not been materially altered. They are sufficiently elastic to suit individual ideas, and general enough to meet all national questions.

The Alliance as it stands to-day is an effective, national society, with a constantly increasing strength and with possibilities ample to absorb all the energy and devotion of Unitarian women. Like real branches on a living tree, each sending out its leaves which catch the light at different angles, yet all dependent on the same life current from the great tap-roots, so the Alliance, with Branches varying according to circumstance and environment, each reaching out to the light which it may need, draws its inspiration and life from the same great principles of fellowship and belief which nourish the whole body.

And now what is the work? The By-laws say "to quicken the religious life of our Unitarian churches, and bring the women of the denomination into closer acquaintance, co-operation, and fellowship."

Fellowship! and loyalty to our denomination!

There are no better words in which to state the purpose of the Alliance and what it stands for. The church work of women is nothing new. It has comprised all forms of philanthropic, financial, educational, and social activity. For practical efforts in every direction, from adding to the minister's salary to establishing kindergartens and reading clubs, the "Sewing Circle" is still potent and all-embracing.

The importance of social duties, the pleasure and profit of intellectual and literary pursuits, have been recognized and provided for; but the nobler religious and spiritual matters have usually been left for the pulpit and the minister. The Alliance, without neglecting the other things, gives to its members a sense of personal responsibility for spiritual improvement and growth. Through it the women keep abreast with religious and Unitarian thought, and learn to appreciate the grandeur and beauty of the Unitarian faith and its adaptation to the needs of human life. As they comprehend its high hopes, its freedom, its aspirations, and its glorious ideals, their own lives must become richer, their individual faith stronger. At their meetings they are no longer reserved and silent on these deeper themes, but are able to discuss and debate such questions as relate to vital concerns, and to hold and express positive convictions about religious things. An Alliance woman can now tell why she is a Unitarian.

To aid in this, the Alliance publishes from time to time Study Class Leaflets, containing courses of study and suggestions of topics for discussion and collateral reading. The last one, just issued, on Unitarian belief, a monument to the industry and research of the one who prepared it, will be specially valuable to Alliance members and to the denomination at large.

Studying the great truths for which Unitarianism stands and confident that they may be helpful to others, the women become animated with the true missionary spirit; and so the Alliance joins in the missionary work of the denomination, planting the seeds of faith, gathering new groups of workers, and establishing new churches. Giving out what is received quickens and deepens the interest, and constantly renews the sources of supply.

The first gentle hints of this missionary effort are given through the Cheerful Letter, which, without being sectarian or denominational, carries the ideas of liberal thought in every direction. Isolated mothers and "shut-ins," while receiving well-chosen literature and often material help, are insensibly made conversant with and are influenced by the liberal ideals. The little sheet, so full of rational hope and comfort, is fulfilling a beautiful mission.

With similar aim the silent agency of the Post-office Mission, which is denominational, carries the best thought, the highest inspiration, to thousands and thousands of waiting souls. As the little tracts and leaflets, with the larger bundles of magazines and papers, are dropped into homes where children are growing to be men and women or into lonely camps and prairie farms, where thoughtful men are often found, fresh opportunities are opened for cordial words and unstinted sympathy. Many applicants for our literature are or have been connected with some church. Some have never heard the name Unitarian, or, hearing it, know nothing of its meaning. So they often write, "I am a Unitarian, but I did not know it." Others are curious or critical, but all are glad to know something of a religion which can be applied to the affairs of every-day life. Sometimes groups of Post-office Mission "parishioners," who have never heard a Unitarian sermon, and gathered in places far from a Unitarian church, form little centres ready for the State agent or the "circuit minister." In this missionary activity, so contrary to the old traditions of conservative Unitarianism, lies a bright hope for the future of the denomination.

It is not too much to claim for the Alliance that it has opened channels of life-giving irrigation through many arid fields overgrown with the prickly burrs of Calvinism or the noxious weeds of agnosticism and unbelief.

Having so prepared the ground, comes the great opportunity, through the American Unitarian Association, to make figs grow upon thistles and to turn barren wastes into fruitful fields. To help in every suggested enterprise will be the further purpose of the Alliance. The multiplication of "circles" and "centres of liberal thought" will be fostered in every way, and in establishing new churches the Alliance will hope to have a hand.

Not long ago a report of the American Home Missionary Evangelical Society contained this statement: "The Congregational Church ought to build at least one church a day. It must build five per week in order to keep pace with the demands of the home missionaries. Last year it built only two per week." The same report told the marvellous story of Oklahoma Territory, which had then been inhabited a little over one year, and yet contained already seven orthodox Congregational churches.

A little later our own Mr. Reynolds, speaking of the need for liberal churches, said, "Under the best of circumstances a new society can be gathered, housed, and confirmed in vigor only by years of wise and arduous effort." The women of the Alliance, who enjoy the benefits of our faith and have seen the results of personal efforts in educating others to the same joy, are startled at such differing statements. They feel that, with the great resources at the command of Unitarians, every community should have at least one church where the grand truths of the liberal faith, its warmth, its broad charity, its religion of service, may be promulgated.

The Alliance, without dropping any of the good work of the past, will be glad to take a broader sweep, and accept the greater opportunities which may be presented to it. Sometimes, forgetting its own immediate needs, a Branch may forego the purchase of a new organ or a new carpet, that the money shall strengthen other churches than its own, and give to new places a share in their priceless possessions.

Yet the value of our work must not be estimated by the number of churches founded. The Alliance is always willing to sow the seed, and let who may gather the fruit. It will continue to distribute the literature of the denomination, and to add to it by printing sermons and leaflets of its own. The demand is still greater than the supply, and the Alliance may well make this its specific function. There is no Branch, however small, and no woman, however poor, who cannot join in spreading the truth, if only by sending a paper to a cripple in Dakota or lending her copy of the Christian Register to her next-door neighbor. The fascination of a far distant correspondent should never lead us to forget that in the next street there may be spiritual desolation needing comfort and sustenance, and that all giving, to be useful, should be thoughtful and systematic.

The Alliance will continue to gather into groups those who receive the literature, who are waiting for teachers to explain and confirm their thoughts and aspirations, and tell them how to make use of the liberal thought which they have read. If there cannot be a church or a preacher for every town or village, preachers must go from point to point. As you have heard, a wise and well-considered distribution of effort in this direction over every portion of our land is demanded.

Already carefully arranged circuits in the South have been presented to the Alliance and have enlisted the interest of the Branches. Sunday services are held, and Sunday-schools and free libraries have been formed, and needful appropriations been given to the Southern superintendent. The women of the Pacific Coast have authorized the establishment of circuit preaching in some of the smaller towns of California on their own responsibility and at their own expense. In every town will be formed a "circle," to which will be left the arrangement for services and the raising of funds. If any church results, they must build it.

The successful efforts made in the Middle States, resulting in Alliance Branches, Sunday circles, and churches, and the proposition that in New England "the ministers of small parishes should add to their salaries by preaching in neighboring towns or where no liberal church had yet been organized," appeal to the women as a true conservation of energy; and they will do their best to help carry out such plans.

It will be a privilege to assist our one foreign mission. Whatever may have been thought at the outset, the clear-sighted, logical Japanese have won our interest; and the hearts of Alliance women have gone out to the solitary American minister who alone represents the Unitarian Mission at Tokio.

The library now contains eight hundred volumes, largely secured by the Alliance, which will take pride in adding to it from time to time. Having once begun such a work, the Alliance shares in the responsibility of maintaining it, and in fulfilling the implied pledges of the denomination.

Meanwhile nothing at home must suffer, no vital interest must be neglected. The Sunday-school must be sustained and improved, the Temperance Society must be indorsed, the Church Building Loan Fund be re-enforced, and the publications of the denomination must be kept up. No activity which has proved of value must be allowed to languish. An Alliance Branch in a church means willing hands and stout hearts ready to act together for whatever will strengthen the church and the denomination.

You will see that the secret of the Alliance Katydid is not "she did, she did, she did!" but "she must, she can, she will!"

All this demands a vigorous and wise policy, and we depend upon the enlistment of every Unitarian church and every woman to demonstrate the ultimate success of the Alliance. With enthusiasm, self-consecration, and high ideals, we will work "until the Spirit be poured upon us from on high, and the wilderness be a fruitful field, and the fruitful field be counted for a forest."

THE UNITARIAN OUTLOOK IN GREAT BRITAIN.

BY REV. BROOKE HERFORD, D.D.

It is not easy to see which way things are moving when you yourself are in the midst of the movement. But my absence from England during the period of my life in America gave me, as I may say, a parallax of seventeen years by which to observe the change of position; and the whole period of my ministry, now forty-four years, gives me a still larger parallax of observation as to that outlook for Unitarianism in Great Britain, about which you desire me to speak.

The whole subject divides itself inevitably into two parts: (1) as to the outlook for Unitarianism as a system or a tendency of thought; and (2) for Unitarianism as an ecclesiastical organization for promoting that tendency of thought and establishing church life and worship upon the basis of it.

To take the question of the general tendency of thought, first, I can briefly say that there, as you feel it here in America, the whole movement of strong and free thinking, both in and out of the churches, is in the direction of what we call Unitarianism. Others may not call it so. Indeed, many of those who really come nearest to it are most afraid of that name; but the tendency is so, unmistakably. It is not merely on the subject of the unity of God, but along the whole line of theological thought,—there is this advance. They may still nominally adhere to the old position; but then, where they used to stand behind it, they now stand in front of it. Formerly it was their boundary: now it is simply their point of historical departure, and often a pretty far departure. Even where they sedulously maintain the old statements, they lay the emphasis quite differently. Really, out in the world, it is not any longer the question of a Trinity: the question is of God; and, as science and philosophy contemplate that Infinite Energy which is all that they can clearly see, even those who are not sure that it is God are sure that it is one. And in the churches, where they used to lay the emphasis upon the Trinity, they now lay it upon the Fatherhood. So the emphasis used to be laid on men being sinners by nature. They lay it now on men being sinners in fact, which is a very different thing. So, again, the emphasis used to be laid on the number who would be lost: they lay it now on the number who will be saved. They all repudiate the idea that their creeds involve the damnation of the vast majority, which is very good; but, all the same, that is what those who made the creeds intended that they should involve. And in England, even more than here, the idea of any eternal life of torment is yielding to the gospel of the larger hope. Even with regard to the nature and the work of Christ, in which there is, I think, the strongest clinging to the old position of Orthodoxy, there is at least a broadening of thought, if not toward our humanitarianism, at least toward a higher appreciation of Christ's humanity, with less attempt at minute definition, and a warmer recognition of all who love Christ, whatever their opinions, as his disciples. While, on the subject of the Bible, the "newer criticism" is advocated, even in very orthodox quarters indeed; and altogether a more human and living interest in the Scriptures as literature is quite taking the place of the old high-and-dry doctrines of absolute verbal inspiration. So the thoughts of men are widening. Even the very reaction toward a stronger sacerdotalism of form and outward service, in some ways,—especially on the subject of the Bible,—seems to leave the mind more free; and the world keeps moving, and the outlook for the gradual progress of those great thoughts and hopes for which we Unitarians have so long stood is more hopeful and encouraging than ever before.

But, when you invited me to speak on "The Outlook for Unitarianism in Great Britain," it was something more definite and objective than this gradual broadening of thought that you had in mind. Our fathers in Old England, as yours in the New, when they were working themselves free from the entanglements of Orthodoxy and Calvinism, felt that that simple gospel Christianity to which they were coming was a great deal too good a thing to keep to themselves, or to keep sealed up in the old bottles of the creeds. To be honest Christians, they had to build up churches for themselves. To be earnest Christians, they had to tell their thoughts to others, and do their part to gather them into the light and help and joy of it. They did not want to establish a new sect to do this; but they had got to do it openly, and they had got to do it somewhere. And so, about simultaneously, though without any co-operation, there grew out of the old English Presbyterianism and out of the New England Congregationalism these two groups of free churches in England and in America. They both disliked the sectarian position, and shrank from any sect name; but each of these groups of churches, if they were to do any work for truth and for worship, had to do it by drawing together in each country, and had to accept, practically, the name by which other churches described them, and so grew into the religious bodies which in America and England respectively stand to the world as "Unitarianism." And it is of this organized Unitarianism, distinctly striving in England, as you do here, to make these great thoughts of ours publicly known and to win men to church life based upon them, that you ask as to the outlook for it.

England moves slowly. English Unitarianism has had special reasons in its very origin and nature, as well as in the opposition of the world around, for slow growth. Like American Unitarians, so your English brethren have kept dreaming of some rapid progress. But, really, in its very origin it had nothing of a missionary impulse in it, but was the quiet witnessing for truth of the quietest and most thoughtful element in the old English dissent. And so its inherent character, involving individual conviction,—in which men had to think their way into it one by one,—was fatal to any hope of wholesale conquest and conversion. Moreover, during the past forty or fifty years there have been several special causes which have retarded the growth of Unitarianism as an organized church life.

1. Of these, I unhesitatingly put first the immense improvement in the character of the Established Church. One cannot help rejoicing in that improvement; but it has made the work of all the free churches in England unmistakably harder. Why, when I began my ministry in 1851, in the rural manufacturing districts of the north of England, my nearest Episcopalian neighbor on the one side was a notorious drunkard, and on the other a man of harmless character, indeed, but with a physical defect in speech which, even in the familiar burial service, made it almost impossible to follow what he was saying. All that kind of thing is past. The Anglican clergy to-day are about as good as others, and, on the average, men of better education; and so their social prestige has its full weight, and, in the country districts especially, puts the work of all non-conformity at a far greater disadvantage than ever before.

2. Then another great difficulty has been the scattering tendency of the new scientific thought of the past generation. Even in the days of Priestley and Channing that immense amount of free thought which was set in motion found it hard to keep together in any workable body. Why, the line extended from semi-Orthodoxy to barest Theism! It was a splendid freedom and breadth that they proclaimed; but one is reminded of the difficulty of the Irishman returning home from the fair, whose friend commiserated him upon the length of the way he had to go. "Ah, sure," said Pat, "it isn't the length of the way that is troublin' me, but the breadth of it!" And, then, that breadth was still further increased by the brilliant developments of science touching everything, questioning everything, and not only moving things to the foundations, but sometimes threatening to leave no foundation. I heard Oliver Wendell Holmes say that he was proud of Unitarianism, "because, alone of all the churches, it had faced the new light of science with perfectly open eyes." But was it possible for that to be so, and yet for all to hold together as a solid, workable force for religious truth?

And, then, a third difficulty has been the divided counsel among ourselves as to how to co-ordinate our truth and our freedom. You have happily not had so much experience of this here. Almost from the beginning your greatest leaders have accepted the Unitarian name as fairly indicating our "whereabouts" to the world, while always upholding that it means not only the special doctrine connoted by it, but the liberty which brought men to that truth, and may bring them to more and other truth, and become synonymous with largest freedom. So in America the Unitarian name has lost almost all its opprobrium. But in England our leading men, or a large number of them, set themselves dead against it. Instead of widening its meaning to include liberty, as you have done, they have pinned it down to its narrowest doctrinal meaning, and have refused to have anything to do with it as any designation of our church movements or workings. The consequence has been weakening and confusion in our whole position and work. In the great movement for promulgating our simpler thought of Christianity, and which has been forced upon us by the very fact that it was this thought the world has most inquired about, those whom we would have gladly looked to as our leaders would not lead. So our battle, for forty years back, has been, as was said of Inkerman, "a sergeant's battle."

Of course there are other reasons for slow progress, such as the tendency of population from the country toward the cities. But, then, such causes apply to all religious movements here, as well as in the old country; and I have desired to speak only of those which are peculiar to England, or which arise out of the nature of our Unitarianism and our freedom. And, as a fact, these have told heavily upon our work; and for some years past, before I returned to England, I had felt in various ways a considerable discouragement among my old English brethren, both among our ministers and our laity,—a doubt whether they were making any progress, a hesitation at starting any new efforts, or even keeping up then existing ones, and here and there the question raised whether perhaps they were not making a mistake in trying to do the liberalizing work in a separate church life of our own.

So it was an intense interest to me, in returning, to see what the real outlook was. I eagerly embraced every opportunity of being present at our district conferences and associations, as well as of visiting individual congregations. I have been in close and frequent communication with our leading workers in every part of the country and in every branch of our work. Of course, it was to myself a matter of the deepest moment to know the facts, and to find out whether I had gone back to a failing cause, to the tail end of a losing battle, or whether the discouragement which I had sometimes perceived was merely such as is inevitable at times in every long, slow struggle from Christ's time downwards.

Well, I come back to you to say that, the more I have looked into the life and work of our churches, the more I have found, comparing the state of things when I came away twenty years ago, and, still more, comparing it with what it was when I first knew it forty-four years ago,—the more clearly I have found that there has been a decided though slow improvement and increase.

Let me speak of some of the special heads under which I note this improvement and increase.

I note it in the generally more prosperous and well-kept condition of our separate churches, and the much greater activity of our congregations. It must be remembered that it is only just fifty years since our tenure of our churches and chapels has been secure. Previous to that time our possession of them was constantly being threatened on the ground that they could not have been intended for use by Unitarians, inasmuch as, when they had been founded by the old English Presbyterians, Unitarianism was prohibited by law, and consequently it would have been illegal to establish buildings or endowments for it. Of course, it was pointed out that those old Presbyterians purposely left their trusts "open,"—not, indeed, specially with the idea that their successors might become Unitarians, but distinctly to enable them to freely follow the truth, and worship as from time to time they might deem right. This plea, however, was disregarded; and we were in danger of losing all our older meeting-houses, when, in 1844, Parliament took the matter up, and the "Dissenters' Chapels Act" was passed, confirming all congregations in their chapels and properties which had not been distinctly tied up by special orthodox trusts, and could show a twenty-five years' usage. That "Dissenters' Chapels Act" is our free church "Magna Charta"; and from its passing (in 1844) dates the era of this rebuilding of our churches. I was counting up the cost of these new buildings a few days ago, and found that, even as far as my own recollection extended, it amounted, in England alone, to over £300,000, equal to a million and a half of dollars, and all this raised out and out. There are very few church debts in England. And this really stands for much more than money. The services in these churches are more dignified, more beautiful than they were a generation ago; and they are doing far more work in all kinds of missionary and educational and charitable work, and more, too, in special address to the world around them and in publicity to make the views we hold better known.

Closely connected with this, in the outlook upon our work, is the much stronger and more effective organization among these churches. Of course, we have not the organization we would like to have. We are all deploring that we have not more. But the old farmers have a proverb about their wheat, "You can't have it both in meal and in malt." So we cannot have both the independence which is necessary to make Unitarians and to keep them standing apart from other Christian organizations and the cohesion of a closely organized ecclesiasticism. What organization and machinery we have has to be purely voluntary; and we ought not to be discouraged, therefore, that it cannot class with the strong organizations of the great bodies which have real church government. But the hopeful thing for our outlook is that it is steadily strengthening and increasing, far beyond the increase of our churches. Our churches have, during the past forty years, increased very slowly,—about eighty new societies against thirty-nine or forty weak causes closed, a net gain of forty in as many years, equal to an increase of twelve and one-half per cent. in that period. But during that period the support of our British and Foreign Unitarian Association has increased fourfold, four hundred per cent.; and that pecuniary increase may be taken as fairly indexing the increase of all organization among our churches.

One specially interesting branch of our English organization to you will be our local and district associations. These are the equivalent to your local or State conferences, but with this difference,—that the English local associations are all actual working missionary organizations, each with its own treasury, each practically managing the missionary and church extension work within its own district. They do not have very large treasuries: I suppose that, all together, they will raise a sum about equal to the income of the national organization,—the British and Foreign. It is worth noticing that in every case the formation of these district organizations, each collecting funds for its own work, has strengthened, not weakened or lessened, the amount contributed to the central organization.

It is part of this same development of our organization, and yet so distinct as to require a separate and special mention, that a few years ago our English friends began to follow the example of America in the appointment of district superintendents,—your State missionaries. A large proportion of our local conferences or associations have now these superintendents. They are usually supported half by the central treasury and half by the local funds; and they have been found a great strengthening of our work by looking after small congregations in danger of lapsing, organizing the missionary work of the districts, and gathering into effective help the work of our lay preachers. It is worth noting that in England there is much more done in the way of preaching by laymen than is at all known in America. As an illustration of this, I may mention that, on looking into the Inquirer for the calendar of our London churches for August 25, I found that in the announcements of the services in twenty-two churches there were no less than nine laymen announced, among them being men of good business and professional standing. This is one of the hopeful things in the outlook for Unitarianism on the other side of the ocean,—the readiness of our laymen to take an open, unashamed part for their faith. I should not like to say that our English laity are more religious than are Americans; but, certainly, they are a little less sensitive about expressing it,—partly, I think it is that Americans never like to do a thing unless they are sure they can do it well. Englishmen, if the thing has got to be done, will stand up and do it,—clumsily, it may be, but still they will do it. And this is closely connected with another hopeful sign in the English outlook, and that is what I cannot help calling the splendid tenacity of English life. Our English people are nothing like as good at going ahead as Americans. I miss the dash and enthusiasm of American life in our churches there just as in everything else; but, for the staying quality, I know nothing finer than English life. Our struggling little congregations hold on through losses and discouragements that would scatter a small American church to the winds, for the time at least; though here, also, as I remember Dr. Bellows remarking, a Unitarian church is very hard to kill: it may be closed for years, yet some day it will start up again. But in England they do not close. There is no stopping for summer or vacations: if they cannot procure a minister, then, as I have said, they set a layman to take the service; but service there has got to be.

Not a rapid quality, you see, but one that gives great confidence in the eventual working through of whatever needs to be done. So the outlook is encouraging, not because it gives us yet much visible victory or progress to rejoice in, but because, in face of all the opposition and distrust that our cause has had to work through, it shows us, at the worst, making some slow but real progress, even in the number of our churches, and making far greater progress in our own preparedness for the work as it still lies before us. The case is with us very much as it was with Unitarianism in America up to twenty years ago. Up to that time you will remember there had been hardly any perceptible advance here. Great efforts had been made at times, and especially after the war there was considerable stir among your churches and institutions; and yet it seemed to come to curiously little. Why, for a generation before the founding of this conference your Year Books show that the American progress had been less than one a year, and that with all the marvellous extension of the States over the West. Then came the war, with its great national awakening; and this Conference was formed amid great hopes, and yet for twenty years after, though things were a little better, with an average increase of six new churches a year, yet it seemed very unsatisfying. But, then, you began really to see the fruits of all that strengthening organization and more bold forward-policy; and a steady gain of from twelve to twenty churches a year has been going on, and could be considerably increased if only you can find the men and the money necessary. It looks to me as if we, in the old country, may have very much the same experience to look forward to. We have never gone back. Even in the days when we made no strong effort to enlarge our work, it kept enlarging a very little, more than enough to balance the lapses in small country parishes which could not be kept up. And, even since we began to feel the impulse of the duty to organize and make our faith known, we have still kept on with very little increase, though always some. But with us, as with you, this patient effort must surely tell by degrees. It will be more slowly, because, as I began by showing, our whole battle is a harder one; but I believe that it is coming. Over and above the hopeful signs in the permanent current and drift of our own church life and the progress of thought around us, there are some things which have happened of late or are happening now,—only temporary factors, perhaps, in the religious situation, but still distinctly hopeful items in the nearer outlook.

One of these is the recent School Board struggle. You know something of the way in which the Established Church in England, seeing the progress of board schools,—our English "common schools,"—and foreseeing that their own denominational schools were weakening and becoming increasingly difficult to maintain, began to feel that, if they were to keep education in their hands, they must try, practically, to capture the Board Schools for their Church. They have been doing this for some time. Where they can, they try to keep out Board Schools altogether; but, where they cannot do this, then they move heaven and earth to get their own clergy and people appointed on the "Board" (what you would call the "School Committee" of the district), and then edge in the "Apostles' Creed" and as much orthodox teaching of the Episcopal sort as they can. There has been a good deal of this up and down the country, and very often they have got the orthodox dissenters to work with them. But, at last, in London they took a stand which began to open the eyes of the public. In London there had been for over twenty years a scheme of undenominational religious education, drawn up in 1871 by representatives of all religious parties,—a real honest attempt to give the Board School children some good instruction in the elements of religion without any bias toward any special sect. It is true that most of the teachers are orthodox, a large majority even trained in Church of England normal schools, so that, without intending to be denominational, it was largely of a vaguely orthodox character; but still it was, in the main, well and honestly given, and this "Compromise of 1871," as it was called, was recognized by moderate men of all parties as working well. Suddenly, a few extreme High Churchmen raised an alarm that the compromise was being worked for "Unitarianism," and began a movement to have it set aside, and to substitute for it doctrinal conditions and tests to which all teachers must be submitted, which would at once turn the religious teaching into narrow theological and doctrinal channels, absolutely exclude all Unitarians, and give the clerical party an immense hold upon the whole future teaching. They reckoned on drawing the orthodox dissenters—Congregationalists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and all the great Methodist bodies—on to their side, and being able, so, absolutely to crush out, not "Unitarianism" (for there has never been any serious charge of that being taught directly), but all that broader teaching which the best teachers were giving, and which Unitarians could give also. But the very opposite was what took place. The orthodox dissenters unanimously said: "We want to keep that broad, undenominational teaching of the compromise. We are satisfied with that; and, if Unitarians can give that, so much the better." They perceived, in fact, that it was a "clerical" scheme to capture the schools for the Church of England, and they refused to join in it; and, as the battle grew more distinct, here for the first time were Unitarians and other dissenting bodies working side by side, fighting shoulder and shoulder. This brought them better acquainted with us and with our principles; and, while there was a wide-spread disclaiming of any sympathy with our views, there was an almost equally wide-spread recognition of our belonging to the common family of Christian bodies. The whole struggle brought up the question of "What are these Unitarians, whom there is all this talk about?" as never before. Even the very abuse heaped upon us did us rather good than harm. In one great district, in which the secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Rev. W. C. Bowie, had for years been a representative, a special effort was made to oust him. Placards saying, "If you want your children to go to hell, vote for a Unitarian!" were broadcast through the district; and one hundred ladies from the West End High churches were sent into the district.

And the result was that the Unitarian, Mr. Bowie, was returned at the head of the poll for his district; while all through London the liberal vote was enormously increased, and the great secular papers of both parties frankly agreed that clericalism was beaten. I think that one result of that contest is that there is more interest in Unitarianism among those quite outside of us than ever before.

And in this wide-spread interest and inquiry one name has stood us in such stead as to constitute in itself one of these immediate factors in the situation and the outlook. I mean the name of James Martineau. Fortunate is the church that has a man to refer to, as one of its members and ministers, of world-wide fame and known throughout England as one of the noblest religious thinkers, and perhaps the foremost philosophic mind of the age. There is not a minister of any church who has felt the perplexities of religious faith in presence of the investigations of science, who has not recognized in him the very strongest defender of a spiritual philosophy of the universe. Add to this a catholicity of spirit which has made him the friend of the greatest leaders in every church, and a venerable age which of itself makes him one of the wonders of England, and you will readily understand that his simple name, as one of us, and our most honored man, is a tower of strength. Again and again, in these recent controversies, I have heard men say that they are themselves no Unitarians, but they cannot refuse the Christian name to a body that counts James Martineau as one of its members. This is itself an immense gain to our cause. It puts us, for the first time in our history, in the category of a form of religion that may be fairly inquired into. Hitherto, to a large majority of the Christian—even of the Protestant—world, Unitarianism has been simply taboo,—something not to be touched, something dangerous even to investigate. That state of things is breaking up. It will still be slow enough work. But, as I look back and remember the absolute ostracism of Unitarians from any Christian fellowship forty years ago, I cannot help feeling the immense difference in feeling which there is now, and recognizing the far opener outlook for our work. So, friends, dear friends and fellow-workers of so many of the happiest years of my life, from whom in those years I learned so much and got so much new courage and confidence, and from whom I went back in that stronger confidence to take my part again in the battle of religious liberalism where that battle is hardest,—dear friends, I bring you from across the water the greeting, not of a perishing or feeble cause, but of a movement that never had so much of life and energy and hope in it as it has to-day. It is a cause the very weakness of which lies largely in the fact that its principles are already leavening the other churches of the time with enough of liberalism to gratify the mind, though not enough to do justice to God's truth! Yes, that makes our work a little harder; but it does not make it one whit less necessary. For it is not only truth man needs, but truth held in reverent openness and freedom; and we have to work on and witness and build up churches for Christ's own broader thought, until that thought has come to be the open light of man.

THE CHURCH AND THE MASSES.

BY REV. JOHN CUCKSON.

The Church and the masses. By the Church in this connection I do not mean any particular variety of Christianity, nor by the masses any special class of society. My object for the moment is to consider the position of the Christian Church in general as it stands related in our own time to the vast multitude of men and women who dwell in the great centres of population. It is obvious to every patient, discriminating mind that the subject is of the deepest importance, and raises questions which no serious person can disregard. Whether we look at the comparatively meagre attendance at most of the churches, despite the frantic and, for the large part, pitiable efforts which are continually being put forth, without avail, to reach the masses; or consider the drift of modern life toward worldliness and an absorption in secular pursuits and pleasures to the utter neglect of organized religion in any form,—the outlook, to say the least of it, is not encouraging. While it may certainly not be said that Christianity has lost any of its intrinsic power and grace, it nevertheless cannot be denied that from one cause or another its influence has not been commensurate with the needs of the age and the increase of population. And there is growing up in our midst, throughout every social grade, a disregard of its ordinances and an indifference to its claims. It is not enough to say that there is more of it in the atmosphere, and that in some shapeless and undefined fashion it pervades the public mind. That may or may not be; but, if it can be shown that the trend of life is toward material prosperity and self-indulgence, whether coarse or refined, and away from an institution in which are trained ideal faiths and unselfish hopes and affections, then there is abundant ground to fear that our common Christianity is losing its control of the forces which are shaping civilization. Very much of the prevailing indifference to the Christian Church is the result of arrested spiritual development,—of persistent and habitual neglect of those faculties common to mankind, which, "be they what they may, are yet the fountain light of all our seeing." It begins in the home. Religion has largely ceased to be a plant of domestic culture; and secularism grows out of a defective religious training, or from no religious training whatever. If children are born and bred in homes from which religion in every form is exiled, and are left to pick up their knowledge of God and Christ and sacred things from casual and, necessarily, fitful and imperfect teaching for a few brief years in the Sunday-school, the result must be disastrous to them. It matters little whether the home be one of wealth and refinement, or of commonplace mediocrity, or of hopeless poverty. If the prevailing atmosphere be secular, unideal, undevout, the result will be the same,—a generation of men and women, possibly free from vulgar vices, but with no sense of infinite relations, no enthusiasms for lofty ideals, and devoid of spiritual experiences.

Does not this fact alone let us into the whole secret of the alienation of so many young men and women in all ranks of life from religion and its institutions? Parents and ministers bewail their indifference and isolation, look upon their estrangement with pain and sorrow, now reproach them for their carelessness, and then ply them with tender and beseeching solicitude, but all to no purpose. The mischief was done in early life, and of all places in the home. No definite religious bias was given to the mind in the most sensitive and plastic period of its growth; and they, who might have been ardent disciples of Christ and devoted church members, gradually drift away from all religious association, and soon come to be stolid pagans in the midst of a civilization which professes to be Christian. Then the ranks of the unchurched are further increased by a growing body of men and women, mostly men, who profess religious opinions, and then take no further thought about them. They are nominal Christians, not unfriendly to the Church and its services, but simply indifferent. They do not ignore Christianity altogether, but distinctly and habitually give it the smallest place in their regards. The neglect of religion which goes to the length of atheism or agnosticism is not common. It is speculative, not practical, and can hardly be counted as one of the working forces of civilization; but the conduct which is logical and rational only on the supposition that religion is a matter of no consequence is lamentably common. In other words, there are thousands of men and women in whose daily lives there is only the most fleeting reference to God and scarcely any disposition to worship. They would be ashamed to doubt the verities which they systematically ignore. Their faith in God is a mere idol of the mind, a cold and passionless creation of the intellect and imagination. They believe in Christ, but shrink from anything like pronounced and helpful discipleship. The Bible may be all true from Genesis to Revelation,—they would most likely say that it is,—but the book does not deeply interest them, and exercises no authority over them. The Church is a great institution, and they are not unwilling to admit its power and place in the community and recognize its beneficent influence upon life; but they respect it at a distance, and seldom, if ever, enter its precincts. Prayer is beautiful; but, so far as they are concerned, it is a lost art. Their lives are so thronged with other things, which touch them far more closely and affect them more vitally, that they have neither leisure nor inclination for spiritual worship. There is neither reality nor force in their religion. It is wholly inoperative, and might just as well be called by some other name. Suggest to such people that for their own good as well as for the benefit of their children and neighbors they might make a difference between week-days and Sundays, and encourage with their presence the Church which needs them far more than their good opinion or their annual subscriptions, and they will most likely indorse the suggestion, and promise to turn over a new leaf; but, once under the spell of religious indifference, repentance is difficult, if not impossible. Once relinquish worship, whether in the home or in the church, and it is hard to rekindle the ashes of a dead or a dying faith.

How to revive in the unchurched a lost devotion, and restore to the Church a worldly backslider, is the toughest problem an earnest minister has to face. And the problem is all the deeper, if this otherwise good man, as frequently happens, is the head of a large family, or a person of commanding public influence and position. The better the man, the more insidious and wide-spread is his influence and example, in this particular respect, both in the home and in society. His children and associates will take their cue from his habits rather than from his precepts. Himself heedless of the claims of religion and indifferent to its institutions, he is apt to be reckless of the tendencies in his household. Whether his children go to church or stay at home is a matter of indifference to him, and it soon becomes of no concern to them; and it is not long before the last link between his family and his church is severed, and the pew once filled with a united and happy group is empty altogether or only occupied at intervals by an occasional visitor. Is not this a true story of religious declension written on the records of a thousand churches? When a man becomes oblivious for a long time to the eternal trusts, reverences, aspirations, and contritions of the soul, prayer becomes an unwonted and tedious experience, and anything worth the name of religion a forgotten story.

But, if we may judge by the multiform and plausible excuses for non-attendance at church, the chief obstacle of the delinquent to his full allegiance to organized religion is found in the existence of what he calls social caste. He does not tell

Business Notices.

A Difficult Feat.—It is not often that a common piece of ordinary household furniture can be lifted up into a rare creation of art. Yet the table described in another column is certainly such an example of work. The Paine Furniture Company are to be congratulated on the designing of such furniture.

Washington Excursions.—The Royal Blue Line announces another series of personally conducted seven day tours to Washington, D.C., the first party leaving Boston Wednesday, November 20. The rate of $23 covers every expense of the entire trip. An illustrated itinerary may be obtained by addressing A. J. Simmons, N. E. P. A., 211 Washington Street, Boston.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder
Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Deaths.

At Barre, 11th inst., Frederick W. Jenkins, 61 yrs.

Training of Attendants for the Sick Room

will be resumed by the Massachusetts Emergency and Hygiene Association, with Miss DELIA KNIGHT as Instructor, November 5, Tuesday, 3 P.M., at 9 St. James Avenue, where applications can be made to her daily from 3 to 5 P.M., or apply to Secretary, Mrs. K. G. WELLS, 45 Commonwealth Avenue.

Literary Lectures

—FOR—

UNITY CLUBS, WOMEN'S ALLIANCES, Etc.

By Rev. GEO. H. YOUNG

—ON—

Madame de Stael.	Jane Austen.
Elizabeth Frye.	Mary Lamb.
Louisa Alcott.	Charlotte Bronte.
George Eliot.	Jane Welsh Carlyle.
Dorothea Dix.	Margaret Fuller.
E. B. Browning.	Alice and Phoebe Cary.

For circulars and terms address

LAWRENCE, MASS.

Series of attractive lectures.—Lawrence American.
Delightful lectures.—Lawrence Eagle.
Large and select audience gathered to enjoy the literary treat offered. Mr. Young is a very interesting speaker, and held the attention of his audience closely. All who listened to this lecture will be anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity offered for the remainder of the course.—Portsmouth Times.

JAMES KAY APPLEBEE

is open to engagements for PREACHING or LECTURING. Address: ALLSTON, MASS.

us by what process the differences between wealth and poverty are to be obliterated either in the church or elsewhere; but he somehow thinks that, so long as they exist, they constitute an insuperable barrier to fellowship. If he is poor, he flatly refuses to sit in a church which is mainly occupied and supported by the wealthy; and, if he is rich, there is a strong disposition to go to church with his own class or not to go at all. And so there has sprung up a wide-spread sentiment against the costly church, on the one hand, and the so-called mission church, on the other. If we look deeply into the grounds upon which this prejudice rests,—for at its root it is nothing more than a prejudice,—we shall find that wealth and poverty are not movable at pleasure, but are here to stay. They exist in business, in politics, and in society; and nothing that we can do will keep them out of the churches, and the best thing is simply to recognize the fact, and eschew the demagogism which continually magnifies and emphasizes the difference between them, and sets them farther and farther apart, instead of doing everything that can be done to adjust their inequalities and bring them closer together. Besides, the social character of any particular church is not determined on any abstract principle, but on the needs of those for whom and by whom it was built, and the character of the neighborhood in which it is situated. Even its size and seating capacity is no unimportant factor in determining what it can do and what it cannot do in accommodating worshippers. A church is usually built to meet the needs and requirements of a limited number of people. A few families in a given neighborhood meet together, and decide to erect an edifice to suit their religious needs and tasks. It is to be a house of worship for them and for their children, and for so much of the general public as they are able to accommodate with seats. The sense of proprietorship and privilege enters, and I venture to say ought to enter, into all their plans. The church is for them and their families, and is their spiritual home in a sense in which it can never be the home of casual visitors and strangers.

You may say that this is exclusive if you choose, but it is an exclusiveness which is both inevitable and justifiable. It does not arise from social pride or narrowness, but from conditions, mainly outward and unavoidable, which are inherent in the constitution of voluntary churches, which have always existed and will continue to exist. If the State were erecting churches at its own cost, and to provide for the religious needs of the general public, then private ownership of pews and claims to special privileges would be unjust; but, when a limited number of people build a church for themselves first, and for the outside public so far as their resources will allow, they are not to be reproached on account of the social character of the congregation. There is no reason whatever why, under the principles of Congregationalism, the members of any particular church should not regulate their own affairs without regard to the outside public; and, since they have to pay the annual cost of public worship, it is their business to adopt that plan of covering the expenses which best guarantees an adequate and permanent support, and which suitably provides accommodation for their families. To say that this is unsocial and undemocratic is to talk mischievous nonsense.

But, having done this, it may be fairly argued whether a church so constituted ought to stop at that point. Having satisfied the claims of its own people, if it is wise, it will provide one service on Sunday for the public, a service in which proprietorship and privilege are relinquished; and, wherever this is done, it ought to be done handsomely. In our efforts to be inclusive and to meet the demands of people who cannot be accommodated comfortably at our regular services, do what we will, there ought to be nothing that seems like patronage. The working classes whom we long to reach, because we believe that we have a gospel that will help them, are averse to condescension. They don't want any inferior seats in our churches any more than they want our churches built meanly for the poor, and conducted just as meanly. If we are to do anything for them, let us give them nothing short of our best, and let whatever is done be done out of our abundance, and not according to our necessities. Something of this kind has been attempted at Arlington Street Church, Boston. That is, as you know, a proprietary church. Its pews are all owned, and are all taken; and at the morning service visitors have to risk their chance of being accommodated with seats. If they will only wait a little while,—and there is no earthly reason why they shouldn't,—there is never much difficulty about seating them. The owners of pews, there as elsewhere, with very rare exceptions, are courteous and hospitable to strangers. No man, however poor, is judged by his poverty. A seat is found for him, and books; and, unless he carries pride in his own heart and morbidly broods over social disparities, nothing happens to him to discount the truth there that rich and poor meet together, and the Lord is the Maker of them all. But at the vesper services in the afternoon the entire church is given up to strangers, and a service is provided which in no respect falls behind that which is held for church members in the morning. It is not a service for the poor, and there is nothing poverty-stricken about it. It is a service for the masses; and of all the vast throng which gathers there from week to week, from October to the middle of May, not one man is made to feel that his self-respect is injured or that he is being patronized. If he wants to contribute something in return for his church privileges, he has an opportunity of doing so three or four times during the season, not, however, to the church itself, but to the various charities in which it is interested. It is true the church is comfortably furnished. Everything has been done which wealth and good taste can do to make it comfortable and attractive, but these ought to be helps more than hindrances. I rather pity the man who prefers to worship God in the open air or in some unattractive hall or Bethel, and who makes the material surroundings of a church a hindrance to Christian fellowship. He is surely poor material to work upon, and it is futile to attempt to conciliate him. Meet him on his own ground if you will, preach to him in public places and the slums, but do not permit his prejudice against decent and becoming surroundings to be cast as a reproach against the churches.

Then, further, it is alleged that the average minister and his message are out of date. We are told the churches are deserted because their services are not in touch with the intellectual and moral requirements of the age. The forms of worship are too stiff and ecclesiastical, and the preacher has seldom anything to say which is either new or true. The atmosphere of the church is mediæval, and the minister dwells too habitually upon thoughts and things which belong to antiquity. The non-attendant at church is nearly always a superior person. He is apt to be more or less of an intellectual Pharisee. And his sweeping indictment of the mental condition of the churches rests upon very inadequate data. It is true enough of some churches and of some ministers, but it is absolutely false and unjust as applied generally to churches and ministers. The churches of Christendom at the present day are full of modern thought, and are keenly alive to their duty in respect to the social and industrial problems of the hour, even though some of them do continue to employ forms of prayer sanctified by long use, and born in an age of faith and deep spiritual repose, in preference to the crude, hectic, rambling, and often unspiritual utterances of an age in which faith is feeble, and repose is the exception, and not the rule.

And, then, as to the ministers, they are not persons requiring much commiseration either as to what they are or what they do. And yet how much of it is condescendingly given to them! It is positively revolting to be compelled to listen to the supercilious, flippant criticism of the ministry from the lips of superior persons, who boast how seldom they enter a church, and from men of the world. One wonders where they have studied the clergy, and whether they have attended church long enough or taken a sufficiently creditable part in religious work, to be able to speak with confidence of men who not only stand valiantly for the best things in modern civilization, but who give their lives unselfishly to every humane and righteous cause. There are no set of men more democratic in their sympathies than the clergy of all denominations; and, when I try to recall the names of those who have contributed to the solution of the social, industrial, and economic problems of our age, not a few of them have been clergymen in active ministry or laymen who were once clergymen. A clergyman's first duty is, of course, to his parish. The work which is nearest to his heart is naturally that of which his church is the centre. He cannot leave the spot he is set to till, and the special task he was educated to perform, and which, if rightly attended to, will tax all his powers and monopolize the greater part of his time, and stump the country as social agitator or partisan politician. His education, not less than his commission, defines and fixes the orbit in which he must move. To reproach him for not doing more, or not doing something which he apparently elects not to do, is often as unreasonable as it is ungenerous. But it is said he is a man of leisure, and is moreover obsequious and the apologist of his wealthy supporters; and so the masses have little or nothing to expect from him. This is a misapprehension, coupled with a rather contemptible implication of cowardice. What the clergyman of a great city parish is called upon to do, whether that parish be rich or poor, is best known to himself. He knows much better than any outsider what is the responsibility, the care, the incessant toil of brain and heart, incidental to the effort to hold rich and poor, fervent and indifferent, loyal to the loftiest ideals and devoted to unselfish service and sacrifice. He knows all the demands which are involved in his pastoral duties and obligations, some of them easy and pleasant to the last degree, while others are a constant tax upon the nerves and heart. He knows how numerous are the calls upon his time and thought outside his parish and mainly in works of public charity; and the taunt so often levelled against him that on the whole he is more ornamental than useful is inconsiderate, flippant, and pointless. And as for the obsequious clergyman, truckling to the rich and neglectful of the poor, subservient and cowardly, in my long experience I have never met him; and I do not believe that he exists anywhere except in the prolific imagination of a wretched demagogue.

So far we have considered alleged obstacles to the power of churches over the masses, some of which are obviously not very serious. They are either unreasonable or trivial or unavoidable. Let us now probe this question a little deeper, and see whether there be not something in the quality of our customary worship, its tone and spirit and purpose, rather than in its forms and material environment, which accounts in no small degree, if not entirely, for not a little of the popular indifference to churches. Have we settled in our minds very definitely and clearly what is the normal function of a church? Is it not too true that the popular idea of the Church is, like the popular notion of Christianity, somewhat hazy and ill-defined? To many minds Christianity is everything, and everything is Christianity; and it would almost seem as if the religion of Jesus were reduced to the alternative of being a conglomerate of metaphysical theories and conflicting principles or a cloud of nebulous mist. Now it is spoken of as a general philosophy of religion, and is identified with speculations to which Jesus must have been an utter stranger; then it is held to be a cluster of rites and traditions in the custody of a privileged body of priests; here it is little more than higher criticism, and there nothing better than a code of ethical precepts.

The popular conception of the Church partakes of the same miscellaneous character. Sometimes it is set forth as a mere storehouse of ecclesiastical curios, old creeds, obsolete usages and customs. At other times it is either a platform for the discussion of all the problems in philosophy, science, and literature, or a bureau of charity. There can be little doubt, I think, that the nondescript and indefinite character of the Church militates against its popularity. We have not sufficiently emphasized the fact that the Church exists primarily and mainly to cultivate instincts and feelings and aspirations which ripen into character, and that, if it fail at this point, its failure is as disastrous as it is conspicuous. Our natures imperatively demand occasions for the exercise of religious emotion, for gratitude, reverence, contrition, sympathy, affection, opportunities for the growth of faculties which are as distinct from the reason and conscience as art is from logic or poetry from science; and for ages it has seemed to men that in the quiet of the sanctuary and the religious fellowship of kindred minds they found the conditions of worship not to be met with elsewhere or amid other surroundings, and so the true church has, and ought to have, a unique place in human regard. Its work is distinct, unrivalled. It is not that of the school or college or lecture lyceum or charity organization. It may, and it does, touch these at all points; but it exists to accomplish that which lies forever beyond their power. It is all the more necessary to emphasize this truth, because there is a strong tendency to think lightly of worship in itself, and a disposition to make the church purely educational and philanthropic, the centre of practical utilities rather than the temple of the religious imagination and the palace of the soul. But follow the movements of human history, examine the forces which have been most potent in the progress of humanity, and you will find that faith and worship have been the great factors in human civilization. Not brute force, nor material energy, not even intellectual prowess, but sympathy and affection, service and sacrifice, reverence and worship, have inspired the noblest pages of human history.

Do not misunderstand me, I have no desire to underestimate the value to the Church of scholarship and practical benevolence; but I want to state the plain, blunt fact that men and women owe more of what is highest and best in them to the church than to the college, to their prayers than to their possessions, to religious quickening than to fussy activity in any direction, to the preacher rather than to the essayist or lecturer. Turn where we will, to the silent, secret life of the individual, to the permanent well-being of the family, to the moral condition of the community, the energy that inspires and quickens is an impulse from within, a rich, full tide of invisible trust and affection, which can only arise in the heart of a religious man, and which meditation and prayer can alone create and sustain.

The thing I am contending for as lying within the special power of the Church is that rare something which constitutes the difference between life and creed, between sermon and essay, between the preacher and any other public teacher. Surely, the first object of religious services is to create an atmosphere which is stimulating and inspiring, which produces a conscious sense of communion with God and a conviction of life's infinite and spiritual relations. We do not ask whether worship is useful or instructive, but whether it brings the devotee into helpful and uplifting relations with the object of all worship, the source of all power, the God of all comfort. In

WOULD YOU HAVE THE HANDSOMEST

GLOVES?

THEN WEAR ONLY THE

GENUINE DUCHESS,

Which come in all the popular styles, dressed and undressed Kid, button and Foster lace, long and short wrists,

And cost no more than other makes.

CALL AND INSPECT, OR SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

All Gloves fitted when desired, and every pair warranted.

CHANDLER & CO.,

SOLE AGENTS,
WINTER ST., BOSTON.

Agency Dr. Jaeger Sanitary Woollen System.

other words, it is the special function and privilege of the Church to do for the average man and woman what Nature does in the summer, though in a different and perhaps less adequate way. In the sunny season of the year we abandon ourselves without reserve to the Infinite Spirit of the earth and sky. Our life with Nature is not so much a study as a delight. We look into the star-lit heavens with eyes of wonder and divine surprise. We gaze long and often upon the vast ocean, in storm and calm, thinking far less of its utilities and the vast commerce which rides upon its waves than of the Deity who, without weariness and without rest, holds its countless drops in the hollow of his hand. We ramble through the woods, and are contented to be hushed by their solemn stillness and awed by their shadows. We gather wild flowers in the dells and meadows, not as botanists, but simply as lovers of the fragrant and beautiful creations of a mind that seems to riot in its own splendor. We allow the Spirit of the Universe to have its way with us, and yield ourselves to what Wordsworth calls "a wise passiveness." Now it seems to me that the church and its services should be made to facilitate some measure of the same abandonment and communion. It ought to be the function of the written and spoken word, of the prayer and hymn, of the music and sermon, to kindle in a degree the rapture which glows in the face of Nature,—nay, to awaken emotions which Nature has no power to disturb. This is what the busy, crowded masses need: not simply instruction, which they can obtain in better form through a hundred channels outside the Church; not dreary homilies, which too frequently only deaden still further the moral sensibilities; not musical pyrotechnics, which encourage criticism rather than devotion; not a dull and cheerless treatment of secular topics, with which they are only too familiar in the monthly magazine and the daily press, but a devotional service which from its opening to its close lifts them for a brief space into unclouded regions of trust and hope, and gives them relief from their burdens of care and solace and healing for their sorrows. Call this sentiment, if you will, but don't forget that in religion, while thought may be necessary, feeling is indispensable; and the mass of people gather more benefit from strong and elevated emotion than from any purely intellectual exercise of which they are capable.

But it may be asked, Has the Church nothing more to do than to create religious ecstasy? Has it no other function than to kindle feeling? Well, if it can do that, and do it as it ought to be done, I venture to think that its power would be greatly augmented and its influence for good extended. We cannot afford to think lightly of services which, though they produce no tangible or material results, go right to the centre of life, as nothing else does. We cannot measure the services of the Church by any mere utilitarian standard. Their best results are wrought where measurement is impossible. But why apply our prosy, matter-of-fact tests to religion? We do not apply them to art or music or poetry. When we enter a gallery of great pictures, and are stirred by the form and beauty of the artist's creating, we do not stop to gauge the exact worth of our emotions, and wonder whether there is any utility in beauty. We simply yield ourselves to the inspiring sight, and then let it have its way with us. When we listen to the strains of Handel or Mozart or Beethoven, we do not drop into a mood of prosaic questioning as to whether music produces results in us adequate to the time and money we give to it. No, we simply drink in the divine harmonies, and open every ear of the mind, that we may catch the sublime strains and enjoy the rapture of sounds we cannot hear too often, and with which we cannot be too familiar. When we read a great poem, and come under the spell of a mighty imagination, we no more think of dissecting it than we think of separating the colors of the rainbow or analyzing the hues of black and gold which glorify the dying hours of an autumn day. So it is with religion. It is enough that it inspires, quickens, soothes, and sanctifies, and by going to the springs of human feeling controls all the currents of being and of action; and he who is able to open the fountains of strong and pure religious emotion to any extent need not envy any man his power for good.

But there is where our difficulty lies; there, if anywhere, is the secret of our spiritual impotency. It is no great task to wrestle with men's doubts, to grapple more or less successfully with the crucial problems of theology, politics, and social life, to enter into the arena of fierce controversy, and fight like gladiators against the champions of conflicting creeds, or to create by some theatrical device a passing sensation that will draw the crowd. But to make men feel the reality of God instead of merely discussing him with them; to kindle their love for Christ until they give their hearts to him, instead of confusing and perplexing them with speculative Christologies; to present the virtues in such guise that they win men by their beauty and simplicity instead of telling the twice-told tale of the theory of ethics; to convince them that this life, despite its cares and sorrows and sore disappointments, is essentially beautiful, and may be made increasingly so, and that the life to come is more than a shining possibility, is, in fact, "an everlasting day of perfect knowledge unbroken by a shadowing cloud or a deepening twilight," that is a nobler and more difficult task, and one which taxes all the powers.

I have not by any means exhausted the long list of apologies for neglect of religious fellowship. It would be impossible to do so, for human ingenuity has never been so sorely tried in anything as in finding plausible excuses for not going to church. Their name is legion. Every minister encounters them daily whenever he tries to quicken the sense of duty among the lax members of his flock. But I have tried to dispel some of the most powerful prejudices against the Church, and to correct some hurtful misrepresentations. The Church is fallible. It makes mistakes, and often sins against its best interests; and it is common enough for non-church goers, of a certain calibre, to assume that light and liberty and progress are with them, and not with the churches. But, while the Church may at times be slow in its movements and conservative as to change, it is, nevertheless, in close touch with the rising tides of knowledge and of duty. It is still what it ever has been,—a beacon-light amid the gloom. It is the inspirer of the best living reforms and the generous supporter of every just and humane movement. The strength of the best manhood and womanhood of our time is still consecrated to its service; and, although beset and frequently hindered by prejudice and misjudgment, it is doing more than all other institutions put together to make and keep the world in which we live a safe and healthy place for human souls to dwell in.

OUR CONGREGATIONAL POLITY.

BY REV. F. L. HOSMER.

Our Congregational polity, as a fellowship of churches, is an inheritance. To understand it, therefore, involves some historical retrospect; and to this I shall devote a part of my paper. I shall then consider some practical bearings of the subject upon the individual church among us and upon our associated action as a fellowship of churches.

But may I first say a word as to the importance of the subject to our portion of the Israel of God at this time? By many outside and by not a few inside our fellowship, our polity is imperfectly understood. We are looked upon not simply as a denomination, which I suppose we are, but as a sect, which from the beginning we have in the main striven not to be, and which the most honored of the fathers, whether radicals or conservatives in theological belief, have alike disclaimed. Not long ago a gentleman standing among the foremost of his profession in one of our largest Western cities asked me in regard to the position of the individual church in the Unitarian fellowship and the degree of authority exercised by the latter over it; and, though I found his impressions correct, yet he needed to have them confirmed. And a little longer ago a woman of unusual intelligence spoke to me of her special interest in a sermon which her minister had then recently preached upon the beginnings and growth of the Congregational polity in New England and the Unitarian inheritance therein, giving her, as she said, a clearer idea of the whole subject than she before had. And just now especially, amid the awakening of a freer spirit which is our opportunity, and when the idea of a church of the people is proclaimed as if it were the creation of to-day, and Scrooby and Southwark and Leyden and Plymouth were not historic names, we need to make very clear and to emphasize the free Congregationalism which is our inheritance, and the palladium of our fellowship amid the diversity of thought and method that mark the religious movements of the hour.

Our inheritance, I have said, of this free congregational polity, but not ours alone. We share it with some others. If we go back to the primitive churches, then it is the early inheritance of Christendom, though great branches therein have left it behind under the strong influences of political association and ideals. At no time, however, in all the centuries of Christian history have the spirit and methods of those first communities been wholly lost. The fresh study of them and return to them have marked revivals of personal religion and the inflow of new forces at many a point. But the particular illustration of most interest to us in this present connection is to be found in that little congregation gathering within the house of William Brewster at Scrooby, England, in 1603.

The separation of England from Rome had served to give freer play to the religious questioning and the growing national hopes and ideals of the people. There were many who desired to see the old ecclesiastical order maintained with no more than a change in name. Others would retain Episcopacy, but with a larger measure of individual freedom in matters of ritual. There were others, including many of the best minds in the realm, who held no less strongly to the idea of a national church, but who would fashion that church after the Genevan pattern. Of these were the Puritans. But within this Puritan party there arose still another party of men who despaired of a church under whatever control of the secular power. They felt that religion must begin with the individual and groups of individuals, and thus create the Church; that no State could create a church or have proper authority over its matters of ritual and doctrine. Very naturally, these people came to regard any acceptance of or identification with the national church as in itself wrong. They became known as "Separatists" or Independents. Sir Walter Raleigh in 1593 estimated that there were then twenty thousand of these in England,—not a great many in proportion to the whole people, but men on fire with their convictions, and who already were anticipating in their way that entire separation of Church and State and the grounds thereof which are the commonplace of to-day's thought in this country.

Of these Independents was that little congregation meeting at Scrooby manor. It is one more illustration of which the more intimate study of history shows us so many, of good coming out of the Nazareths. For this was a rural district; and here it would seem, as on a nearer and more familiar occasion, were for the most part "embattled farmers," whose shot, at first of little report, came to be "heard round the world." It was these men of whom Bradford wrote: "They shook off this yoke of antichristian bondage, and, as the Lord's free people, joined themselves by a covenant of the Lord into a church estate, in the fellowship of the gospel, to walk in all his ways made known or to be made known unto them, according to their best endeavors, whatever it should cost them." Of the vicissitudes experienced by this first free Congregational church within modern times, the persecutions suffered at home, the sojourn in Leyden as in a strange though friendly land, the brave hope of better carrying out their ideals on the New World's virgin soil, the embarkation and the memorable words of Pastor Robinson at parting, the landing at "New" Plymouth and the beginnings of that settlement so pregnant with after results, there is no need to speak here in detail. But this is to be borne in mind, that these people were Puritans of the Puritans, disbelievers in a national church of any sort, and who had given up all dreams of such a fulfilment, whether under out-and-out prelacy or its cheap imitation and thin disguise.

We have now to turn to the beginnings of one other New England colony, which, together with that of Plymouth, was to shape the religious and civil polity of that portion of this new shore, and thereby very materially the subsequent history of the whole country. The story is interestingly given in Dr. Bacon's "Genesis of the New England Churches." It shows us how streams that could not become one in the Old England came together in the changed conditions of the New, and formed one strong and widening river. I refer, of course, to the settlement of Salem under the direction of the Massachusetts Company (London) in 1628. Under this company there landed at Salem in August of that year some forty persons with captain (afterward governor) John Endicott. They were not Independents. On the contrary, they viewed the Plymouth colonists and their ilk at home as schismatics, while they themselves still held to a national church, which they hoped to see completely reformed. In this connection is an incident with a moral that loses none of its force by lapse of time. Other persons, classed as "servants," had come out to the colony either with Endicott or soon after; and the supply of food and shelter was wholly inadequate for so many. Several died, and more sickened. In this dire strait Endicott sent to the Plymouth colony for a physician, of whose skill in curing "divers of the scurvy and other diseases" he had heard. When this Dr. Fuller took his departure from Salem, he left Endicott and the Salem folk with very much modified opinions of the views and practices of the older colony, to which Endicott's frank and grateful letter afterward to Gov. Bradford bears witness. Thus already the supposed gulf between the two settlements was beginning to be bridged over. Common needs and mutual service are a great solvent of ecclesiastical differences. In May of the next year (1629) another expedition was fitted out for the Salem colony by the Home Company, now newly incorporated under a Dangerous Re-action.

★ After Summer's Heat

the entire system has more or less of a struggle to fortify itself for the cold of the coming winter. In cases where the body has become over-exhausted by the prostrating effects of the past warm weather, an inability to cope with the change is experienced. Loss of appetite, weight, sleep, or strength are dangerous symptoms that foretell coming troubles.

Bovine

that wonderful promoter of strength and creator of new flesh and blood, should be taken without delay. It will ward off the coming cold or fever that is the cause of such great mortality during the winter months. It is not a medicine, but a powerful food, concentrated in the least possible bulk. Endorsed by physicians the world over.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

charter from the king. In a list of necessities to be provided the first item is "ministers." (Bacon's "Genesis," etc., p. 458.) The care with which these ministers were selected is matter of much interest to us, and throws light upon the religious aspects of the settlement and the sympathies and aims of those composing the company that projected it. These ministers were not to be of the Independent sort, who had broken with the idea of a national church, but such as should establish in the New England the Church of the Old, purged from those errors of ritual and doctrine which seemed impossible of reformation under king and parliament. The men finally selected were Francis Higginson, Samuel Skelton, and Francis Bright; and these sailed each in one of the three ships of the expedition. The words attributed to Higginson as the shores of England faded from sight may be supposed to voice the views of all three, and certainly they speak for his tenderness of heart. "We will not say, as the Separatists are wont to say at their leaving of England, 'Farewell, Babylon! farewell, Rome!' but we will say, Farewell, dear England, farewell, the Church of God in England and all the Christian friends there. We do not go to New England as Separatists from the Church of England, though we cannot but separate from the corruptions in it; but we go to practise the positive part of church reformation and propagate the gospel in America."

It seems a striking instance of coming events casting their shadows before that in this expedition, and apportioned to the same ship with Higginson, was one Ralph Smith, an out-and-out Separatist minister, and who later came to be pastor of the church at Plymouth. There was much misgiving on the company's part when they learned about this man; but his goods were on board, and they did not refuse him passage at the last hour, though they deemed it proper to write to Gov. Endicott a word of warning in regard to him, and he was expressly enjoined from exercising his ministry within the company's jurisdiction. In view of all this solicitude in the selection of these ministers, the events following their arrival at Salem are most noteworthy, and show the forces already at work on this New World soil.

Though these ministers were sent out to the new colony by the men who had projected it, and in answer to the colony's need, yet this seemed not of itself to constitute them rightful shepherds of the little wilderness flock. The people themselves were to have something to say and to do. Accordingly, a day was solemnly set apart by Endicott, whereon Higginson and Skelton, after some statements made by them in regard to their views of the ministerial office and the call thereto, were duly elected, the one as teacher, and the other as pastor. But this action was deemed incomplete, for election was not ordination; and, though both these men had received ordination in the Church of England, yet this fact was not interpreted as investing them with authority to exercise their office in the new community across the sea. Accordingly, as we learn from a contemporary letter to Gov. Bradford, "they accepting the choice, Mr. Higginson and three or four of the gravest members of the church laid their hands on Mr. Skelton, using prayers therewith. This being done, then there was an imposition of hands on Mr. Higginson." (Bacon's "Genesis," p. 473.) Not much of reluctance in this surely, but a most signal recognition of authority in the people, whose forecast and full reach could hardly have been realized at the time. But what is yet more significant, when it came to the choice of deacons and elders, there was pressed upon the attention of these people the fact that there had been no clear determination who had the right to exercise this suffrage. Evidently, the church must exist before it could officer itself. Who constituted that church? This was a leading question. It led then and there to the organization of a church, with some thirty persons selected as charter members; and thereupon not only were deacons and elders duly chosen, but even Mr. Higginson and Mr. Skelton were again ordained, that there might be no question as to their authority and its sufficient source. Thus these people who had held aloof from independency, and had cherished the hope and ideal of a reformed national church, were making the principles of free Congregationalism the corner-stone of that first church to be organized in New England; for the Plymouth Church, bear in mind, was already organized before the Pilgrims landed on this shore. The national Puritan had unconsciously gone over in practice to the principles of the Independent. The task in hand was not to re-form, but to form a church; and he did it in the simplest and most natural way,—the way in which those earliest Christian churches were formed as Paul preached from city to city. This event Dr. Bacon significantly calls "the beginning of a distinctively American church history."

In this connection is a pleasing incident, which illustrates the principle of fellowship under this free Congregational polity. There were on their way to this Salem ordination representatives from the church at Plymouth, with Gov. Bradford at their head; but, by reason of a stormy voyage across the bay, they did not arrive until the day's work was nearly over. But their presence had not been judged necessary to the proper conduct of the occasion. They heard, however, what had been done, gave approval, and extended the good will and fellowship of the church which they represented. "The church that had been brought over the ocean," says Dr. Bacon, "now saw another church, the first-born in America, holding the same faith in the same simplicity of self-government under Christ alone. . . . Robinson had not lived to see that day; but he had foreseen it, and his prophecy was fulfilled. 'For,' said he, 'there will be no difference between the conforming ministers and you when they come to the practice of the ordinances out of the kingdom.'"

I have reviewed at this length these historical facts, though so familiar to many in my audience, because apart from them the spirit and principles of New England Congregationalism cannot be understood. But I need follow this history no farther in detail. The impulse and direction were already given, and what came after was only development in accord therewith. As the settlements increased along Massachusetts Bay and inland, new churches were organized on the same general principles as those of Plymouth and Salem. As these churches multiplied, there was mutual recognition and the sense of a common faith. But that faith was not turned into a covenant of doctrinal creed. Those earlier covenants were affirmative rather of life purpose. The grasp of those sturdy pioneers was upon principles far more than upon theological particulars in their church bonds. The prevailing theology, as we all know, was Calvinism, as it was the theology of the dominant forces of Protestantism at the time; but that frequent and excellent phrase in their covenants as to obeying the truth "made known or to be made known to us" still throbbed with the spirit of Pastor Robinson's parting words. And in the extension of these churches, with the fellowship recognized among them, the independence of each individual church was stoutly maintained. Councils there were, called on occasion of an ordination or of some serious division or difficulty arising in a particular church; but these councils had simply advisory power, acted only by the delegated authority of the church in question, and ceased to exist when their advice was given or office performed. It would be easy to quote authorities to this effect all along the way. To be sure, one church might withdraw fellowship from another for supposedly good reason. This is involved in the fact of its independence. But this is not to be construed as any exercise of authority over such church. As matter of fact, such withdrawals were very rare for a century and more, when the bitterness of theological controversy began to blind men to the larger unities of faith, and culminated in the banded exclusion of the Unitarian portion of the Congregational churches of New England, at the opening of the present century. That these earlier churches were broad in their theological sympathies or tolerant of opposing doctrines none would affirm. An intelligent toleration was not the possession of that age. But with reference to their Congregational polity there is, in the main, no question. There have been at times influences at work to infringe that polity and to presbyterianize the churches; but they have never succeeded on any wide scale or for any long period. The "consociations" that flourished in Connecticut could not stand the climate of Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay.

Of the results of that early church-planting on the shores of New England, both on the religious and the political side of our national history, there is here no time to speak; nor is there need. But none can study those results without recognizing the commanding power of that free Congregational polity which the Pilgrims established. It has given wider welcome and play to the new moral and intellectual forces of each age, and has furnished many a forlorn hope in the onward march of the Church at large.

In this historical line we, as a fellowship of churches, stand. To-day those two churches of Plymouth and Salem, which shaped the Congregational polity of New England, are in the Unitarian fellowship. We are wont to think that we stand more directly in that line than our cousins of the Trinitarian wing, that we have stood more loyally even than they by that principle of the independence of the local church. Whatever we may have lost thereby in organization has been gained in the freer course of such message as our churches have had to give.

The widening recognition of those principles and main beliefs underlying the Unitarian movement has been beyond all proportion to the organic increase of the churches within that movement. But "let him that standeth take heed lest he fall" is good Scripture, and may here have some bearings pertinent to our own case. If any have confidence in this flesh of good traditions, we more. But of this we are not wont to need reminding. Self-depreciation in this matter was never our chief defect. Self-inquiry is far better for us than self-content. For it is possible to preserve the letter, and yet lose the spirit which was its life. No form of church polity works itself or has inherent efficacy to create and sustain a church or a fellowship of churches. It is but a method to an end.

Behind it must be the working power in the live interest and conviction of the men and women who use it. And here, it seems to me, some things are pertinent to be said in this gathering. It may fairly be questioned whether some of our churches are not less Congregational in spirit and in practice than many others under a system theoretically less free and democratic; whether there really be, in not a few of them, that practical faith in the people which is the root of all popular government, whether in State or Church.

It has often seemed to me that our earlier social and intellectual traditions have worked to our limitation as well as to our enlargement, and have kept us from that measure of outward growth with the people which our theoretical teaching would seem fitted to secure. There has been lack of that robust assimilating force which can work on new material, though it come in rather raw and crude shape, and make it supply the natural waste of changes incident to every community. It is to be feared that with too many among us there is more joy over one evangelical believer of good standing who repenteth than over the ingathering of ninety-and-nine obscure people outside all folds.

But I am sure Paul never would have taken more satisfaction over the conversion of one worthy Jew than over that of a dozen Gentiles, even though these were slaves in Cæsar's household; and in our time and country, vastly more than in the Greece and Rome of Paul's time, the humblest of to-day may become the strength of to-morrow. I wish our Unitarian churches were more alive to this fact. No, friends: the sources of our weakness are not where we best like to imagine them. They lie in no small part in what I have here intimated,—in a certain social and intellectual daintiness and fastidiousness in practice which do not match with our theoretical beliefs, and which no mere resolutions of love to man are to cure us of, but only a new baptism of the Spirit. I speak plainly, for the disease is deep. Upon its cure depends the issue whether we lead the liberal forces in the measure possible to us in the next quarter-century or give place to new movements that will supersede us if we do not. Not long ago the minister of one of our churches remarked in my presence that he did not see how his church was going to survive the losses it had met by death and removals; for, said he, there are not people enough in the town qualified to maintain a Unitarian church. Yet there was a population fourfold that of the town where his church was founded a generation ago. If we have a gospel so fearfully sublimated as his remark would imply, all I have to say is this: that, if it goes utterly under, it will only be by the great law of the survival of the fittest. And the lack of a real confidence in the people,—yes, the "common people," such as heard Jesus gladly, we are told,—shown in this unconscious, intellectual Pharisaism, is matched by like lack of faith shown in the social life and the general management of too many of our churches. With perhaps the best intentions, often with no intentions, good or bad, but by mere drift and lack of life, our Congregational polity comes to be such only in name.

Of one of our old "first" churches in a New England town a friend not long ago told me that at the annual business meeting there were present only seven men, and these, for the most part, men of wealth from the near city, to whom the church was a social club rather than a source of spiritual life to the community. Yet a generation ago that church gathered a large congregation, mainly of the sturdy middle class; and the population of the town is now thrice what it was then. I was credibly informed recently of one of our churches, not in New England,—a church of large wealth and representative of what I suppose would be called "best society,"—whose board of trustees is practically a close corporation, from time to time filling its own vacancies when vacancies occur: while in many of our churches, I suspect, there is as little rotation in office, either for the recognition and better representation of new elements or for the training of young men and women to stand in the fathers' and mothers' places, as if a like practice prevailed. It really makes little difference when a church is practically run by the same set from year to year, and the safety and standing of the society come to be thought dependent upon their official tenure, whether they are called presbyters or wardens or what not. The vitality of Congregationalism passes, touch with the people is lost, and the future of the church can be prophesied. Yet once more: I may in-

JOEL GOLDTHWAIT & CO.

Have placed their wholesale stock on their retail floors, and for the next thirty days will show some great bargains in

WILTONS, BRUSSELS, TAPESTRY, AND INGRAIN CARPETS.

We have a large stock which must be moved before the close of the year. Prices were never so low as now.

163 to 169 WASHINGTON STREET,
NEAR CORNHILL.

stance another church, of which I was informed during the past year that in its management, whether in determining its covenant or electing its officers or in any other matter, by the articles of organization each member had as many votes as he paid for sittings. Thus, for example, the man able to rent a whole pew could cast five votes, though he might seldom come to church; while his neighbor, who paid for one sitting, had but one vote, though he might teach in the Sunday-school, be active in church work, and a constant attendant on the Sunday. Do we not need a revival of Congregationalism among us, of the thing itself, to make good the name we claim? Say all that may be said in explanation or excuse of such instances as I have cited; yet, when all is said, it remains none the less true that the only way to have a true Congregational church is to recognize the whole congregation, to assimilate constantly new material, though it be "raw" material, to develop interest by enlisting interest, and to bring out hidden strengths and possibilities by the widest distribution of responsibilities and trusts.

And now one word more as to our associated action. There are those among us who are wont to speak of the Unitarian Church,—with a big C. And there are those to-day for whom the Unitarian fellowship seems too small a patch, and who talk to us of the Liberal Church,—also with a big C. But both phrases imply an ecclesiasticism that does not and cannot exist. In view of the historical retrospect we have taken, there manifestly can be, properly speaking, no Congregational church with that big C, whether Trinitarian or Unitarian, though Congregational churches there have long been, are now, and, I trust, will be to the end of the world. It is the failure to recognize this vital distinction that has led us as a fellowship into all our bogs, from which, happily, we seem now to be getting out upon solid ground and with an open country before. Our so-called "battle of Syracuse" and all that has followed therefrom in this National Conference since, our Year Book controversy, and the more recent action and policy of the American Unitarian Association toward the Western Conference—soon, I hope and trust, to be righted in re-established relations of co-operation and mutual good will,—have all had their origin here. We are not a Church, but a fellowship of churches. We can say our word, we can bear our testimony in conference assembled touching any wrong in the body social or politic, or proclaim the things commonly believed among us; and I, for one, believe in bearing such testimony and proclaiming such beliefs. But it must always be done with the distinct understanding that such utterance is the expression of the time and of the majority only, and that the rights of the minority in the matter are carefully observed. Our mistake, in my judgment, has never lain in bearing such testimony. What else are we for, as organizations charged with communicating light and bettering the moral and spiritual life of society? Are we to cover our candle with a bushel, and wait for people to come and peak under it? We have never yet done enough of this testifying. We have been too timid and too little assertive. No, our mistake rather has lain in trying to do this, not as a fellowship of Unitarian churches, but as The Unitarian Church. In this we have handicapped ourselves.

There is among us as a fellowship of free churches, as Mr. Savage in the opening sermon of last evening so eloquently set forth, a body of truth held in common which is the very gospel the people are waiting to hear proclaimed with conviction and power. I truly believe that there is in our uncreed fellowship less divergence between its extremes than exists to-day in any of the great communions that subscribe a common creed. O friends, let us rejoice anew in that free polity which is our high inheritance. Let us be steadfastly true to it, guarding always the freedom of the minority in our associated action and word. And let us go forth from these meetings, not in an attempted unity of the letter, which can never be ours, but in a renewed unity of the spirit to the work to which we are called. And, as with the fathers, so be God with us!

Discussion by Rev. S. B. Calthrop.

Three great peoples type the world's civilization and progress. Their successes and their failures teach us yet in almost every human direction; and very especially they emphasize in much of their experience the magnificent success of the Congregational polity, and also its sometimes almost inexplicable weakness.

The Hebrew was the seer of the ancient world. He saw things without argument, by direct insight. He uttered the deepest philosophy without knowing that it was philosophy. To him it was almost always adoration. He saw the facts and laws of the world as you and I see the sunlight, by looking up; and, when the genius of his race culminated in Jesus, through his lips it uttered laws for all time. Freedom of prophecy was the Hebrew key-note. They have set the key to that which is noblest and best in every one of us independent ministers. But the Hebrew had the defects of his qualities. The Hebrew never saw things in the clear light of the mind. He always saw them tinged with emotion. He had then two great faults. In the first place he never could argue straight. Did you ever think of it, there is not one argument in the whole Old Testament. There is no argument in the New Testament, except Paul's; and he always argues wrong. He always advances from erroneous and sometimes perfectly absurd premises to magnificent conclusions. The second fault was that the Hebrews never could combine. Judah always envied Ephraim, and Ephraim always vexed Judah. The genius of David for one brief moment held Israel together; but, the moment the hand of genius was taken off, Israel as a nation went to pieces. It was a series of selfish, self-seeking little tribes. At the siege of Jerusalem three sects, mutually hating each other as they hated the Romans, defended the city with no concert of action. So for these two things, however, to look at things in the clear light of the mind and capacity to organize men, the Hebrew can teach us nothing. We have got to learn about organization elsewhere.

When we turn to the Greek, he has one great thing the Hebrew lacked. He is the scientific thinker. Before the scientific methods of modern times were born, the Greek had the scientific mind. When Aristotle argues, if you don't agree with him, you had better quote 1st Corinthians against him; for otherwise he will take you along with him. The Greek had the true philosophic and scientific insight. He was able to take a thing and merely look at it, and say to himself exactly how it looked. When the word of Jesus got into Greek hands, then there was a blossoming out of the human mind very much like the blossoming out in our own community. They had, as we have, perfectly free minds to study the Old Testament anew, and to study with it Christianity, Greek philosophy, poetry, or science. Clement of Alexandria and Origen lectured, to-day on Plato, to-morrow on the Fourth Gospel, on Wednesday upon, let us say, the first of Corinthians, on Friday on Aristotle, to the same audiences. They felt that, as God had led men by the prophets in Hebrew times, in Greek times he led them by the philosophers. And so you have the same beautiful blossoming out of the individual mind that you and I have seen in our own times in such men as Emerson.

Now let us study the history of Greece with reference to our Congregational polity. Greece was a system of warring tribes from end to end. Athens vexed Sparta, and Sparta vexed Thebes, and Thebes pitched in whenever it saw a chance, and so on from end to end of the chapter. So the most wonderful creation of God—the power of nation-making—could not be achieved by either. Consequently, we have to look for this power of organization elsewhere. Hebrew and Greek can teach us nothing. Now in comes the Roman. He took the Hebrew inspiration, and believed it literally the word of God from end to end, and made the most abominable hash of it we can conceive. Augustine makes all men solid in Adam, Clement made all men solid in Christ. There is the difference. Clement had an eternal hope; and he felt that God was God, the instructor of the world, leading all men to himself. Augustine saw the world lost in Adam, and no help except in the ark of the Church. The Romans took hold of the highest inspiration of the Hebrew. They took Greek philosophy and Greek science, and added no word of insight to either. They discovered no new plant, they dissected no new animal, they added not one thing to what Dioscorides had said on botany or Aristotle on animals. They took astronomical science from Hipparchus, and added no single observation. They never added a word to what Plato and Aristotle had given in abstract philosophy. They spoiled the philosophy of Greece. And so you feel as if they hurt philosophy and science and religion irretrievably.

But wait a moment. We have got to have nation-making.

Aristotle quotes three hundred and thirty constitutions that the Greeks had made: Rome made one. Three hundred and thirty constitutions went by the board, but Rome's one ruled all nations with a rod of iron.

Now, the early Church had the priceless Hebrew and the priceless Greek contributions; but it needed Roman organization, and it got it. Bishops and presbyters and deacons were appointed. Wherever there was a Roman prefect, there the Church set up a bishop; wherever there was a proconsul, the Church set up an archbishop; and, where there was an empire, the Church set up an Archbishop of archbishops. They imitated the Roman organization with the most minute particularity, and with that they conquered the world. They turned the barbaric desert into a civilized garden.

Now, it is exactly here that we touch upon the frightful weakness of our own work. We are too apt to be complacent. I agree with almost everything that Mr. Hosmer has said, except this one thing in which he will not agree with me. Episcopacy is a divine institution because it is a natural one, and it comes up inevitably in every large society of men. In 1851 I went to Niagara from New York, and in doing that I had to go by six or eight different lines. Then it occurred to somebody that that was a terrible expense. So somebody organized the New York Central; and, instead of having so many lines, they have one great organization, and they have elected Chauncey M. Depew as the archbishop of the New York Central Railroad. That is to say, he looks at the concern as a whole; and Mr. Webb of the Transportation Department is the bishop or prefect, as you like. Names are nothing.

I am in Syracuse, and in winter my hands are terribly full. I cannot see to the needs of Homer and Canastota and Oneida and other places. I have no time. But here's my dear old friend, Bishop Huntington, close by; and it is his business to see the needs of all these places. He has time for it: he is there for the purpose. If we mean to do our duty toward God's new America, we've got to do the same thing. We are just beginning to elect our bishops. We don't like the term, and so we call them secretaries or writers. "My tongue is the pen of a ready 'Secretary'!" But we have got to have the thing, and multiply it as the fields enlarge. Somebody has got to be responsible one day for New York State alone. There is more work in New York now than one man can do. Here is our dear Wendte, the bishop of the North-west,—how wide this man's work is! And I know dear old Morehouse's work. I am his faithful servant. Where he orders me to go, I go, because he is my ecclesiastical superior. I trace his modest work everywhere. You had Moors in New England, whom the heavens have claimed, and the beloved Wilson, who has just been promoted. You must multiply these men, or your Congregational polity isn't worth a cent, there is no policy in it, anyway.

With our policy we have perfect freedom. I stand Sunday after Sunday in amazement in my own pulpit. I know that the people want my exact thought, that I should keep nothing back. Our Congregational polity, our freedom, is something that has never been enjoyed from Clement of Alexandria until now. I rejoice that I am a part of it, and I want to strengthen it.

And now the women are going to teach us a good deal. You will find that they have an archbishopsess and a bishopsess and lots of deaconesses; and they are doing such wonderful work that I heard of some forty odd thousand dollars raised by the Alliance this last year, and I heard that they raised a good deal of it by selling doughnuts.

This, then, is my word; and I beg and pray, if you want success and lasting success, to hear, mark, and learn the words of wisdom which the Lord has spoken through my lips this afternoon. [Laughter and applause.]

CHURCH EXTENSION.

BY REV. D. W. MOREHOUSE, SUPERINTENDENT FOR THE MIDDLE STATES AND CANADA.

One of the surest indications of a growing interest in our church extension work is the criticism to which our missionary policy is beginning to be subjected. A few years ago the indifference with reference to this policy was so great that one never heard a word of criticism about it from one year's end to the other. But that period of quiet satisfaction has passed by. Now everybody is asking questions and finding fault with our missionary organizations and their officers for what the critics regard as the meagre results accomplished. Some of this criticism is wise and helpful, some of it is foolish and hurtful; but it all indicates a deepening interest in our missionary work, and is on that account to be welcomed as a hopeful sign of better things to come.

I think it is well, therefore, that the critics are finding fault, and complaining that the expenditure on missionary work, judged by the net result achieved, seems wasteful. The truthfulness or falseness of this complaint matters little, provided the mere fact that it is made will lead to a more careful and intelligent study of our missionary problems, to the end that better missionary policies may be devised and made to yield more satisfactory results in the future.

That our methods have been, and still are, faulty, I think no one will deny; nor will any one deny that to these faulty methods are to be attributed many of our failures. In their origin these methods were adapted to very different conditions from those which now exist. For a long time we were content to be merely seed-sowers. Then to this period there suc-

A Rich Table.

"Table" is a word easily spoken and quickly forgotten, leaving no impression but that of a common piece of furniture. But we have here something that will make you remember the word "table" all your life, and treat it with much more respect hereafter.

The engraving gives no hint of what you see in furniture as you stand in its presence. It is a poem in mahogany. The entire treatment is new and unique.

A heavy slab of veined Spanish Mahogany, sloping away on its edges into a four-inch carved border. A deep box frame, with raised panel drawers and hand-carved heads and masks on the corners and solid sections.

The legs are superbly carved, with full claw feet in bold relief. It is not too much to say that you never saw a table like this before. So effective is the design that we are building a few in oak. They cost very little.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

ceeded one of a hit-or-miss kind of constructive work. Once in a while a man with ability as an organizer would take in hand some field where the conditions were all ripe for a constructive movement; and the result would be the organization of a church which in a short time would become self-supporting. But, for every case of this kind, our history will show several where the right man has prematurely attempted to organize in a community not yet fully prepared, or the wrong man has entered a field white for the harvest, and, in his unfitness for the work of ingathering, has spoiled and wasted the harvest. In either case the result was failure, and the failure prejudiced our chances in that field and its neighborhood for years to come.

But all these phases of our experience in dealing with our missionary problems have been profitable to us. What we needed was knowledge to guide us, and this knowledge we have had to gain by our own experience. The experience of other missionary organizations can throw but little light on our problems for the reason that other bodies pursue their church extension work under entirely different conditions from those which confront us. The masses are familiar with their doctrines and aims. Moreover, they have the advantage of having on their side a great popular sympathy and support,—conditions which are attended with social considerations which have a determining weight with a great many people. We, on the other hand, have to begin by making our doctrines and our religious ideals known in communities where the sentiment created by the already established churches is hostile to us, and where the dominant social forces are employed to our disadvantage.

Still another point in their favor which the large, popular churches have over us is found in the fact that, with their great numbers and large resources, they can go into newly started suburban towns, as well as into frontier communities, and establish mission stations and maintain them until the increase of population assures their success. We, on the contrary, on account of our meagre resources, are obliged to wait until there is a large population to work upon. But, long before that time arrives, the church relations of the great majority of the people are fixed and their social ties formed within the existing churches. Under these circumstances it is by no means an easy matter to secure the support and co-operation of those thus attached to other churches, even though they acknowledge themselves to be of our faith.

In view of these facts it must be apparent that the means and methods which would make the establishment of an evangelical church an easy matter would be altogether inadequate to establish in the same community a church of our liberal faith.

But can we devise and employ means and methods which shall be equal to all the necessities of the case? Can we discover or create a missionary policy which shall be uniformly successful? After ten years of experimental work under departmental superintendents, it would seem as if the missionary field and its possibilities, and the conditions under which these possibilities can be successfully turned into missionary results, ought to be pretty well understood. Our experience ought to have taught us to discriminate between the methods by which we can succeed and the methods which are sure to lead to failure. The pioneer methods which have so largely been fruitful in failure have proved wastefully extravagant, and it is now high time to make a business of our missionary work; and, if a business, then we must adopt and adhere to business methods. Our work from this time forth is that of organization, and the organization of churches is as strictly a matter of business as the organization of banks and railroads; and practical knowledge and skill are as much required in the one case as in the other.

The lines upon which our work must be done have already become plain to us. In our experience we have worked out the methods by which we can and must succeed. We have demonstrated that on grounds both of feasibility and economy the old hit-or-miss personal venture style of carrying on our church extension work must be abandoned. The one-man enterprises are no longer adequate to the speedy and successful overcoming of the obstacles that confront us. This is an age of large and strongly supported enterprises, in competition with which the weak individual undertakings stand little or no chance of success. The syndicate method, with its large massing of resources, is the one that now succeeds, and crowds out all competitors. Let us be wise in our day and generation, and learn this lesson from the business world. It is the only way in which we can eliminate our failures; and, when we eliminate these, we shall have taken a long step toward making the most economical use of our resources,—toward preventing waste, and making every dollar of our expenditures yield its full return in some successful venture.

Our first duty, then, is to carefully plan our campaign of church extension on lines inclusive of the whole field East and West, North and South. The first step should be taken by carefully selecting the most eligible strategic points. (By most eligible I mean those where the present conditions are most favorable to the successful prosecution of our work.) From these we should select in each of the five departments just the number which this year's financial resources of the American Unitarian Association that can be devoted to the initiation of new work will safely permit us to undertake. On these places all our resources should be concentrated. All other new ventures of every kind whatsoever, except those which can be undertaken under the auspices and support of some neighboring church and its pastor, should be cut off. Fewer undertakings and more successful ones should be our policy. This, I am sure, would, in the end, require the minimum expenditure, and yield the maximum result in well-established, self-supporting churches.

These places having been selected, the next thing to be determined is the manner of beginning. This, I am persuaded, should never be by one individual alone, no matter how wise or earnest or able, unless he be the pastor of a neighboring church, who on that account is well known in the community. Few who have not had experience of this sort of work can realize how much the final success of an undertaking of this kind depends upon the favorableness of the first impression that is made. I am almost prepared to say that the success or failure of the enterprise is, in the majority of cases, determined by the impression made at the initial meetings.

In planning to produce this impression, we must always keep in mind the kind of constituency which it is necessary for us to bring into hearty accord and co-operation with us, in order to insure success. It is a very easy matter to bring together all the people of a community who, for one reason or another, are antagonistic to the existing churches. As all the malcontents and the refugees of every description flocked to the cave of Adullam where David had established himself as the leader of a revolt, so all the opponents of the existing churches will gather at the announcement that an anti-orthodox church is to be established. But it is usually a very heterogeneous lot of people who are thus attracted, many of whom it is impossible to assimilate. They have but one thing in common,—their discontent with existing things; and so their divergent and clashing purposes (for each has his own peculiar social vagary or religious hobby, which he is intent on imposing upon the others) insures their falling apart just as soon as constructive work is undertaken that requires co-operation for the attainment of a common end. A movement that is dominated by such people is doomed to disintegration and failure. The sane and responsible people of the community are sure to hold aloof from whatever undertaking they take charge of. To prevent them from imperilling a new movement then, it must be so guarded in its inception that all risk from that quarter shall be avoided. To this end, before holding any public meeting, the superintendent or minister in charge should make sure that at the first public service there shall be present a good nucleus of liberal-minded people of the highest standing for sanity and good character who will stand as sponsors to the movement. This is very important, as otherwise a lot of irresponsible persons are sure to come to the front, and thus repel the solid, thoughtful people of social position, whose identification with the undertaking would at once give it a good reputation in the community. We must in this way protect ourselves at the beginning from the damning approval of people who are eager, not so much to efface themselves in an effort to magnify and exalt the cause of truth and righteousness in their midst as they are to show their antagonism to Orthodoxy or gratify their desire to be engaged in anything that will yield them incidentally a little more notoriety. Now, of course, we want to reach and help "all sorts and conditions of men"; but, in order to do this effectually, we must keep our work under the control of those who are perfectly sane and responsible, those who want to build up a church that shall be a constructive and saving power in the midst of society.

All necessary precautions against the wrecking of the enterprise having been taken at the beginning, the way is clear to arrange for the first public meetings. This should be done with great care. The subjects to be treated should be selected with a view to exhibiting Unitarianism as a positive and constructive religious faith,—a faith that is perfectly consistent with modern knowledge and with the utmost freedom of thought, but a faith which makes use of these only as a means of promoting that religious progress which makes for the upbuilding of the kingdom of God among men. There should be not less than three or four speakers, and each should be heartily in sympathy with this purpose. They should be selected from among the strongest and most effective speakers in our body, and among them there should be at least one of national reputation.

The reason for taking our strongest men for this kind of service and putting several of them together on the same platform is obvious. The single minister, no matter how able and eloquent, going alone into a new field to inaugurate a new movement, is handicapped by the distrust of the people,—first, as to whether there is a sufficient power back of him and supporting him; second, as to the ability of any man alone in the face of strong opposition to carry forward a feebly begun undertaking to a successful conclusion. There are many persons who, no matter how strongly they may sympathize with our views, will be prevented by their distrust from casting in their lot with such an undertaking. Reasons of mere worldly prudence influence their action. They do not want to be identified with a movement that, in their judgment, may be doomed to failure; nor do they want to become responsible for the financial support of a movement where the weakness of the members numerically seems to indicate that the tax upon the few who engage in it must be necessarily a heavy one. To these considerations are often added the social objection to being associated with a weak and struggling cause. These are potent reasons with many, and they are all-born of the distrust which follows from the sort of single-handed beginning I have described. They are sufficient to keep aloof from us the very people whose co-operation and support, if secured, would make success not only possible, but easy.

Now, a beginning which gives rise to such distrust is most unfortunate for the minister who, single-handed, undertakes to create the new society; and it is disastrous to the cause which he represents. It is unfair to put any minister in such a position that, for no fault of his own, his chances of failure are increased many-fold. This is a condition which, for his sake and for the sake of the cause, ought by all means to be avoided, as it surely can be, by following a more business-like method. To remove at the very beginning all grounds of distrust concerning the possibility and certainty of success is to go half-way toward winning success, for it makes it possible at once to bring to our standard nearly all those in the community who belong with us. To go one step further and convince the whole community that the supporting power and influence of the entire Unitarian denomination is behind a new movement, and that the undertaking will be carried forward to a successful issue, is to deprive timid ones of their last excuse for holding aloof. Both these ends can be accomplished by simply bringing together before the community where the organization of a new church is to be undertaken several of the best speakers and official representatives of the denomination. This will give ample assurance that it is a denominational rather than a merely individual undertaking. It will give the impression that there is staying power back of it. Besides, there is a cumulative effect that comes from putting several such speakers on the same platform on the same evening. The impression produced is the very one that is best calculated to create the conditions favorable to the organization and upbuilding of a new Unitarian church.

Having in this way, by a series of public meetings, made the desired impression, and helped to create the most favorable conditions, the movement is then ready to turn over to the minister who is to have charge of it; and he thus comes to it well introduced, and, with the community, assured that the whole power of the denomination is back of him and supporting him in his efforts. Nothing more than this can be desired, and anything less than this is insufficient to meet the necessities of the case. This is the syndicate method of massing our resources for the accomplishment of a difficult enterprise, and it is the only one that fulfils all the requirements of a true business method.

Now, a word in regard to the economy of this method. By wise planning on the part of the superintendents and the officers of the American Unitarian Association, missionary tours could be so arranged as to include a series of these meetings in well-selected places at the greatest possible economy of time and expense for travelling on the part of the speakers engaged for this service. This, too, would help to unify all our missionary work and keep it under a strict central supervision, so that all wasteful expenditures could be prevented. So much for the economy of the field work.

Now, for the economic effect of this method in the local community. The greatest difficulty encountered by the old method in getting a new society set upon its feet, so to speak, is due, as I have intimated, to the fact that so many of those who are in sympathy with our views distrust the feasibility of our success. By holding themselves aloof, they not only keep our numbers small, but—what is quite as discouraging—they keep the local financial support small. The method, therefore, which will make it possible to bring these people in and secure their personal strength and service, and their financial support, justifies itself on the ground of economy alone as being most business-like. Moreover, the method which thus develops the fullest measure of local financial support is the one that will make the least demands upon the treasury of the American Unitarian Association,—another strong point in favor of its economic value.

Such, as I have tried to describe them, are the missionary methods which I believe are demanded by the conditions which confront us to-day. No intelligent observer of the signs of the times will deny that, in the present state of knowledge and religious thought, a great reconstructive movement in religion has become a necessity. Who shall lead it? An attitude of wider hospitality to the truth than ours no one can occupy. To more inclusive principles of

The Fashionable Cloak House
Springer * Brothers,
 500 WASHINGTON ST.
 Stylish Garments. Elegant Furs.
The Place above all others to purchase Cloaks and Furs.

intellectual freedom no one can hold. To a freer spirit and a higher ethical aim in religion and life no one has yet attained. And, since by nothing short of truth untrammelled, of intellectual freedom of the most inclusive range, of a spirit the broadest and most catholic, and of ethical aims the most righteous, will the true constructive movement in religion be inspired and directed, why may we not hope to bear an honorable part in the van of this great movement that is destined—if we are faithful to our trust—to establish religion on broader and firmer foundations than ever, and make it a mightier force for good in shaping the destinies of mankind? If we are but true to the great opportunity that the present conjunction of circumstances opens to us, we can make the faith and the principles which we hold an unspeakable blessing to the world. If we fail in our duty at this juncture, we must expect to see the present movement in religious thought deflected from its rightful course by the unethical, truth-sacrificing, compromise methods and ideals of so-called liberal Orthodoxy. If that takes place, the triumph of our principles and our ideals will be postponed, perhaps, for two or three centuries.

The present, then, is the auspicious time for us to put forth our efforts in a measure commensurate to the greatness of our opportunity and of the end to be attained.

BUSINESS RECORD.

The sixteenth meeting of the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches was held in Washington, D.C., October 21 to 24.

The opening sermon on "Our Gospel" was preached in Metzert Hall on Monday evening by Rev. M. J. Savage.

TUESDAY MORNING.

On Tuesday morning communion service was conducted by Rev. C. C. Everett.

In the absence of the president, Hon. George F. Hoar, the Conference was called to order by Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, who spoke as follows:—

Hon. DORMAN B. EATON.—Ladies and Gentlemen, Delegates of the National Conference.—I congratulate you upon the great number present and the promising opportunity of doing some worthy work for the great cause of Unitarian Christianity which has brought us together. You regret as I do that your distinguished president, Senator Hoar, does not appear in this place. Unavoidable circumstances have compelled his absence; and, in venturing to undertake the performance of some part of his duties, I shall have abundant occasion for your indulgence. Hon. Carroll D. Wright, chairman of the board of trustees of All Souls' Church, that worthy congregation which represents us at the National Conference, will now address you."

Hon. C. D. WRIGHT.—Mr. President and Delegates.—It is a very honorable service that has been assigned to me, and I perform it with a great deal of pleasure. All Souls' Church representing you at this capital is one of the few historic churches in our town. It is celebrating this year its seventy-fifth birthday. Formed in 1820, it has passed through historic times and has had varied experiences. The invitation to meet here which you have so kindly accepted came from All Souls' Church. Not that we expected to carry on in any sense the business of the Conference, but we wanted you to come here. It was through your generosity that the present church edifice was erected. It was through that generosity that the church has had a season of prosperity, growth, and activity. Reaching back into the past as it does, it feels that it stands for something. The early days of its existence were the early days of the departure into Unitarianism from the other churches. It has numbered among its adherents and among its active worshippers some of the greatest men of our country. During the first half-century of its existence there joined in its service Chief Justice Marshall, Justices Story and Miller, Presidents Adams and Fillmore, Postmaster-general Hall, Senators Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, Archer of Virginia, Edward Everett, Charles Sumner, John P. Hale and Timothy O. Howe, Judge Cranch and George Bancroft.

This list could be extended almost to a round hundred of the greatest names of our country, so that All Souls' Church has a pride of its own as well as a pride in its historical reminiscences.

Some of you attended church on Sunday, and you went at the call of the very first bell that was used in a house of worship in this city. Mr. Shippen has told the story in his history of All Souls' Church.

"Although there were ten other churches in our city, they were without bells. The first bell in our city bought and rung for a Christian church was the bell which hangs in our church tower at the present time. It was purchased with subscriptions by John Quincy Adams, John C. Calhoun, and other leading citizens, and was cast at the foundry near Boston, established by the famous Paul Revere, who died in 1818."

So we have romance connected with our church here as well as history.

In 1859, when this same bell that called you to worship on Sunday tolled a requiem for the death of John Brown, it was labelled "The Abolition Bell," and properly. But the next year, in the heat and excitement which prevailed here, the bell was silenced by the city authorities. But its tongue is not silent now, and it speaks words every Sunday as eloquent in historical lore as religious enthusiasm.

We have had grand men, too, in the past in our church here; and a few of the names may interest you. Dr. Edward Everett Hale preached here at the age of twenty-two. Then we had Dr. Orville Dewey, who was settled three times, Dr. Joseph Henry Allen, Moncure D. Conway, W. H. Channing, Dr. R. P. Stebbins, Frederic Hinckley, Clay MacCauley, Samuel Longfellow; and now we have in All Souls' a man who has made it what it is and who brought up your interest in it so generously, Mr. Shippen. He has carried on his work here for fourteen years. He brought the church to its present beautiful proportions as an organization. He has been successful, and his earnest and faithful pastorate comes to a close now as you come here to witness the work of All Souls' Church and his work.

We have put ourselves in straight accord with your utterances. Last year at Saratoga you made this declaration:—

"These churches accept the religion of Jesus, holding, in accordance with his teaching, that practical religion is summed up in love to God and love to man; . . . and we invite to our working fellowship any who, while differing from us in belief, are in general sympathy with our spirit and our practical aims."

Last Wednesday evening, at a very full meeting of the members of All Souls' Church, this declaration of yours, which you sent out to the world as representing the crystallized thought of Unitarians, was unanimously adopted as its own declaration perhaps the first to take into its constitutional law the declaration of the National Conference.

We are now seeking a new departure, not a better one. We cannot much improve on the past; but there always comes a time when every church must turn its face in other directions, and, recognizing all that has been done before, press on to the things ahead, keeping its face to the light always. You can help us. One of your most distinguished clergymen said to me this morning when I said, "Come to All Souls' Church," "You lead me on to the mountain, and show me all the possessions of the earth; but I must resist the temptation." [Laughter.] So the old lessons are taught over and over again, but we hope that this old church may tempt one of your brightest men to come here and represent you at the national capital; and the welcome which we shall give him when we find him will be as cordial and as hearty as the welcome which All Souls' Church, through me as its official representative, extends to you this morning. [Applause.]

Rev. George Batchelor moved that the order of business usually adopted be adopted for this meeting. Voted.

Several changes in the program made necessary by the impossibility of those who were expected to read papers to attend were accepted by vote.

Mr. Batchelor also presented the following telegram, which by rising vote it was decided to send to Dr. Hale:—

To Dr. E. E. Hale, first secretary of the Conference and veteran of the Council, the National Conference sends affectionate greeting in memory of his many distinguished services, and with tender sympathy with the anxiety and sorrows which deprived the Conference of his presence and fellowship.

On motion of Mr. Morehouse the five following assistant secretaries and three standing committees were elected:—

Assistant Secretaries: Mrs. Isabel C. Barrows, Boston, Mass.; Rev. Carl G. Horst, Athol, Mass.; Rev. Frank S. C. Wicks, Passaic, N.J.; Rev. W. S. Key, Winthrop, Mass.; Mr. William T. Salter, New York City.

Committee on Business: Hon. Carroll D. Wright, Hon. Charles H. Porter, Hon. D. L. Shorey, Mrs. Charles T. Catlin, Rev. Charles E. St. John.

Committee on Nomination: Rev. Thomas R. Slicer, Mrs. R. H. Davis, Rev. J. Edward Wright, George H. Ellis, Rev. Joseph May.

Committee on Credentials: Prescott Keyes, Rev. George H. Young, Rev. Carl G. Horst, Mrs. Emily A. Fifield, Rev. Charles F. Russell.

The report of the chairman of the Council, Rev. George Batchelor, was read. A paper was also read by Mrs. E. A. Fifield, secretary of the National Alliance; and an address was given by Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The following letter was read by Mr. Batchelor from the Hungarian Unitarian churches:—

BOLON, HUNGARY, Aug. 25, 1895.

TO THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER CHRISTIAN CHURCHES FRATERNAL GREETING:

Dear Christian Brethren.—The Rev. William H. Lyon, of Boston, who visited Hungary, and at the same time gave us the pleasure to attend the meetings of our Synodical Chief Council, informed us that the meeting of the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches will take place in the month of October.

We make use of the opportunity with the greatest pleasure to appoint the Rev. W. H. Lyon as a representative of the Hungarian Unitarian churches at your National Conference, who was such an able and worthy representative of our American brethren, and at the same time he added very much with his personal presence and eloquent addresses to the success of our Synod.

Through his personal experience, he will be able to give you a full report of our ecclesiastical life. Nevertheless, we feel it our most pleasant duty to express in these lines, on our part also, our fervent and most fraternal greeting, wishing that the sacred blessing of God may be on your gathering; and every thought and feeling which move your councils may promote the wide spread of liberal Christianity and pure Christian love for the happiness of humanity.

With most kind regards we remain,
Your Christian Brethren,
GABRIEL DANIEL, Chief Curator.
JOSEPH FERENCZ,
Bishop of the Hungarian Unitarian Churches.
LUIS NAGY, Chief Notary.
For the Synodical Chief Council.

Rev. W. H. Lyon was introduced, who spoke as follows:—

• Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen.—It was my very great and unexpected pleasure in the course of a journey down the Danube to be present at the Quadrennial Synod of our Hungarian brethren. It seemed to me a great pity that, even after the eloquent message which you have received from the second of the three great bodies of Unitarians, you should not receive also a personal message from the third and farther distant. Even if I had the eloquent tongue of a Hungarian, which I think is the most eloquent tongue of any nation, I could not convey to you the warmth, the amplexness, and the generosity of the hospitality which our Hungarian friends poured out for English Unitarians in the person of your representative. You know they live so far separated both from English and American Unitarians that, if they have a chance to show their sense of fellowship, they pour out the best they have in the most eloquent words they can use. As long as I live, I think I shall not forget the faces of the men and women at that great Conference.

More than that, it would take more than their eloquence if I could properly express the admiration I feel for the steadfastness, the loyalty, the fearlessness, the constancy, with which they have stood for the faith given to them at the Reformation. While the nobility and learned classes have allowed their churches to be closed and their faith to be extinguished, these peasants have kept alive at least a hundred churches and sixty-five thousand brave and consistent Unitarians. And they have done this in the face of persecution that you can hardly conceive of. Their very churches are surrounded by fortified walls; but so universal is the courage of that people that there have been times when even the women—and I make the bull consciously—manned the ramparts and kept back the enemy while their husbands and brothers were summoned to the distant field. And their persecutions are not over. Even to-day they are ground between the upper mill-stone of the numerous and intolerant orthodox Lutherans and Calvinists and the lower mill-stone of a corrupt Catholicism, the most corrupt in Europe, led by a priesthood which, I think, is the most sensual in all the Catholic Church,—a priesthood that an American priest told me had learned nothing in faith or morals from the terrible lessons of the Reformation.

Their persecutions are not over. I have been told since I have been here of some vague rumors of a rising against the Magyars. If that be true, and the Wallachians on the south, and the Germans and Saxons on the north, are being stirred up by the Austrians to oppose any kind of growing Hungarian national sentiment, then our love of liberty as well as our love of the Unitarian faith binds us to sympathize with our distant brethren. I therefore would ask that the following message may be sent:—

The National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches, assembled at Washington, District of Columbia, in the United States of America, to the Synodical Chief Council of the Hungarian Unitarians, and to the brethren whom they represent, greeting: Though you are separated from us by space and language, we are glad to feel you near in a common faith and a common love of liberty. We have heard of your loyalty under great hardship and temptation, and we rejoice with you in the liberty which you have attained. May the bonds which already unite us draw us closer for the defence and the spread of the faith we both hold so dear!

On motion of Mr. Batchelor it was unanimously voted to send this message to Hungary.

Several resolutions which were offered were on motion referred to the Business Committee.

Daniel Albright Long, president of Antioch College, was introduced, and read brief extracts from a paper which he asked to have referred to the Business Committee.

The following resolutions, which were reported back by the Business Committee, were adopted:—

Resolved, that this Conference wishes to express its profound sense of the serious nature of those evils which have their origin in habits of intemperance, and in the demoralizing influence of the traffic in intoxicating drinks. These evils not only cause the needless expenditure of vast sums of money without useful results, the serious impairment of physical and mental energies, the general debasement of character, and much of the corruption in politics and government; but they are also a chief obstruction to the triumph of morality and religion, a reproach to an enlightened people and to Christian civilization.

Resolved, That, without attempting to estimate the relative merits of the diverse practical methods upon which men, equally conscientious, mainly rely for suppressing these evils, we wish to emphasize the stern and universal Christian duty of all the friends of good government, virtue, and religion, that they shall exert themselves to the utmost, at all proper times, and in every way which seems to them most effective, for such suppression.

We think that no pulpit should be silent on this subject, and that every Unitarian layman has a duty in connection with it which he has no right to ignore.

Resolved, That the serious and increasing corruption and venality developed, in recent years, in connection with the government of American cities, have not only made good municipal administration much more difficult and costly, but have so obstructed the advancement both of morality and religion as to make it a grave duty of all friends of municipal reform to exert themselves for the arrest of such evils in the future, and to make common cause in urging all good citizens to discard mere party spirit and interests, and to unite in common efforts for good municipal government without regard to their party affiliations.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON.

A paper on "The Church and the Masses" was read by Rev. John Cuckson.

By general consent the following resolution was passed without reference:—

Resolved, That this meeting at the earnest desire of Dr. Hale give ten minutes' time to Miss Deans of the Manassas School, Virginia, to speak of her work, after the discussion of the afternoon is closed.

A paper on "Our Congregational Polity" was read by Rev. F. L. Hosmer.

An address on the same subject was made by Rev. Samuel Calthrop.

Rev. R. R. Shippen introduced Miss Jennie Deans, commending her and the work which she has done at Manassas in establishing an industrial school for the colored people. Miss Deans then spoke in behalf of her school, and in gratitude for what has already been done for her by people of the North and South.

In another hall a meeting took place to consider the proposed consolidation of Guilds, Unity Clubs, and other young people's societies.

TUESDAY EVENING.

The evening was devoted to "Our Young People," Rev. E. A. Horton, presiding.

Addresses were made by Rev. E. A. Horton, Dr. Stanley Hall, Rev. B. R. Bulkeley, Rev. Ida C. Hultin, and Rev. Thomas R. Slicer.

Fascinating Music

"New Harvard Song Book"

The latest collection of college songs published. The best examples obtainable of the distinctly modern college song up to date. 92 pages, 35 songs. Cover in crimson and white. Heavy Paper, $1.00, Postpaid.

"Good Old Songs"

Thousands sold. A treasure book of over 100 songs which have been loved by several generations. Handsomely bound. Heavy Paper, $1.00; Boards, $1.25; Cloth, Gilt, $2.00.

"Minstrel Songs—Old and New"

102 songs. The most popular minstrel collection extant. Heavy Paper, $1.00; Boards, $1.25; Cloth, Gilt, $2.00.

"Choice Sacred Solos"

Vol. 1. 39 songs for soprano and tenor. Vol. 2. 40 songs for alto, baritone, and bass. Made up of the best modern sacred compositions. Heavy Paper, $1.00; Boards, $1.25; Cloth, Gilt, $2.00.

"College Songs for Girls"

The only collection of the kind published, including the best songs sung in the leading colleges for women. 120 pages. Heavy Paper, $1.00, Postpaid.

"Moore's Irish Melodies"

New edition of the poet's exquisite songs and lyrics. 143 songs. Also a portrait and memoir of the author, with historical notes. Octavo size. Heavy Paper, $1.00; Boards, $1.25; Cloth, Gilt, $2.00.

Descriptive circulars of any of the above books sent free on application.

Oliver Ditson Company

453-463 Washington St., Boston
C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

The devotional service Wednesday morning was conducted by Rev. S. H. Camp. An address was given by Rev. W. H. Furness, D.D.

The regular session was called to order at 10.15 A.M. by Mr. Dorman B. Eaton. The Business Committee reported resolutions concerning Antioch College. Referred to the American Unitarian Association.

Mr. E. B. Haskell reported on the New World as follows: At the last Conference the scope, conditions, and needs of this publication were presented by Dr. C. C. Everett, and the Conference adopted the following resolution:—

The National Conference hereby declares its great satisfaction with the honorable record made since its last meeting by the New World Quarterly, and repeats its recommendation, made three years ago, that this review should be substantially endowed. We approve the plan of raising an endowment of $50,000, which shall be placed in the hands of the American Unitarian Association as a trust fund, the income only to be paid over annually to the editorial board. A committee on the endowment and current support of the New World shall be appointed by the chairman of the Conference to invite subscriptions, under such conditions as shall insure the continuance of the New World as an unsectarian, liberal review. In case of its discontinuance or of the failure of the editorial board to comply with these conditions, the endowment fund shall revert to the American Unitarian Association as a publication fund, unless the donors otherwise direct.

In accordance with this resolution a committee was appointed early last season. Several meetings were held, and there was a free interchange of views. Although the resolution approved of the plan of an endowment fund, the committee seemed to be authorized to adopt any plan to insure the continuance of the New World; and the practically unanimous judgment of those present was in favor of a guarantee fund, with a limit to the amount of a subscription which might be called in any one year. This judgment was based on the difficulty of raising an endowment fund of the requisite amount in the depressed financial condition of the country at that time; the hope and expectation that the Review will become self-supporting in a few years, when an endowment fund will be no longer needed; and the greater convenience of this plan for all who are willing to help the New World until it can revolve alone.

Again, it seems to be the best opinion of all the friends of the New World and the liberal cause it represents that it should maintain its non-sectarian character to the fullest extent. The committee decided to raise a guarantee subscription instead of an endowment fund of fifty thousand dollars, with the conditions that no subscription should be binding unless or until the whole subscription amounted to ten thousand dollars, and that no more than fifteen per cent. of the subscriptions shall be payable in any one year. It also appointed three trustees to take charge of the subscription and to have a general oversight of the finances of the review.

In theology and ethics the New World is of the highest authority. In its review of new books it is invaluable for all men who have any claims to scholarship. It is conducted with economy astonishing to those who know the prices paid for literary labor in the secular press. Its articles are written by the best scholars and thinkers in Europe and America, and in no other publication is the reader so sure to find the last word of the higher criticism on questions of theology and ethics.

In the New World is found the last word of the highest education on this greatest of all subjects. No claim of infallibility, but by patient, honest effort the steady invasion of the unknown and the enlargement of the field of the known. The best scholarship of the world here presents clearly and courteously its latest conclusions. It is beyond question the ablest review of its kind in the English language. The remark naturally occurs that, if such a publication is wanted, if its work is required in the world, it will find abundant patronage, and so be independent of assistance. So we believe it will in time, but reviews of so high a class get patrons slowly. It is hard to understand why there are not five thousand or even ten thousand clergymen, scholars, enlightened business men in this country, who will take and appreciate this review. I can say for myself that no other publication comes to my table which I open so gladly. We believe that it only needs to be known to be self-supporting. Gradually, slowly, but surely, it is getting to be known.

Another point which should strengthen its appeal to liberal men and the friends of the liberal cause. Its readers are by no means confined to so-called liberals. The results of its high scholarships are carried with noble courtesy to the minds and hearts of many clergymen in the orthodox communions. Even those who are not liberal orthodox show a desire to know what liberal thinkers are thinking and saying, what doctrines they must defend or abandon. So it is a missionary enterprise of great promise, and as such makes a strong appeal to all liberal men.

But there is neither time nor occasion for a long argument to show that the New World deserves support. The Conference has settled that question by its previous action. The amount of the guarantee fund already subscribed, without going much outside of the committee itself, is about $6,500. We want to raise it, at least, to $20,000. If a larger amount is subscribed, so much the easier for all subscribers. If $20,000 is subscribed, not more than ten per cent. to be payable in any one year. Less than that, if less, will answer.

Blanks of two kinds will now be handed to you, one for subscriptions to the review and one for the guarantee. We call your attention first to the former. With a thousand new subscribers the review will be self-supporting. But please do not neglect the guarantee subscription. We should like, say, five subscriptions of $1,000 each, ten of $500, and fifty of $100 each. The blanks with your signatures will be gathered here, or, if you prefer not to sign now, they can be sent to the secretary here or to Rev. N. P. Gilman, Meadville, Pa.

Prof. C. C. Everett said that the New World is circulated more largely among orthodox ministers than among Unitarian. We need to have a ministry interested and trained in theological study. This review will do perhaps more than anything else to interest young men in theological questions, and induce them to enter the ministry. It would be a great misfortune if the review were not sustained.

Rev. T. R. Slicer of Buffalo said a common saying among orthodox friends of Unitarians is that they need to have their humility increased. But we know that what we need is a re-enforcement of our pride. We ought to have some pride in sustaining the New World. It becomes us, who have boasted that we are the leaders of the intellectual life of America, to demonstrate that we are the leaders into the light of those who need pre-eminently the last word in theology and the higher ethics.

The following resolution, presented by Mr. George W. Stone, was referred to the Business Committee:—

Whereas, this Conference at its last meeting adopted the following:—

"These churches accept the religion of Jesus, holding, in accordance with his teaching, that practical religion is summed up in love to God and love to man."

"And we cordially invite to our working fellowship any who, while differing from us in belief, are in general sympathy with our spirit and our practical aims."

Resolved, That the National Council give the above the widest possible publication as a sufficient basis not only for "Christian unity," but for the religious unity of the world.

Addresses on "Church Extension" were made by Rev. Messrs. D. M. Wilson, D. W. Morehouse, George L. Chaney, T. B. Forbush, A. W. Gould, and C. W. Wendte.

The resolution introduced by Mr. Stone on Christian unity was reported by the Business Committee favorably, and was unanimously adopted.

President Bumstead of Atlanta University made a statement in reference to his work.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.

The meetings of the Women's Alliance and of the Unitarian Temperance Society were held in All Souls' Church. At the latter addresses were made by Rev. D. N. Beach, Rev. F. G. Peabody, D.D., and a paper by Rev. A. P. Doyle was read in his absence by Rev. C. R. Eliot.

WEDNESDAY NIGHT.

At the opening of the session subscriptions were taken from the different churches to raise the two thousand dollars necessary to pay the expenses of the Conference.

Papers were then read by John Fiske, Ph.D., on "The Origins of Liberal Thought in America," and on "Our Unitarian Theology" by C. C. Everett, D.D., LL.D.

THURSDAY MORNING.

The devotional meeting was conducted by Rev. H. B. Frissell, president of the Hampton Industrial School, who invited the members of the Conference to visit that institution.

The Conference was called to order at 10 A.M. by Judge Shorey.

The following resolution was offered by Rev. S. J. Barrows:—

Resolved, That this Conference extends its deep sympathy to the suffering people of Armenia, whose loyalty to their Christian faith has brought upon them anew the terrible rigors of persecution, from which they have suffered for centuries. In the name of humanity we protest against the outrages committed under Turkish misrule. We recognize the responsibility of the treaty powers to secure governmental reform, the better administration of justice in the courts, and the enjoyment of perfect liberty of conscience. We look with expectation and confidence to the results of the determined action of the English government in this direction.

Referred to the Business Committee.

Papers were read by Rev. Howard N. Brown on "The Holy Spirit," by Rev. W. C. Gannett on "Incarnation," by Rev. W. H. Pulsford on "Atonement," and by Rev. Mary A. Safford on "Forgiveness."

Rev. W. I. Lawrance reported on "The Japan Mission."

The Committee on Credentials reported through the chairman, Mr. Prescott Keyes, that 236 societies and churches were represented by 405 accredited delegates, and that probably 1,500 persons were in attendance.

The Committee on Nominations reported by the chairman, Rev. T. R. Slicer, the following list of names:—

President, Hon. George F. Hoar. Vice-Presidents, Carroll D. Wright, Roger Wolcott, Dorman B. Eaton, Daniel L. Shorey, Horace Davis, Hon. Thomas J. Morris. General Secretary, Rev. D. W. Morehouse. Treasurer, William Howell Reed. Council, Rev. George Batchelor, Rev. Frederick L. Hosmer, Rev. Samuel Crothers, Rev. John Cuckson, Rev. Minot J. Savage, Mrs. Charles G. Ames, Mrs. William C. Gannett, Hon. George E. Adams, Hon. George S. Hale, George W. Stone, Rev. Daniel W. Morehouse, William Howell Reed.

Committees on Fellowship: Eastern States, Rev. D. Munro Wilson, Rev. Austin S. Garver, Rev. Edward A. Horton; Middle and Southern States, Rev. D. W. Morehouse, Rev. Stephen H. Camp, Rev. George L. Chaney; Western States, Rev. T. B. Forbush, Rev. William W. Fenn, Rev. Mary A. Safford; Pacific States, Rev. Charles W. Wendte, Rev. Horatio Stebbins, Rev. Thomas L. Eliot.

On motion it was voted that the secretary should cast one ballot for the whole. This was done, and three persons were declared elected.

The Business Committee reported through Rev. C. E. St. John that the resolution on the Armenians, offered by Mr. Barrows, was recommended for adoption. The resolution was then unanimously adopted.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

The following resolution, favorably reported by the Business Committee, was unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, That the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches, recognizing the great need of religious training for our young people, and the great good already accomplished in some of our churches by guilds and other organizations for that purpose, earnestly urges upon all of our churches the desirability of trying to start some form of young people's religious societies.

Papers were read by Prof. F. G. Peabody on "The History and Principles of the Unitarian Church in Relation to Social Problems," and by Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer on "The Modern Application of these Principles." Discussion followed, in which Rev. Messrs. J. H. Crooker, Paul Frothingham, Hon. C. D. Wright, and Rev. Alexander Kent took part.

THURSDAY NIGHT.

The last session was devoted to addresses on "The Outlook," Rev. R. R. Shippen presiding. The speakers, besides Mr. Shippen, were Hon. Horace G. Wadlin, Rev. S. R. Calthrop, Hon. Carroll D. Wright, and Rev. Minot J. Savage.

The Conference adjourned after the singing of "Old Hundred."

ROBERT BEVERLY HALE.

BY F. H. R. P.

Youth to immortal youth! So hath he fled,
In life's unclouded morning borne away.
Scarcely a space had I of Death to pray.
Bereave us not: hearts he hath comforted,
And I have grown to listen where he led
The clear-voiced bards who choir the waking day.
O Death, stay thy dread hand till evening gray!
Mid-noon hath not abated that firm tread!
That lofty cheer, that high-souled charity,
Unconsciously inform his hourly ways.
Entreat thee, Death, canst spare not such as he?
The joy of life is his, the budding bays!
Then almost lovingly Death said to me,
"Like him, fill thou the measure of thy days."

GOWNSWOMEN.

There has been enough said for the present about the sweet girl-graduate and her charming scholastic garb. But the question as to the suitable gowning of the less numerous sisterhood, comprised of women of somewhat maturer years and richer experience in life, who have taken up publicly the work of the ministry in the "liberal" churches, is one that has apparently not received serious consideration either from women pastors themselves or from the lay women to whom they minister.

The absorbing interest of a life devoted to others may well account for the indifference of the former to what is in reality of no small importance. A feeling of delicacy has doubtless prevented the latter from raising any question as to the propriety and desirability of the use of the dress of to-day in the pulpit.

There seems to be no sign of an approach to a consideration of it from the clerical side as yet. It must come, then, if it comes at all, from the laity.

Although the use of the gown by the ministers of the Established Church in England and by those of the Episcopal Church in this country has come to be considered by both clergy and laity as pertaining to a function of the Church, as adding weight to the service and ecclesiastical dignity to the man, still it originated, without doubt, in the wearing of the purely scholastic garb. Now, the ecclesiastics of early days, almost alone among men, set themselves to acquire learning, so that it became distinctive.

In the "liberal" churches where it is used to quite an extent to-day, particularly in our large cities and towns, the gown carries with it no particular odor of sanctity. But few of the Universalist or Unitarian ministers who use it would admit that it adds dignity to the man or to the office. They look upon it rather as a suitable and fitting garment, the form of which has been handed down by honored usage, and as lending ease to the wearer. These men do entirely as they please with regard to it. Its presence or absence is not remarked upon.

And yet, when a woman unexpectedly enters our pastor's pulpit some Sunday morning, with the involuntary start of surprise comes the unfailing feminine instinct. Let her manner be irreproachable, her reading full of meaning, her sermon

THE FUNK & WAGNALLS

75th Thousand.

Prices to be Advanced

NEARLY ONE-THIRD

Jan. 1, 1896.

STANDARD DICTIONARY

OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE

"It should be the Pride of Literary America, as it is the Admiration of Literary England."

—St. James's Budget, London, July 27, 1895.
(Weekly Edition of St. James's Gazette.)

301,865 Vocabulary Terms, 125,000 Synonyms and Antonyms,
47,468 Entries in the Appendix, 45,000 Illustrative Quotations,
5,000 Illustrations, 247 Editors and Specialists,
$960,000 Expended in its Production.

Oxford University, England, Prof. A. H. Sayce, the eminent philologist, says:
"The Standard Dictionary is certain to supersede all other dictionaries of the English language."

Yale University, Prof. E. J. Phelps, Ex-minister to Great Britain, says:
"For general and practical purposes it is the best American dictionary now available."

Cambridge University, England, Prof. J. E. Sandys, says:
"It is admirable, and deserves to become famous on both sides of the Atlantic."

Harvard University, Prof. A. Preston Peabody, says:
"Will prove invaluable, and will last while the English language remains essentially unchanged."

The New York Herald, says:
"The Standard Dictionary is a triumph in the art of publication. It is admirable from every point of view. It is the most satisfactory and most complete dictionary yet printed."

The Saturday Review, London, Eng., says:
"In substantial merit we think the Standard Dictionary decidedly preferable to the much-advertised Century."

The Daily Post, Liverpool, Eng., says:
"It is a monument to American industry no less than the Great White City by Lake Michigan."

The Journal of Education, Boston, says:
"In thoroughness, completeness, accuracy, typography, style, and illustration, it challenges criticism and commands admiration. It will make the world its debtor, and all who write must praise it evermore."

PRICES NOW:

IN ONE VOLUME:		IN TWO VOLUMES:
Half Russia	$12.00	Half Russia	$15.00
Full Russia {With Deni-}	14.00	Full Russia {With Deni-}	17.00
Full Morocco {son's Index}	18.00	Full Morocco {son's Index}	22.00

On Jan. 1, 1896, prices will be advanced nearly one-third. Subscribe NOW.

Sold by Subscription. Intelligent Solicitors Wanted. Address:

FUNK & WAGNALLS COMPANY, 30 Lafayette Pl., New York

exceptionally fine, and, in spite of our best efforts, if her dress be ill-fitting and out of date, or noticeably smart and over-trimmed, the woman preacher has failed to win from at least the feminine portion of her congregation that undivided attention which every serious preacher would wish to hold and every serious listener choose to give.

Such is the endless diversity in women's dress, such the sudden changes that come over it from time to time, that to be merely inconspicuous in private life is a study. Must the rising tide in sleeves and crinoline swell even to the platform of the pulpit? We may be to blame when our mind wanders from the discourse of the hour, either to approve or disapprove the garb of the preacher; but, surely, we are sorely tempted!

Would the woman preacher not only not challenge, but actually avoid, all criticism on the score of dress, let her adopt the gown. Why should she not cast aside all further thought on the question, and choose, once for all, as her pulpit dress, the scholastic garb?

From a mere point of economy of time and money, this would be worth her consideration. But there is also a fitness in it. The gown is already in high repute in many of our women's colleges, and in some cases it might mean merely a continuance of what had become already familiar to the graduate.

At present a woman must be either singularly indifferent to appearances or suffer real annoyance in deciding what is the appropriate thing for her to wear into the pulpit. For ordinary, every-day life it matters little how much stress the minister lays upon conformity to custom in dress. Nothing is at stake if she be criticised; but, if the full effect of every service is to be marred because of a mere misapprehension of the fitness of things, it is time that the matter should be taken into serious consideration.—Margaret Cary Pratt, in the Transcript.

Spiritual Life.

Love is the way to true spirituality. The spiritual are the men and women who love their fellow-men, who bear the burdens of their brothers and sisters, and so fulfil the law of Jesus Christ.—A. B. Bruce.

Jesus will always supply us with the best criticism of Christianity; and, when Christianity has passed away, the religion of Jesus will in all probability survive. After faith in Jesus as God we shall come back to faith in the God of Jesus.—Amiel's Journal.

True prayer consists not in words shaped by the mouth, but in the interior attention of the heart; for the sounds which sink into the ears of God are not the words which fall from our lips, but the holy desires and aspirations of our hearts.—St. Gregory.

Every one's real life consists in his reach into other lives. Whoever shares in the experiences of others helps them to be true and to make the best of what they have, strengthens their faith in God and love to men, lives and grows.—The Congregationalist.

The safeguard against temptation is not seclusion, but self-culture. As it is not disinfectants that will most certainly secure one against infection, but a sound constitution, so it is not rules of life that will strengthen one against temptation, but a strong soul. One must build up his moral constitution by the habit of noble deeds and high thinking, by fellowship with pure women and honorable men. The chief aids in this regimen are literature and friendship.—Ian Maclaren.

The Sunday School.

The next Channing Hall "Talk" will be held Saturday, November 2, at 2.30 P.M., at 25 Beacon Street, conducted by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. Subject, Lesson VIII., "The Broad and the Narrow Road." All cordially invited.

The "Annual Report of the Unitarian Sunday School Society" is now published in pamphlet form, together with the list of contributing churches and general announcements. Copies furnished without cost by mail or at the Book-rooms on application.

A revised edition of the new catalogue is just out, giving full titles of the publications of the Unitarian Sunday School Society. Send for a copy to 25 Beacon Street, Boston.

NEW YORK UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—Regular meeting Monday, November 4, at the Parish House of All Souls' Church, 104 East Twentieth Street, New York. Directors' meeting at 4.30 P.M. Business meeting at 5.30 P.M. Supper at 6 P.M. Discussion at 7 P.M. Subject,

"Doctrinal Teaching," to be opened by Rev. Minot J. Savage of Boston, Mass. George H. Badger, Secretary.

PRIMARY TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.—There will be held, under the auspices of the Boston Primary Union, at Berkeley Temple, Boston, on Monday, November 4, at 3 P.M., a Primary Teachers' Institute, which will be addressed by many of the most noted primary Sunday-school teachers of this vicinity. The topics will cover every phase of primary work, and the speakers will present many new ideas that have been practically worked out in their own schools. Every primary teacher is invited to attend. Admission is free; and programmes can be obtained from F. P. Shumway, No. 25 Bromfield Street, Boston.

Religious Intelligence.

(Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning: announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.)

THE regular monthly meeting of the South Middlesex Branches of the Women's Alliance will be held at the Unitarian Building on Thursday, November 7, at twelve o'clock.

THE regular meeting of the Suffolk Branches of the National Alliance of Unitarian Women will be held at 25 Beacon Street, Boston, on Monday, November 4, at eleven o'clock. Officers of other Branches are cordially invited.

BOSTON.—Church of the Disciples: Rev. Charles G. Ames has returned from his vacation, and will occupy his pulpit next Sunday, November 3. On Friday evening, November 8, a "Pastoral Reception" will be held in the church parlors, to which the congregation and friends of Mr. Ames are cordially invited.

Ministers' Monday Club: November 4, 10.30 A.M. Rev. J. M. Marsters will preside. Rev. Messrs. Batchelor, Horton, and Cooke have been invited to address the club on the doings of the late National Conference in Washington.

On Tuesday, November 5, the "Children's Mission Home Circle" will meet at the Home, 277 Tremont Street, at ten o'clock A.M. Subscriptions will be in order. All interested are cordially invited to join. M. A. Merrill, Secretary of the Children's Mission Home Circle.

BILLERICA, MASS.—The Association of Ministers in and about Cambridge will meet with Rev. M. O. Simons on Monday, November 4. Train leaves Boston at ten o'clock. Subject of paper, "The Priesthood of Israel." Collation at 2 P.M. Hilary Bygrave, Scribe.

BROOKLINE, MASS.—Rev. Earle M. Wilbur of Portland, Ore., will preach in the First Parish Church next Sunday.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—Third Congregational Society: A service commemorative of Rev. G. W. Briggs, D.D., will be held Sunday, November 3, at 7.30 P.M. Addresses by Rev. Messrs. George Batchelor, H. N. Brown, F. B. Hornbrooke, and E. A. Horton.

CHELSEA, MASS.—Miss Margaret B. Barnard will preach at the First Unitarian Church on Sunday, November 3; and on Monday evening, November 4, at the church, under the auspices of the Women's Alliance, Miss Barnard will lecture on "Hawthorne: His Life and Times." The Alliance announces lectures for November 11 by Rev. S. M. Crothers of Cambridge, on "The Enjoyment of Poetry," and for November 18 by Rev. Charles G. Ames of Boston, on "Good Society."

LAWRENCE, MASS.—The Unity Club of the Unitarian church began a series of lectures on "Phases of Current Thought," October 25, with a talk by Hon. William S. Knox, on "The Money Question." "The Political Parties," "Woman Suffrage," "The New Theology," "The Single Tax," "Modern Charity and Municipal Reform," are among the subjects announced for future discussion.

THE NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE.—The Branch of the Alliance connected with the First Religious Society of Roxbury, Mass. (Rev. James De Normandie, minister), extends a cordial invitation to all the New England Branches to meet with them at their church, Eliot Square, on Wednesday, November 13. There will be but one session. Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells will preside. Exercises will begin at 10.45 A.M.: address of welcome, by Rev. James De Normandie; address by Miss Sarah L. Arnold, supervisor of Boston Public Schools,—subject, "Moral Training"; an informal talk by George W. Stone, Esq., treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, on "Woman's Work in Denominational Affairs" (it is also hoped that Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer of Providence, R.I., and others will speak); general discussion; election of officers, etc.; box-lunch at 1.30. Tea and coffee will be provided by the ladies of the Roxbury Alliance. "Norfolk House" electric, from the Union Station, via Washington Street, come directly to Eliot Square. Several other lines of green cars cross Dudley Street, near by. It is a ride of thirty-five minutes from the Union Station.

THE Plymouth and Bay Conference will meet with the Third Congregational Society in Hingham, Rev. C. T. Billings, pastor, Wednesday, November 6. Rev. E. C. Butler of Quincy will give the morning address. Subject, "How to build a Church." Programme: 9.30 A.M., devotional meeting, led by Rev. E. C. Guild, Pembroke; 10 A.M., business meeting; 10.30 A.M., address by Rev. Mr. Butler; discussion; conference collection; 12.30 P.M., collation; 1.30 P.M., address by Mrs. Charles T. Catlin of Brooklyn, representing the Women's Alliance; 2 P.M., address by Mr. George W. Stone, treasurer of the American Unitarian Association.

THE IOWA CONFERENCE.—The seventeenth annual session of the Iowa Unitarian Association was held at Anamosa, October 15, 16, 17. The delegation was smaller than usual because Anamosa is not easily reached by most of the churches of the State. But nine of the thirteen were represented; and all save one sent in reports. The sessions were enthusiastic and helpful. Miss Gordon's paper on "The New Pulpit" compared the pulpit of a century ago and the pulpit of to-day, showing that, although the minister no longer depends for his leadership upon his superior knowledge, it is still his part to quicken moral faculties, to inspire high ideals, to deepen man's trust in God, and to enlarge man's hope. In the evening the attendance was large. After the welcome, by Charles I. Deyo of Anamosa, and the response by Rev. Arthur M. Judy, the conference sermon was given by Rev. Charles E. Perkins, and followed by the conference hymn. The devotional service on Thursday morning was conducted by Rev. Mr. Baker of Sterling, Ill. The secretary's report showed twelve churches in the State as against seven three years ago, six missions,—all save one of which have been created in the last two years, and two since the last conference. The Treasurer's report showed that $1,147 had been raised through the year. At the Sunday-school meeting Wednesday morning Mr. Gould made clear the kind of teaching needed in our schools, and at the close of his talk outlined the aim of the "Nature Studies" he is preparing this year.

The Wednesday evening service was a platform meeting, when Mr. Forbush spoke on "What the Bible means to Unitarians." Mr. Gould presented "Our Thought of Man," and Mr. Palmer told of "Our Faith in God."

The important item of business on Thursday morning after the reports of churches was the question of co-operation with the Western Conference and the American Unitarian Association. After some discussion the following resolutions were passed, with but two dissenting votes:—

Whereas, in the judgment of the Conference, the time has arrived when the best interests of Unitarianism demand that an effort be made to determine the respective rights and limitations of our State, district, and national bodies, and to so adjust their functions that the overlapping of authority and the duplication of agencies may be done away.

Resolved, first, That the Board of Trustees be instructed to nominate a director of the Western Unitarian Conference to assume such duties in that capacity as are indicated in the plan of co-operation between the American Unitarian Association, the Western Unitarian Conference, and the State Conference, proposed at the last meeting of the Western Unitarian Conference.

Resolved, second, That, in case this plan should not be indorsed by a sufficient number of the State and district conferences to recommend its adoption, the member chosen as director shall then become the member from this Conference of a Committee on Co-operation, whose membership shall consist of representatives from each State or district conference within the bounds of the Western Conference, to be chosen by each conference or the board of trustees thereof, and two representatives from the Western Conference, to be chosen by the board of directors thereof, and three from the American Unitarian Association, to be chosen by its board of directors. This committee to meet in Chicago the second Tuesday in March, 1896, at 10 o'clock A.M.

It shall be the duty of this committee to prepare a plan of co-operation to submit to the Western Conference and to the American Unitarian Association at their May meeting in 1896.

It shall be the duty of the secretary of the Conference to notify the secretaries of all the other conferences concerned in this action, and to invite their co-operation.

At the Thursday afternoon session steps were taken looking to the organization of Young People's Religious Unions throughout the State. The evening sermon was by Miss Safford, and was a plea for loyalty to ideals, a fitting close to the conference, deepening the consciousness of the obligations which our able gospel brings.

The officers for the ensuing year are:—President, Rev. Mary A. Safford, Sioux City; vice-president, Dr. L. J. Adair, Anamosa; secretary, Leon A. Harvey, Des Moines; treasurer, Hon. B. F. Gue, Des Moines.

Forming a Literary Club

BY LOUISE STOCKTON

How it is best done: the rules of successful conduct; duties of officers, books to read, topics to discuss. A complete article in the November

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

10 Cents on all News-stands

The Curtis Publishing Company
Philadelphia

Literature.

THE HEART OF LIFE. By W. H. Mallock, author of "Is Life Worth Living?" etc. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—Mr. Mallock is so bright a man that he could not write a book that would not contain many good things. This one contains a great many. Some of them are bright, and some of them are beautiful. But why the book was written is by no means clear. A chance sentence carries the suggestion that by "the heart of life" is meant domestic happiness, but there is very little in illustration of this theme. The hero is a hero in the most conventional sense. Probably it would be a great mistake to suppose that Mr. Mallock has any sympathy with him or admiration for him, though he never brings to his character or conduct one direct word of rebuke. He is a man of splendid culture and large political knowledge, who is made a cabinet minister on the very threshold of his entrance into Parliament. But he has his silly side. He has been in love with many women, and to one he has been very kind in her German exile from her worthless husband. We are considerably surprised when we find that an adulterous connection was an incident of this kindness. For this connection Reginald never has a twinge of conscience. He has merely the dumps when the lady goes back to her husband, and writes to him less frequently and more briefly than he desires. At such times he hastens to console himself with some other lady. Never was man caught so quickly on the rebound. First, within so much of his orbit as is visible in the story, it is by the Countess Shimmer,—truly a fascinating creature,—then by Miss De Louza; and she, declining his overtures of marriage, he turns sharply to a woman of the town. Of course, if any one objects to this combination of political genius and emotional instability, Mr. Mallock would revive your recollection of Dilke and Parnell. But Reginald is represented as being as big a fool in money matters as in love, and this does not so well agree with his political ability. There is a Dr. Bulman in the story,—a canon of high standing, in whom, consciously or unconsciously, we seem to have himself reflected as in a glass, and pilloried for our warning and his shame. This gentleman has a tremendous predilection for the subject of personal purity,—in fact, because he has a dirty mind and a very dangerous weakness of the flesh. No one could write as Mr. Mallock has written here, and in "A Romance of the Nineteenth Century" and "The New Paul and Virginia," without a sensual mind or morbid sexuality. It is sincerely to be hoped that his picture of English social life does not approximate reality; that sexual immorality and illegitimacy are not the subjects into which gentlemen and ladies, married and unmarried, plunge with inevitable haste, however casually meeting, or if they have never met before. It is a pity that such great talents as those of Mr. Mallock should not be put to a cleaner and a better use.

CHRIST, THE SOCIALIST. Boston: Arena Publishing Company.—The political economy of this book is questionable in its form and admirable in its spirit. What is the test of Christianity? "We know that we have passed from death unto life because we love the brethren." But love must have its method and its law. However brotherly our disposition, there is still plenty of room to question whether the coming of "the kingdom of established peace" would be any whit advanced by socialistic methods, and, if so, by what measure of their application. That the book is not without humor we could give many proofs. On the last pages we have a dream of the return of Jesus to the earth. "And a young man, a reporter, said, 'How can we elevate journalism?' And Jesus said, 'Art thou a journalist?' And the young man, being modest, said, 'Nay: I am only a reporter.' And the Master, looking at the young man, loved him for his modesty; and he said: 'The mission of a newspaper is to give the news and to tell the truth. Follow this course, and thou wilt succeed.' And the young man marvelled at this answer, and said to himself: 'Verily, this is news to me. I never knew before that a reporter was expected to tell the truth.' " "And there are many other things that Jesus said" which are well worth considering.

The Magazines.

Macmillan & Co. send us the first number of the American Historical Review. If it keeps the promise which this number makes, it will justify itself as one more periodical in a field where there is a legion already. Its managing editor is Prof. J. Franklin Jameson of Brown University. The other editors are George B. Adams, Albert Bushnell Hart, Harry Pratt Judson, John Bach McMaster, William M. Sloane, and H. Morse Stephens. Prof. Sloane furnishes the salutatory article,—an elaborate discussion of History and Democracy; i.e., of the relation of democracy to the study and writing of history. In conclusion the intended scope of the new review is set forth in a lucid manner. Moses Coit Tyler follows with an admirable article on "The Party of the Loyalists in the American Revolution,"—such a good word for them that we may possibly have the sons and daughters of the Loyalists organizing themselves for purposes of honorable commemoration at no distant day. Henry Adams takes for his text a slip in his own history of Madison's administration, and gives the interesting story of a French adventurer, Count Edward de Crillon. Frederick J. Turner writes of Western State-making in the Revolutionary era. The reviews of books are an important feature, and take up nearly one-half the entire space,—208 pages. Goldwin Smith reviews Prowse's "History of Newfoundland"; Edward M. Shepard, Bigelow's Life of Tilden, making some necessary strictures; Francis A. Christie, Dr. Briggs's "Messiah of the Apostles," with such refreshing directness as we should expect from a critical historian dealing with a theological apologist. It may be objected that such a book as Dr. Briggs's does not come within the proper range of such a review as this; but it will do excellent service if in every number it brings to book some theologian who has endeavored to confuse the processes of dogmatism and science. The fourth volume of McMaster's "History of the United States" is criticised by Dr. C. H. Levermore, who is as free to praise or blame as if Prof. McMaster were not upon the editorial board. All the reviews are characterized by much fairness and ability.

Books Received.

From Wright & Potter, Boston.
The Annual Statistics of Manufactures, 1894. Ninth Report.
From Lee & Shepard, Boston.
Life and Light from Above. By Solon Lauer.
From E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.
The Rabbit Witch, and Other Tales. By Katharine Pyle. Price $1.50.
From Henry Holt & Co., New York.
A Man and his Womankind. By Nora Wynne. Price 75 cts.
From Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.
The Spirit of Judaism. By Josephine Lazarus.
From Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York.
Social Theory. A Grouping of Social Facts and Principles. By John Bascom. Price $1.75.
From Harper & Brothers, New York.
A Cumberland Vendetta, and Other Stories. By John Fox, Jr.
The Sowers. A Novel. By Henry Seton Merriman.
His Father's Son. By Brander Matthews.

The Story of the Other Wise Man. By Henry van Dyke. Mentone, Cairo, and Corfu. By Constance Fenimore Woolson.
Stops of Various Quills. By W. D. Howells. Illustrated by Howard Pyle.
From Macmillan & Co., New York.
Julian Home. A Tale of College Life. By Frederic W. Farrar. Illustrated by Stanley Berkeley. Price $2.00.
Inmates of my House and Garden. By Mrs. Brightwen. Price $1.25.
The Oxford Church Movement. Sketches and Recollections by the late G. Wakeling. With an Introduction by Earl Nelson. Price $2.25.
The Poetical Works of Alfred Lord Tennyson. Juvenalia. Price 45 cents.
The Poetical Works of Alfred Lord Tennyson. The Lady of Shalott, and Other Poems. Price 45 cents.
From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.
Papers of the American Society of Church History. Vol. VII.
Cherryfield Hall. An Episode in the Career of an Adventuress. By Frederic Henry Balfour.
From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.
The Art of Living. By Robert Grant. Price $2.50.
Cousin Anthony and I. By Edward Sandford Martin. Price $1.25.
Miss Jerry. By Alexander Black. Price $1.00.
From A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago.
Recollections of Abraham Lincoln. 1847-1865. By Ward Hill Lamon. Edited by Dorothy Lamon. Price $1.50.
The Journal of Countess Françoise Krasinska, Great Grandmother of Victor Emanuel. Translated from the Polish by Kasimir Dzikowska. Price $1.25.
Beatrice of Bayou Teche. By Alice Ilgenfritz Jones. Price $1.25.
Menticulture, or The a-b-c of True Living. By Horace Fletcher. Price $1.00.
Knowledge and Culture. By Henry Matson. Price 75 cents.
Number 49 Tinkham Street. By C. Emma Cheney. Price $1.00.
The Child's Garden of Song. Selected and arranged by William L. Tomlins. With Designs by Ella Ricketts. Price $2.00.

"THE CENTURY stands at the head of the world's periodicals, and its leadership in ideas, interest, and merit was never more positive than it is to-day."—From a recent notice in the Baltimore American.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE,

With the number for November, 1895, celebrates its twenty-fifth anniversary with a number of great beauty and interest, beginning the use of new paper and a new font of type. In this issue are first chapters of

The New Novel by Mrs. Humphry Ward.

All serial rights in this novel, for America and England, have been secured by The Century. The "Anniversary Number" contains also:

A New Story by Bret Harte.

"THE ARMENIAN QUESTION,"
By Hon. James Bryce, M. P.

"THE ISSUES OF 1896":
The Republican View, by Hon. Theo. Roosevelt.
The Democratic View, by Hon. Wm. E. Russell.

ILLUSTRATED ARTICLES.

"The Painter Vibert," by himself; "Robert Louis Stevenson, and His Writing," by Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer; "Mural Decoration in America," with illustrations by La Farge, Sargent, Abbey, Simmons, and Dewing; a superb frontispiece from Titian, engraved by Cole, etc.

"EQUALITY AS THE BASIS OF GOOD SOCIETY," BY W. D. HOWELLS.

Opening of the New Napoleon Series,
"NAPOLEON I., EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH."

With many other features of great interest.

THE COMING YEAR

of The Century will contain a great number of attractions, many of which cannot yet be announced. Besides the novel by Mrs. Humphry Ward, there will be printed

VOL. LI, No. 1. NOVEMBER, 1895. PRICE, 35 CENTS.

THE CENTURY ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY MAGAZINE

MACMILLAN AND CO. BEDFORD ST. LONDON THE CENTURY CO. UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

THE CENTURY CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

Old Dutch and Flemish Masters.

Exquisite engravings by Timothy Cole, with text by Prof. J. C. Van Dyke. $7.50. (Two editions de luxe.)

Electricity for Everybody.

Written in a popular style for the unscientific public, by Philip Atkinson; 100 illustrations. $1.50.

Life in the Tuileries under the Second Empire.

Interesting reminiscences of a lady who resided with a family of the Court of Napoleon III.; illus. $2.25.

Fiction.

Mrs. Burton Harrison's new novel, "An Errant Wooing," richly illustrated, $1.50; "The Princess Sonia," a romance of girl art-life in Paris, by Julia Magruder, illustrated by Gibson, $1.25; "Kitwyk Stories," village life in Holland, by Anna Eichberg King, illustrated, $1.50.

Washington in Lincoln's Time.

Recollections of Lincoln and other statesmen, by Noah Brooks. $1.25.

Small Books in Exquisite Bindings.

"Rivalries of Long and Short Codiac," by George

Wharton Edwards; "A Madeira Party," by Dr. S. Weir Mitchell; "Notes of a Professional Exile," by E. S. Nadal; each in stamped leather, 5½ x 3, $1.00.

READY NOVEMBER 10th.

The Second Jungle Book.

By Rudyard Kipling, containing his new Jungle Stories, illustrated by Mr. Kipling's father. $1.50.

Municipal Government in Continental Europe.

By Dr. Albert Shaw. Invaluable to all interested in municipal reform. $2.00.

Personal Memoirs of U. S. Grant.

New and beautiful edition, revised by Col. F. D. Grant. New plates, new illustrations, 2 vols., 1000 pages, cloth, $5.00. Fine bindings at $10.00 and $15.00.

Mary Ronald's Century Cook Book.

A new cook book, with many novel features, including 150 photographs of dishes. Economy and the resources of the average kitchen kept in mind. $2.00.

THE LEADING CHILDREN'S BOOKS.—NOW READY.

Jack Ballister's Fortunes.

Written and illustrated by Howard Pyle. $2.00.

Chris and the Wonderful Lamp.

An Arabian Nights story, illustrated, $1.50.

The Brownies Through the Union.

A new Brownie book, by Palmer Cox, $1.50.

St. Nicholas Bound Volumes.

The numbers for '95, in two parts; 1000 pages, $4.00.

A Boy of the First Empire.

A story-life of Napoleon, by E. S. Brooks. $1.50.

Hero Tales from American History.

By Theo. Roosevelt and Henry Cabot Lodge. Famous battles, etc. Illustrated, $1.50.

The Horse Fair.

Stories of horses, by James Baldwin. $1.50.

ST. NICHOLAS FOR YOUNG FOLKS, CONDUCTED BY MARY MAPES DODGE.

THE twenty-third year of this famous magazine, recognized alike in England and America as "the king of all periodicals for girls and boys," begins with November, 1895. "No cultivated home where there are young people is complete without it." The program for 1896 includes a delightful series of letters to young people written by Robert Louis Stevenson from his Samoan home. Rudyard Kipling, whose first Jungle Stories appeared in ST. NICHOLAS, will write for it in 1896, and James Whitcomb Riley, the Hoosier poet, will contribute a delightful poem to the Christmas number. Mrs. Burton Harrison, Tudor Jenks, John Burroughs, George Parsons Lathrop, Noah Brooks and Laurence Hutton are among other well-known writers who will write for it.

The serial stories include "The Swordmaker's Son," a story of boy-life at the time of the founding of Christianity, by W. O. Stoddard; "The Prize Cup," one of J. T. Trowbridge's best stories; a three-part serial for girls by Sarah Orne Jewett, etc. "Talks with Children About Themselves" will be a feature of the year.

$1,000 in Prizes will be given during the coming year. Full particulars in the November number. Be sure to get this great issue on any news-stand or subscribe for the year. The volume begins with November; December is the great Christmas issue. A year's subscription costs $3.00. All dealers and the publishers take subscriptions, and remittance may be made by check, draft, money-order, or express-order.

PUBLISHED BY THE CENTURY CO., UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s Holiday Books.

Holiday Books.

The Works of John Burroughs.

New Riverside Edition. With several portraits of Burroughs and engraved title-pages. Printed from new type on paper of the best quality, and bound in a style combining simplicity and elegance. In 9 vols., 12mo, $13.50 net, the set. (Sold only in sets.)

Standish of Standish.

A beautiful Holiday Edition of this popular historical novel by Mrs. JANE G. AUSTIN, author of "A Nameless Nobleman," etc. With 20 exquisite full-page photogravure illustrations by FRANK T. MERRILL. 2 vols., 12mo, tastefully bound, $5.00.

Mrs. Jameson's Works on Art.

Sacred and Legendary Art. 2 vols. Legends of the Monastic Orders. Legends of the Madonna. Memoirs of the Early Italian Painters. Edited by Miss ESTELLE M. HURLL, with a memoir and portrait of Mrs. Jameson. 5 vols. crown octavo, bound in simple but artistic style. Each volume contains nearly 100 illustrations, selected from the works of great masters. $3.00 a volume; $15.00 the set.

Mr. Rabbit at Home.

A Sequel to "Little Mr. Thimblefinger and his Queer Country." By JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS. With 25 capital illustrations by OLIVER HERFORD. Square 8vo, bound in very attractive style, $2.00.

The Song of Hiawatha.

A Popular Holiday Edition of Longfellow's unique Indian poem, with 22 full-page illustrations by FREDERIC REMINGTON. Crown 8vo, $2.00.

The Courtship of Miles Standish.

A beautiful Popular Holiday Edition of LONGFELLOW's famous Pilgrim poem, with many illustrations by GEORGE H. BOUGHTON, F. T. MERRILL, and others. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

The Madonna of the Tubs.

New Popular Edition of one of Miss PHELPS's most striking and touching stories. With illustrations. Uniform with Mrs. Wiggins' "The Birds' Christmas Carol." 75 cents.

Poetry.

A Victorian Anthology.

Selections illustrating the Editor's critical review of British poetry in the reign of Victoria ["Victorian Poets"]. Selected and edited by E. C. STEDMAN. With brief biographies of the authors quoted, a fine frontispiece portrait of Queen Victoria, and a vignette of the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey. Large crown 8vo, bound in attractive library style, $2.50; full gilt, $3.00; half calf, $4.50; full levant, $6.00.

Robert Browning.

Complete Poetic and Dramatic Works. Cambridge Edition. A wonderful piece of book-making, printed from clear type, on opaque paper, and attractively bound. With Biographical Sketch, Notes, Indexes, a fine new portrait and vignette of Asolo. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $3.00; half calf, gilt top, $5.00; tree calf or full levant, $7.00.

Last Poems of James Russell Lowell.

Edited by Professor NORTON. With a fine New Portrait and rubricated title and initials. Printed in artistic style, and exquisitely bound in polished buckram. 12mo, $1.25.

Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Complete Poetical Works. Cambridge Edition. Uniform with the Cambridge Editions of LONGFELLOW and WHITTIER. With Biographical Sketch, Notes, Indexes, a Steel Portrait, and engraved title. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $2.00; half calf, gilt top, $3.50; tree calf or full levant, $5.50.

The Whittier Year Book.

Passages from the Verse and Prose of JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER. Carefully printed and tastefully bound, with a fine new Portrait of Whittier. 16mo, $1.00.

Ballads of Blue Water, and Other Poems.

By JAMES JEFFREY ROCHE. 16mo, gilt top, $1.25.

A volume of spirited and genuinely lyrical poems, many of them relating to the sea, and of unusual excellence.

The Singing Shepherd, and Other Poems.

By ANNIE FIELDS. 16mo, uncut edges, paper label, $1.00.

A delightful volume of thoughtful, lyrical poems.

The Tower, with Legends and Lyrics.

By Mrs. EMMA HUNTINGTON NASON. 16mo, gilt top, $1.25.

Poems varied in subject and form, flowing, thoughtful, and musical.

Mrs. Stoddard's Poems.

A beautiful volume, printed from type, containing the noteworthy poems of Mrs. ELIZABETH D. B. STODDARD. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.50.

Biography and History.

Letters of Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

By ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE. With 16 portraits and other illustrations. 2 vols., 8vo, gilt top, $6.00; half calf, $10.50.

The Critic of New York says that "no student of Coleridge or of the romantic period can afford to be without this book."

Letters of Celia Thaxter.

A memorial of the life Mrs. Thaxter led on Appledore in the charming island garden which she created, and also in the delightful visits with which she gladdened her friends. Edited by A. F. and R. L. With three portraits. 12mo, gilt top, $1.50.

As Others Saw Him.

A Retrospect. A.D. 54. 16mo, $1.25.

"A remarkable reconstruction of the life of Christ as seen through the eyes of a Jew of his day."—I. Zangwill.

Townsend Harris, First American Envoy in Japan.

By WILLIAM E. GRIFFIS, D.D., author of "Japan: In History, Folk-lore, and Art," "The Lily among Thorns," "Brave Little Holland," etc. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, $2.00.

"To read it is to gain a fresh zest for Japanese affairs, and to become informed concerning the important events during a long chapter of Japanese history heretofore lacking."—New York Observer.

Half a Century with Judges and Lawyers.

By JOSEPH A. WILLARD, Clerk of the Superior Court, Boston. 16mo, $1.25.

These reminiscences will all be welcome, first to the legal profession, who take peculiar pleasure in the bright stories which belong to their guild, and, secondly, to all who enjoy good stories, by whomsoever told.

The Mississippi Basin.

The Struggle in America between England and France. 1697-1763. With full Cartographical Illustrations from Contemporary Sources. By JUSTIN WINSOR, author of "Christopher Columbus," etc. 8vo, gilt top, $4.00.

"The tale that was told from Cartier to Frontenac is continued in this welcome volume.... We find Mr. Winsor working in his own best vein in this volume, and that best gives us the very pith of history."—New York Evening Post.

Gustavus Adolphus.

A History of the Art of War from its revival after the Middle Ages to the end of the Spanish Succession War. With 234 charts, maps, plans of battles, and tactical manoeuvres and cuts of uniforms and weapons. By THEODORE AYRAULT DODGE. 8vo, $5.00.

Reconstruction during the Civil War in the United States of America.

By EBEN GREENOUGH SCOTT. Large crown 8vo, $2.00.

An important work discussing many questions raised by the War for the Union and its successful issue.

American History.

By John Fiske.

The Discovery of America.

With some account of Ancient America and the Spanish Conquest. With a steel portrait of Mr. Fiske, many maps, facsimiles, etc. Thirteenth thousand. 2 vols., crown 8vo, $4.00.

A very cyclopaedia of information on all subjects connected with its main theme, written by a man whose grasp is comprehensive, and whose knowledge is commensurate with his grasp.—London Times.

The American Revolution.

With Plans of Battles, and a new steel portrait of Washington. Tenth thousand. 2 vols., crown 8vo, gilt top, $2.00.

The Critical Period of American History, 1783-1789.

With a colored map. Sixteenth thousand. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $2.00.

The War of Independence.

In Riverside Library for Young People. Maps. Twenty-second thousand. 75 cents.

The Beginnings of New England.

Twelfth thousand. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $2.00.

History of the United States for Schools.

By JOHN FISKE. Very fully illustrated with maps, portraits, etc. 12mo, $1.00 net.

The fulness of its information and the charm of its style make it peculiarly interesting for general readers.

Civil Government in the United States.

With some reference to its origin. 12mo, $1.00 net.

"The reader may turn over these volumes with full assurance of faith for a fresh rehearsal of the old facts, which no time can stale, and for new views of those old facts, according to the larger framework of ideas in which they can now be set by the master of a captivating style and an expert in historical philosophy."—New York Evening Post.

Fiction.

A Gentleman Vagabond, and Some Others.

By F. HOPKINSON SMITH, author of "Colonel Carter of Cartersville." These stories are told in the most entertaining manner, as all will readily believe who have read Mr. Smith's other books. 16mo, $1.25. Large Paper Edition, a gem of book-making, $3.00.

A Singular Life.

By ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, author of "The Gates Ajar," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

Miss Phelps's best story.... Only a woman of genius, inspired by an intense sympathy with human needs, could have drawn this vivid picture of the Gloucester fishermen."—Woman's Journal.

The Village Watch-Tower.

By Mrs. WIGGIN, author of "The Birds' Christmas Carol," etc. 16mo, $1.00.

"Dainty and excellent work.... For directness, simplicity, and charm we think Mrs. Wiggins inimitable."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

Clarence.

A Novel. By BRET HARTE. 16mo, $1.25.

"Bret Harte's 'Clarence' is not only from a literary point of view the best story yet based upon events in the American Civil War, but it is also, considered in the light of its humanity, the manliest and tenderest work of fiction in that class."—New York World.

The Wise Woman.

By CLARA LOUISE BURNHAM, author of "Sweet Clover," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

"A fine production of the author's genius."—Boston Courier.

The Life of Nancy.

By SARAH ORNE JEWETT, author of "A Native of Winby," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

"Some of these New England tales are veritable little masterworks. There are nine of them, already known to magazine readers, but all worth reading again."—New York Times.

The Coming of Theodora.

By ELIZA ORNE WHITE, author of "Winter-borough," "When Molly was Six," etc. $1.25.

"She understands New England village life to a nicety, and her characters in their naturalness and simplicity of depiction are delightfully human."—Boston Beacon.

A Question of Faith.

A Novel by LILY DOUGALL, author of "Beggars All," "The Zeit-Geist," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

"The authoress has drawn her characters with telling force.... There are several excellent bits of description in the book which in all fairness should be rated as much more readable and more wholesome than most love stories of the day."—Boston Journal.

Daughters of the Revolution.

By CHARLES CARLETON COFFIN, author of "The Drum-beat of the Nation," etc. With illustrations. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

"Mr. Coffin's story is one of thrilling interest, and is at the same time an historically accurate presentation of the scenes, events, and the spirit of the people of the colonies at the fateful outbreak of the Revolution."—Boston Advertiser.

The Story of Christine Rochefort.

By HELEN CHOATE PRINCE. Third Edition. 16mo, $1.25.

"Mrs. Prince, grand-daughter of Rufus Choate, has written a novel particularly strong in its well-knit style.... The personal touches, scenes, and conversations are delightful."—Chicago Times-Herald.

"I like everything about it."—Horace Howard Furness.

Under the Man-Fig.

By M. E. M. DAVIS. 16mo, $1.25.

"A story of the old South by a writer who knows well how to use the rich material afforded by that picturesque time and people."—Nashville Banner.

A Soulless Singer.

By MARY CATHERINE LEE, author of "A Quaker Girl of Nantucket" and "In the Cheering-up Business." 16mo, $1.25.

"The story's motive is the power of human passion to give to a voice which is otherwise noble and well trained the quality of feeling, of soul, which is essential to the really great singer.... The story is well written."—Springfield Republican.

Stories of the Foot-hills.

By MARGARET C. GRAHAM. 16mo, $1.25.

"It is one of the delightful qualities of these stories that a very marked and creative individuality is so perfectly diffused that Margaret Graham is but a kind of climate in which some very interesting people live."—The Critic.

"This charming little volume has interested me greatly."—Beatrice Harraden, author of 'Ships that pass in the Night.'

Stories and Poems for Children.

A charming book for boys and girls, by CELIA THAXTER, author of "Among the Isles of Shoals," etc. Edited by SARAH ORNE JEWETT. With a frontispiece illustration. 12mo, $1.50; Holiday Juvenile style, $1.50.

The Nimble Dollar, with Other Stories.

By CHARLES MINER THOMPSON. With a frontispiece illustration. 16mo, $1.00.

"These stories appeal to the average reader by their obvious ingenuity and briskness; and they please the reflective by their clever management, their happy touches of observation and reflection, and their charming manner."—Boston Times.

Little Miss Phoebe Gay.

By HELEN DAWES BROWN, author of "The Petrie Estate," etc. With colored cover design and other illustrations. 16mo, $1.00.

A charming companion book to Miss White's "When Molly was Six," but intended for girls of ten years or thereabout.

Essays and Travel.

Anima Poetae.

Selections from the unpublished Note-Books of SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE. Edited by ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE. 8vo, uniform with Coleridge's Letters, $2.50.

A book in general character like Coleridge's famous "Table Talk." The topics treated or touched upon are varied, and all are marked by that affluence of intellectual light, that free play of imagination, and the literary charm which belong to Coleridge.

The Continuity of Christian Thought.

A Study of Modern Theology in the Light of History. By the Rev. A. V. G. ALLEN, D.D., Professor in the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge. New Edition, with a new preface and a full index. 12mo, gilt top, $2.00.

"A book the like of which is not to be found elsewhere, as far as we know, in the literature of our church."—American Literary Churchman.

The Land-Birds and Game-Birds of New England.

By HENRY D. MINOT. New Edition. Edited by WILLIAM BREWSTER. With Outline Illustrations. 8vo, $3.50.

This work was originally published some ten years ago, and has been accepted ever since as an authority on its special subject. The author having died several years since, a new edition has been prepared under the very competent editorial care of Mr. William Brewster, who is well known as one of the foremost naturalists of New England.

Selected Essays of James Darmesteter.

Translated from the French by HELEN B. JASTROW. Edited with an Introduction by MORRIS JASTROW, Jr., Professor in the University of Pennsylvania. With a Portrait. 12mo, $1.50.

"A book... for which to be profoundly glad, and one to pass along, whether we agree with all of it or only with a part."—The Nation, New York.

Russian Rambles.

By ISABEL F. HAPGOOD. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

"During the years she passed in the empire she learned and observed so much, which she tells so well, that she has given us a volume of distinctly exceptional merit."—New York Evening Post.

Essays in Miniature.

By AGNES REPPLIER, author of "In the Dozy Hours," "Essays in Idleness," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

"No matter what the subject on which she dwells for the moment, you who read her thoughts are always rewarded by a new note, an unexpected point of view, an original way of putting things."—Boston Herald.

Out of the East.

Reveries and Studies in New Japan. By LAF-CADIO HEARN. Attractively printed, with artistic binding. 16mo, $1.25.

"The student will welcome this work, not only as a cluster of literary gems, but also as a first-class contribution to the study of the Japanese mind."—Literary World.

This Goodly Frame the Earth.

Stray Impressions of Scenes, Incidents, and Persons in a Journey touching Japan, China, Egypt, Palestine, and Greece. By FRANCIS TIFFANY, author of "The Life of Dorothea Lynde Dix," "Life of Charles Francis Barnard," etc. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.50.

The book is written with so much sprightliness and humor that the reading of it is a delight.

The Life of the Spirit in the Modern English Poets.

By VIDA D. SCUDDER, Associate Professor of English Literature in Wellesley College. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.75.

"The interpretation it gives of the tendencies of modern English poetry is thoughtful and stimulating."—New York Tribune.

Latin Poetry.

By R. Y. TYRRELL, Professor in the University of Dublin. Crown 8vo, gilt top, $1.50.

"The volume ranks in interest and value with the preceding lectures by Mr. Stedman on the 'Nature and Elements of Poetry' and on 'Greek Poetry' by Professor Jebb. These chapters are delightful examples of literary analysis and criticism."—Literary World.

Christ's Idea of the Supernatural.

By Rev. JOHN H. DENISON, D.D. Crown 8vo, $2.00.

"The spirit of this work is admirable, the style is fine, and the thought can hardly fail to be of deep interest to the student of the New Testament, even though he finds many statements that he regards as open to criticism."—Philosophical Journal (Chicago).

The Christ of To-day.

By Rev. GEORGE A. GORDON, D.D., minister of the Old South Meeting-house, Boston. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

"This book takes at once a foremost place among the efforts of strong minds to interpret Christ anew to their own age."—Boston Herald.

Frail Children of the Air.

By SAMUEL H. SCUDDER, author of "The Butterflies of the Eastern United States and Canada," etc. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, in decorative binding, $1.50.

"A work characterized alike by the highest scientific quality and a direct adaptability to the needs of the individual student."—Boston Beacon.

Ten New England Blossoms and their Insect Visitors.

By CLARENCE M. WEED, Professor in the New Hampshire Agricultural College. With illustrations. Square 12mo, $1.25.

It is one of the most successful attempts to set forth in a popular way why the organs of plants have assumed their present form and texture and covering, and how nicely the habit and structure of their insect visitors are adjusted, so that plant and insect co-operate to meet each other's needs.—New York Garden and Forest.

A Century of Charades.

By WILLIAM BELLAMY. A hundred original charades, ingenious in conception and worked out with remarkable skill. Fifth thousand. 18mo, $1.00.

"The cleverest work of its kind known to English literature."—Henry A. Clapp, in Boston Advertiser.

For sale by all Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by the Publishers,

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., BOSTON.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.
OCTOBER.

BY KATHERINE S. MASON.

The hills look blue and strangely near,
Seen through this perfect atmosphere:
The light leaves, falling thickly down,
Fill all the ways with gold and brown.

In sheltered nooks belated flowers
Make summer of the sunny hours;
A summer chastened and more fair
Than August's sultry noontides are.

No hint of winter's frost or snow
Lurks in the sunshine's golden glow;
But all is soft and sweet and calm,
Like far-off lands of spice and palm.

O rare, ripe days! their radiant light
Makes every common pathway bright;
And sorrowing hearts, who will, may hear
Some words of hope that lift and cheer.

For the Christian Register.

BETTY'S BLAZING STAR.

BY DOROTHY E. NELSON.

Little Abigail Sweet was sitting out under the big elm, working on her sampler. The air was full of soft summer sounds; and, as the wind blew the grass in long ripples, it seemed as if the clover blossoms were dancing up to her feet; but she never looked at them. Her serious blue eyes were fixed on the straw-colored sampler and the patient black stitches she was setting in it. Her mother knew she could trust Abigail when she let her go out under the elm-tree.

Abigail was working the date,—July 18, 1768. When she finished that, she was going to put in the motto, "Learning is an ornament, a portion never to be spent"; and then there still would be room to put in a house and a tree and perhaps a rooster. Diantha Green had a beautiful red and brown rooster on hers, and had promised to show Abigail how to make one. The thought of that red and brown rooster cheered her through all the dull monotony of the alphabet and her name and age.

There was a little rush from the door, and Betty came out with her hands full of pieces. Betty was older than Abigail. Her sampler had been hanging in the best room for five years. She was making a quilt now to put away in her chest. She bent her dark brows discontentedly over the pieces. Finally, she threw them down impatiently. "Twere a fine thing to make a Blazing Star with such dull pieces," she exclaimed. "Twere better suited to call it the Thunder Storm."

Abigail lifted her serious eyes.

"Why, I think 'tis beautiful," she said in slow surprise.

"You!" returned Betty, scornfully. "What do you know about it? I tell you no girl in the village has such a horrid quilt! 'Tis not your fault, Abigail. You are too small to know."

Abigail said no more. She bent over her work, but there was a grieved expression about her childish mouth. Betty sat with her chin propped in her hand, looking gloomily at the pieces in her lap. Presently Deborah Green came up the path. A bag was swinging from her arm, and her round face was beaming with smiles. Betty sprang up in delight.

"O, Deborah!" she cried.

"Mother said I might spend the afternoon," said Deborah. She nodded to Abigail, and then sat down by Betty.

"What were you doing?" she asked.

"I purposed to make a Blazing Star," answered Betty, "but my pieces are all so dull! It needs yellow ones for these joins."

"That blue cheney is of a neat pattern," said Deborah.

"Yes, but 'tis so sombre."

"'Twould be pretty in my quilt," said Deborah, reflectively. "I know, Betty! My sister Lovis is making some new valances, and they're yellow. I will get you some pieces of those if you will give me some of your blue cheney."

"Oh, will you?" cried Betty, radiantly.

Deborah looked critically at Betty's pieces.

"Lovis's yellow is real India," she said. "'Tis far finer than this blue. 'Twere scarce fair to trade evenly." Her sentence trailed off into doubt as she looked up at Betty.

"Take all the blue," answered Betty, beginning to pick it out. "I am weary of the sight of it. But when can I get the yellow?"

"I fear mother will not let me come again soon," answered Deborah.

"Perchance I could walk home with you when you go," suggested Betty. "I'll ask mother."

She ran into the house, and found her mother; but she refused to let her go. "'Twere enough for you to have the afternoon with Deborah," she said; "there will be barely time for your tasks after that."

Betty walked slowly out to her guest. Abigail saw her sister's gloomy face, and her own grew shadowed. Her otherwise serene and happy little life faithfully reflected the lights and shadows of her sister's.

"Can't you go?" asked Deborah.

"No," answered Betty.

Deborah fingered the blue pieces longingly.

"I would I had known about the yellow," she said, "for I need the blue for to-morrow's piecing."

"I have scant time on Saturday," said Betty.

"'Twill be Saturday,—I forget. O Betty!"

"What is it?" asked Betty, looking up eagerly. She caught the note of hope in Deborah's voice.

Deborah glanced at Abigail. "Let us walk down the road a piece," she said, with an affectation of indifference.

The two girls walked down the shady road. When they were out of sight of the little figure under the elm, Deborah stopped. She looked cautiously around, but could see no one.

"I thought"—she began.

"What?" asked Betty, impatiently.

"I might—bring them, and give them to you after meeting."

"On the Sabbath?" asked Betty, in a shocked voice.

"And why not, pray?" returned Deborah, defiantly. "You need not look at them. Surely, 'twere no great sin to carry them home in your pocket!"

"But where could I get them?" said Betty, wavering.

"In the noon-house," answered Deborah.

Betty stood thinking. It seemed to her that she had never wanted anything as she wanted pieces of Lovis's yellow India bed-valances.

"Does your mother know why you wanted to walk home with me?" asked Deborah, suddenly.

"No," answered Betty.

"Then she would think I brought them to-day: she wouldn't ask you."

Still Betty hesitated. Finally she looked up, but she avoided meeting Deborah's eyes. "I will do it," she said.

"I might take mine to-day, then you need not bring them," suggested Deborah.

"Yes," answered Betty, eagerly, "Perchance that would be better."

The girls went back, and Deborah put the blue pieces in her bag. She did not stay very long after that: she was afraid Betty would take back the blue until she had seen the yellow. In her heart Deborah was a little doubtful about getting the yellow. But Betty had no such suspicion: she was only glad not to carry the blue to meeting.

When she dressed on the Sabbath, she tied her big pocket under her skirt. Abigail looked at her in surprise.

"Why are you putting on your pocket, Betty?" she asked.

"And why should I not?" asked Betty, impatiently. "You are ever asking questions, Abigail. Mother wears hers: why should not I?" But she crept guiltily downstairs, keeping the side where her pocket hung away from her mother. She felt as if her mother's eyes could see it through her dress.

As they reached the meeting-house door, the Greens were just coming up. Deborah gave her a triumphant little nod, and touched her dress. Betty's face flushed; and she hurried in, anxious to hide her burning cheeks in a corner of the big pew. But all through the sermon she could think only of the yellow pieces.

After the meeting was over, the people all went out to eat their lunches. The noon-house, a long, low building where they ate their lunch and warmed themselves in the winter, was quite deserted. The open door showed a dark, dismal interior; and a cool, musty draught met any one who looked in there. Betty tried to eat her pork and peas and gingerbread with the others; but she was not hungry, and as soon as she could do so she slipped away. Deborah was watching for her, and they crept unnoticed into the noon-house. Deborah reached into her pocket, and pulled out a roll of yellow pieces. It was a very small roll,—not half as many as Betty had given her.

"I would there were more," she said shamefacedly, "but Lovis could not spare many."

"'Tis no matter," answered Betty, taking the pieces nervously. It seemed as if that little yellow roll illumined the whole room. Her fingers trembled so that she could scarcely open her pocket. Deborah eyed her curiously as they went out into the light.

"How queer you look!" she said.

"Do I?" asked Betty, frightened.

"Yes, kind of red and white in spots!"

"I guess I'll go back to mother," Betty said.

She walked over to the group where her mother was, and stood silent beside her. Presently her mother looked at her.

"Are you sick, Betty?" she asked.

"I feel kind of—dizzy," answered Betty.

"Pep'mint's real good fur dizziness," said old Mrs. Baker. "I've got some here. I allus carry it."

Betty's mother gave her some peppermint, and they all looked at her with interest. "Do you feel better now?" they asked.

"Yes," said Betty, faintly. Then they all went in for the afternoon meeting.

As soon as Betty reached home, she slipped upstairs, and hid the yellow pieces. She felt better then, and almost persuaded herself that she had done nothing wrong. She wanted to look at the pieces, but she would not.

The next day she spread them out: there were not many, but they were very pretty. She sewed several of them, but, when she heard Abigail coming, she put them away, and took out some dark ones. Somehow, she didn't want Abigail to see them.

After a while the yellow pieces disturbed her less. She was quite proud of the effect of them, and yet even then there were times when she wished they were not there. But she had lost all fear of detection.

One afternoon her mother called her to go on an errand to a neighbor. She left her work hurriedly. Presently her mother saw it.

"Betty is making a handsome quilt," she said proudly. "I wonder where she got those yellow pieces. I never saw any like them. Do you know, Abigail?"

Abigail looked at the yellow pieces with frightened eyes. She remembered about Deborah and Betty's wearing her pocket, and how strangely she had acted that Sabbath; and she could not look at her mother. Her faithful little heart took Betty's sin to herself, and she looked the picture of guilt. But she did not know anything, and she would not betray Betty.

"No, mother," she said in a low, shamed voice.

Her mother glanced at her sharply. "Abigail Sweet, you are not telling me the truth," she said sternly. "I will ask you once more, and only once. Do you know where Betty got those pieces?"

Abigail lifted her eyes to her mother. They were full of pitiful pleading. "Truly, mother, I know not," she said.

"That will do, Abigail Sweet," answered her mother. "I care naught about the thing, 'tis that a child of mine should tell a lie. Instead of working pictures on your sampler, you may work this: 'Lying lips are an abomination unto the Lord.' Now go. Begin at once."

Abigail went miserably over to the settle. Usually she worked under the elm, but she felt as if the burden of those terrible words would be heavier out in the sunshine. She tried to work faithfully, but her tears fell so fast that she had only formed the L when Betty came in an hour later. Betty looked at her in surprise.

"Don't speak to Abigail," said her mother. "She is in disgrace. She told me a lie."

"Abigail!" exclaimed Betty.

"Yes. I asked her where you got the yellow pieces in your quilt, and she said she did not know; but her looks belied her. I have given her a text to work in her sampler. She will have no room for pictures now." The mother's voice was hard and tense. No one knew how the sight of the pitiful little figure, trying so patiently to work in spite of tear-blinded eyes, cut her heart.

Betty stood still. It seemed as if something was choking her.

"Mother," she cried desperately, "Abigail told you no lie. She didn't know,—she but guessed. Deborah Green gave them to me."

"Then why did she not say so?" asked her mother astonished.

Betty caught hold of the table, and looked up at her mother with a white, resolute face. "Because," she said, "Deborah brought them to me on the Sabbath. She gave them to me in the noon-house. I had my pocket, and brought them home. Abigail wanted to know why I wore my pocket, and I would not tell."

"You got them on the Sabbath!" repeated her mother.

"Yes," answered Betty, wretchedly.

"Elizabeth Sweet, go and bring down those pieces, and rip out every bit of yellow, and then take them back to Deborah. Glad am I that you told me. Such a quilt would be a disgrace to any girl."

Betty went upstairs, and ripped out the pieces. It took her a long time, for her stitches had been fine and strong. When she came down, Abigail was ripping out the letter "L."

"Now, Betty, you must tell Deborah why you return them. And I shall give you some brown to put in their place, to serve as a reminder to you always."

"Yes, mother," said Betty, humbly.

As she reached the door, she looked back. "May I borrow Diantha's sampler for Abigail?" she asked.

"Well, 'twill do no harm," answered her mother. "She'll be ready for it to-morrow."

Betty went slowly down the road to the Greens'. Diantha met her at the door.

"I've brought back your pieces," she said. "Mother made me because I got them on the Sabbath."

"But you've used them," said Deborah, curiously.

"Yes. I had to take them out."

"I'm real sorry for you," said Deborah, "but I'm glad to have the yellow. Lovis would give me no more. I think 'twas downright stingy of her. I s'pose you'll want yours back?" she added, grudgingly.

"No, keep them," answered Betty.

"'Tis real good of you. 'Twas a pity you had to take them all out."

"Oh, I didn't mind so much," said Betty. "Can I borrow Diantha's sampler for Abigail?"

"Why, of course," answered Deborah. "What a queer girl you are, Betty! I would be real mad."

But Betty walked home with Diantha's

There is no mystery about

Sunlight Soap

it is simply a clear, pure, honest soap for laundry and household use, made by the most approved processes, and being the best, it has the largest sale in the world. It is made in a twin bar for convenience sake.

This shows

The Twin Bar

Use will reveal

The Twin Benefits:

Less labor
Greater comfort
Lever Bros., Ltd.,
Hudson & Harrison Sts., New York.

sampler in her hand, and her heart was full of sunshine that not even the gloom of the sombre pieces in her quilt could shadow.

THE NEW BOY AT FAIRMONT.

"Hello, fellows! The doctor says we can go to the pond," announced Ben McKay, on his way through the school play-room.

"But he told us to ask Mr. Finley if the ice would bear," added Ben's younger brother Will, following close at his heels.

"What do you say to going along, Jack?" asked Ben of the new boy. Jack Shippe had been at school only a few days; and he had kept so quiet and so much to himself that the others had nicknamed him "Softy," and had said there was nothing in that chap.

But he had brought a fine pair of skates along, and seemed ready enough to join Ben's party. The pond was two miles away, and the boys trotted off over the snow at such a lively pace that they were in a fine glow by the time they reached it.

"Bother! Why didn't we bring a broom?" said Ben. "This skim of snow is going to make things rough."

"We forgot to ask the farmer if the ice would bear," said the new boy, opening his lips for the first time.

"So we did!" exclaimed the rest, looking blankly at one another.

"Oh, well, it is too late to go back now," said Ben. "We can find out for ourselves."

"I'm going back," said the new boy, shortly.

"I wouldn't be such a molly-coddle!" cried Ben. "I believe you are afraid. See here! I'll show you how strong this ice is." And he slid on it for a foot or two.

"You can believe what you like," said Jack, coolly. "I'm going back."

The others couldn't have had much fun on the ice, after all; for nothing was said about it when they got back to the Study Hall.

But, before the ten o'clock bell tapped as a signal for bedtime, Will hurried up from his desk to the platform. The doctor was confined to his room with acute bronchitis, and Mrs. Maxwell was keeping order in Study Hall for him.

"Mrs. Maxwell," said Will, in a very unhappy voice, "please come and see what is the matter with Ben. He is sitting down there, just shaking all over, and behaving as queer as anything."

No wonder! Poor Ben had a tremendous chill on him, which was immediately followed by a hot fever, delirium, and pain in his side. Then it came out that he had broken through the ice.

"How can I get the doctor?" cried Mrs. Maxwell, in distress. Her husband was too sick to be disturbed; and the hired man had asked to go off for the night,—this of all nights! Dr. Alexander lived two miles from the school.

"I'll go for him," said Jack, promptly.

"You, Jack? Why, you don't even know the way!"

"Yes, I do!" he answered. "The boys showed me the place when we were going to the post-office."

He was already buttoning up his overcoat; and, before Mrs. Maxwell could feel sure that she ought to let him go, he was off. Several other boys volunteered then, but Jack was on the road before they could get ready.

Ben heard the offer, and knew who it was that had gone for the doctor; and his excited and unsettled imagination gave him wild visions of the trip. He raved about the snow-covered roads, the dark way through the woods, the slippery foot-bridge to cross. Every little while he would cry out that Jack was lost, that he was drowned, that he was buried under the snow, that something had caught him in the woods, until his companions felt the cold chills creep down their spines.

But Jack got back safe and sound, snugly tucked under the doctor's buffalo-robe; and poor Ben was soon relieved by the doctor's wise skill.

From that very night the new boy lost his nickname of "Softy." He lost it on that cold, snowy, lonesome walk to Dr. Alexander's; and his loss was the school's gain, for our boys found something that same night. They found this,—that a boy who refuses to do wrong is, nine times out of ten, both the bravest and tenderest boy of the crowd.—The Morning Star.

A BRAVE WOMAN.

In 1819 John H. Eiffert, who lived in Lexington County, South Carolina, died, and left surviving him his widow and three infant children. During his lifetime he was in very good circumstances, and he was believed to be entirely solvent; but, after his death, his estate was subjected to the payment of security debts, and it was soon discovered that nothing would be left for his widow and children. Mrs. Eiffert was left without money and without friends; and, believing that she could better provide for her children by leaving the State and going into a new country, she determined to go into the Far West, although, as there were no railroad facilities in those days, she knew that she would have to make the trip in a one-horse wagon.

Accordingly, in 1820 she put her little children—John Henry, John Jacob, and James John, whose ages ranged from six to twelve years—into a one-horse wagon, and drove out of the State of South Carolina into a country wholly unknown to her; and not a word was heard from her nor any of her children until the year 1889.

In September, 1889, an old gray-haired gentleman got off the train in the town of Leesville, S.C., and made diligent inquiry of the old people of that town concerning the old homestead of John H. Eiffert; and, after much trouble, he at last succeeded in locating the old place about seven or eight miles north of Leesville. Probably he would not have succeeded in finding the old place at all but for his recollection of a little branch, a spring, and a mound of earth near which the remains of John H. Eiffert were interred, a short distance from the place where the old dwelling-house was standing when Mrs. Eiffert left it.

This old gray-haired gentleman, who was a stranger to every person in Lexington County, was the same little James John Eiffert whom his mother carried out of South Carolina in a one-horse wagon when he was only six years old. From him it was learned that Mrs. Eiffert continued her journey for hundreds of miles, camping out in the wild woods in the night-time; that is, she travelled through the States of Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and into the Indian Territory, where she settled down among the Indians, who were numerous in those days, and who were very kind to her. After her children were large enough to help her, she removed from the Indian Territory to the State of Illinois, where she died in the year 1850, leaving her three children still surviving.

How many men or women in 1820 would have undertaken to drive a one-horse wagon, with three little children, from South Carolina into the Indian Territory, camping in the wild woods in the night-time, alone and unprotected? E. T. G.

CAN A DOG THINK?

That is the question our teacher asked in school one morning. Some of us said "yes," some "no." I believe, when you hear about Carlo, you will say "yes."

Carlo used to live with Uncle Lewis and grandma in the city six miles from here. We all go often to see them; but one day, some years ago, it happened that papa went alone. He went in the sleigh.

It was a cold day; and Carlo was sitting in front of the fire, not far from grandma's chair. Then, when she got up, he was right in her way. Now, grandma is the only one in all our family that is not fond of a dog or cat. Papa never told us all she said about Carlo, but I know something she did say. It was, "Stephen [papa's name was Stephen], I am going to get rid of this tiresome dog. He is old and worthless; and cold days he is always in the house, round the fire."

"I should be glad to have him," said papa. "The children are so fond of him, and so am I. Lewis has often said we could have him; and I've tried to coax him to go with me, but he never would. I don't believe it is any use to try again."

"A HAND SAW IS A GOOD THING, BUT NOT TO SHAVE WITH."

SAPOLIO

IS THE PROPER THING FOR HOUSE-CLEANING.

"Well," said grandma, "I shan't keep him. I told Lewis so this morning."

Just then Uncle Lewis came in, and no more was said about Carlo. When papa came away, he thought he would try to coax him to come; but he could not find him.

But, when he was in the sleigh, and all ready to drive away, there was Carlo under the seat. And, if ever eyes spoke, said papa, his said, "Do keep me!"

How glad we children were to see him! He has lived with us ever since. And he does not seem old at all. He is very useful. He is always glad to ride, and capers when he sees the horses harnessed; but—here is the brightest thing—he never will go to the city where grandma lives. We have tried him over and over again; but he seems to know we are going there, and refuses to go.

Now, does not Carlo think?—Pamela McArthur Cole, in Little Men and Women.

AN INTELLIGENT HORSE.

Farmer William H. Ellis of Bloomingburg, N.Y., owns a little white mare called Whitefoot. Every school-day morning Whitefoot hauls Mr. Ellis's two little girls in a wagon to the school-house, a mile from home; and, after leaving the children there, the little mare turns round, and trots back to her master's house without any driver. When the school-closing hour approaches, Mr. Ellis hitches Whitefoot up and starts her off alone for the school-house, and in due time she comes back with the little girls. She is so careful and expert in passing vehicles on the road that she never has a collision or damages her harness.

On Sunday night last Mr. Ellis's hired man drove Whitefoot over to Middleton on his way to New York. Before embarking on the cars here, he tacked a piece of paper on the wagon seat, containing this notice: "Don't stop this mare. She belongs to William H. Ellis, Bloomingburg, and will go home all right"; and then, turning the mare's head homeward, he let her go. Sure enough, she covered the distance—a long nine miles—in safety, and at a pace that brought her home in about an hour.—Massachusetts Ploughman.

Church Finances Greatly Augmented.

To fill your church with interested people is the way to have a healthy treasury. This is easily done by using the masterpieces of the world to proclaim the gospel to the eye as well as speak it to the ear. Everybody sings the gospel from the lantern screen.

Write for pamphlet, "Solved; or, The Sunday Evening Problem." Read its hints, and the actual experience of pastors who have tried the new plan. It is mailed for the asking. Illustrated catalogue 20 cents.

RILEY BROTHERS,

Branches: 16 Beekman St., New York. BOSTON: 244 Washington St. CHICAGO: 196 La Salle St. KANSAS CITY (Mo.): 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS: 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA: 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO: 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND: 411 Couch St.

◆ Its Screw and Plunge Lift (a) for regulating Wick; Its Lift Attachment (b) for Lighting Without Removing Chimney; with other Original Improvements, combine to make the

READY TO LIGHT, WITHOUT REMOVING CHIMNEY.

MILLER Lamp
Superior to All Others.

Illustrated Catalogue Sent Free.
EDWARD MILLER & CO.,
MILL AND FACTORIES, MERIDEN, CONN. 63 Pearl St., Boston.

The Salt "just as good" as "Yorkshire" does not exist. If your dealer offers a substitute, say you want Bradley's "Yorkshire" Salt —let some one else have the "just as good."

For the dairy it is supreme, for it is the only salt absolutely free from lime, and the only brand (without damaging adulterations) that won't lump and harden. We will send you a sample bag free if you will send your address.

BRADLEY SALT CO.,

49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

1847 Rogers Bros.

Make sure of the "1847" if you wish the genuine original Rogers Silverware.

Silver Plate that Wears

Meriden Britannia Company

MERIDEN, CONN.
208 Fifth Ave., NEW YORK.

Henry F. Miller
Piano-fortes.

Henry F. Miller & Sons Piano Co.
88 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

MECHANICS' FAIR, BOSTON

BEST Mechanical, Artistic, and Educational Exhibition ever given in New England.

PUBLIC appreciation manifested by a larger attendance than ever before.

FOUR CONCERTS DAILY. ADMISSION 25 CTS.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL
FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.
Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D.
REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.
Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address
JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS
in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address
HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.
SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address
E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.
Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y.
MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

New York, N.Y., 11 West 86th St.
THE JACOTOT SCHOOL. (adj. Central Park). A Boarding & Day School for Girls. Mlle. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Fall term begins Oct. 1. Kindergarten begins Oct. 15.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION
for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

STEVENSON'S YOUTHFULNESS.

In those early days he suffered many indignities on account of his extreme youthfulness of appearance and absence of self-assertion. He was at Inverness,—being five or six and twenty at the time,—and had taken a room in a hotel. Coming back about dinner-time, he asked the hour of the table d'hôte, whereupon the landlady said, in a motherly way, "Oh, I knew you wouldn't like to sit in there among the grown-up people, so I've had a place put for you in the bar." There was a frolic at the Royal Hotel, Bathgate, in the summer of 1879. Louis was lunching alone; and the maid, considering him an eligible quantity, came and leaned out of the window. This outrage on the proprieties was so stinging that Louis at length made free to ask her, with irony, what she was doing there. "I'm looking for my lad," she replied. "Is that he?" asked Stevenson, with keener sarcasm. "Weel, I've been lookin' for him a' my life, and I've never seen him yet," was the response. Louis was disarmed at once, and wrote her on the spot some beautiful verses in the vernacular. "They're no bad for a beginner," she was kind enough to say when she had read them.—Edmund Gosse, in the Century.

DR. FRANK C. BURRINGTON.

Dr. Frank C. Burrington has recently died in Windsor, Vt. He was a son of L. M. Burrington and Elizabeth M. Brewster, and was born in Hartland, Nov. 8, 1867. He prepared for college at Dean Academy, Franklin, Mass., and entered upon a course of study in Tufts College. He began the study of medicine with his uncle, Dr. Brewster, after leaving college, and later graduated from the University of New York Medical College with the highest honors. Soon after graduating he received an appointment in the Hartford (Conn.) hospital, of which he was house surgeon at the time he was taken ill in June last. Death ensued from quick consumption following upon a severe attack of pneumonia. Dr. Burrington was a young man of fine ability, both natural and cultivated, and until stricken down with illness had apparently a brilliant future before him. His death is truly untimely, and his many friends will sincerely mourn his loss.

MRS. JAMES P. WALKER.

The death of Mrs. Walker at the Nervine Asylum, Jamaica Plain, on the 30th of September, will recall to many readers of the Register the prominence and interest her husband once had in the affairs of our body. Immediately upon his death, called to self-support, she opened a school for girls and boys in Jamaica Plain, which successive generations of children for twenty years will remember with gratitude and affection. Mrs. Walker made the school a real home, with the first demand for a pure atmosphere, and for the training of character, and then mental training. One who knows better than all others of the school almost from its beginning says, "I can speak from experience of the generous hospitality and quick sympathy of her large heart."

She bore with uncomplaining fortitude the sudden death of her sweet and gifted daughter; but it was an unceasing strain upon her life-strings, and just a year after she fell asleep. Her funeral was from the Parish House of the Jamaica Plain Church; and her minister, Rev. Mr. Dole, paid a tender tribute to her gracious and devoted life.

Charities and Reforms.

Finland has an Elizabeth Fry,—a Miss Wrede. For the past twelve years she has visited every prison and every prisoner in Finland, at least once a year; and many of the most hardened criminals have been reclaimed to useful lives through her efforts. Her mission absorbs her entire time.

The subject of public baths maintained at municipal expense is one that commands public attention. That we are so slow in the United States to establish such baths in our large cities is the more surprising since they have proved such successes in many foreign cities. In Leeds, Huddersfield, and Bradford, England, the public baths and wash-houses have had a positive effect on the public health, actually reducing the number of applications for admittance to the hospitals.—The Outlook.

The Woman's Improvement League of Minneapolis, Minn., is engaged in carrying out plans for the beautifying of the city and bettering the condition of its people. Shade-trees have been set out on several streets.

7,108 school children have been furnished with flower-seeds, with instructions how to use them for the best results. They intend also to interest the children in exterminating the Russian thistle. The League will soon open cheap bath-rooms with competent persons in charge.

The charity organization society of New York is calling attention to the work-rooms for unskilled women, which were established by them a few years ago. One object of these work-rooms is to train women to do better work, but it is also designed to furnish work for deserving applicants. The enterprise thus far has been successful, the weekly attendance averaging from 50 in warm weather to 130 and 140 in winter. The plan has been found good of selling tickets at 50 cents apiece, to be given to worthy applicants for aid. These tickets entitle the holder to a day's work, a hot meal, and, as wages, some clothing or food enough for five persons for one day. Some societies and churches use the tickets, and it is hoped that gradually other work-rooms of the same sort will be started in other quarters.

Science.

It is proposed by means of the electro-telephone to connect London's churches and chapels with the hospitals, so that the sermons preached each Sunday may be heard by the patients without leaving their beds.

Acetylene, the brilliant new gas, can be easily liquefied and stored until needed. When it is to be used, the pressure is lessened; and it becomes gaseous again. It gives more than ten times the light of coal-gas burned in the best burners.

In about twenty-two seconds a drop of blood goes the round of the body. In about every two minutes the entire blood in the body makes the round through the right side of the heart, the lungs, to the left side of the heart, through the arteries, the veins, again to the heart.—The American.

Scientists are greatly interested in the phenomena occurring at the town of Pinotep, State of Oaxaca, Mexico, where since November 2, of last year, not a day has passed without an earthquake shock. People have abandoned their stone houses, and are living in huts made of wood and matting.

Aluminum is not proving to be of such value for surgical instruments as was expected. To be sure, it does not oxidize; but it is deficient in elasticity, and stays bent after pressure. It is also so light that the surgeon does not feel as if he had hold of anything when grasping a knife made of it.—Medical Times.

Temperance.

The Belgian government has ordered hung in every school-room the following placard: Of 125,000 deaths, as many as 25,000, or one-fifth, are the result of alcoholism. In a period during which the population has increased by 14 per cent., the consumption of alcohol has been augmented by 37 per cent., cases of madness by 45 per cent., crimes by 74 per cent., suicides by 80 per cent., and vagrants and beggars by 156 per cent.

The Council of the Church of England Temperance Society have submitted a scheme to their various branches, in which they invite all the members to concentrate their efforts on the following reforms: to remove clubs and friendly societies from public houses; to do away with statute fairs, village feasts, hirings, and mops, or to remove the temptations to intemperance connected with them; to reform the drinking customs which so largely prevail at marriages, burials, and public gatherings, especially the drinking of toasts and healths; and to discourage the practice of giving beer to servants, tradesmen, and messengers; and to discourage the practice of treating to drinks, whether for service done or in commercial transactions.—Alliance News.

Like a magic touch
Luster the greater
Labor the least

SILVER

ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

Never scratching
Never wearing
Never equalled

Trial quantity yours for the asking.
Box post-paid, 15 cts. It's sold everywhere.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

It isn't
"The Same As,"

and it isn't "as good as" no matter what any grocer may tell you about any imitation of Pearline. He makes more money on it, of course—but do you want to ruin your clothes for his profit. Some of the imitations of Pearline are sold at a lower price, naturally. They ought to be cheaper, for they're not as good. Some of them are dangerous, and would be dear at any price. None of them is equal to Pearline, the original washing compound, which saves more work in washing and cleaning than anything else that doesn't do harm. Pearline is never peddled, and it offers no prize packages. Every package is a prize in itself. Get it from some good grocer.

374 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Roberts' Late Books

History of the People of Israel.

By ERNEST RENAN. Vol. V. Period of Jewish Independence and Judea under Roman Rule. With an index to the five volumes. 8vo. Cloth. $2.50.

My Sister Henrietta.

By ERNEST RENAN. Translated by Abby Langdon Alger. With seven illustrations by Henri Scheffer and Ary Renan. 12mo. Cloth. $1.25.

"No more perfect tribute of brother to sister was ever written."—Evangelist.

The Marriage Contract.

A Start in Life.

By HONORE DE BALZAC. Translated by Miss K. P. WORMELEY. Two vols. 12mo. Half Russia. $1.50.

From Dreamland Sent.

A volume of Poems. By LILIAN WHITING, author of "The World Beautiful." 16mo. Cloth. $1.25.

A Bud of Promise.

A story of Ambitious Parents. By A. G. PLYMPTON, author of "Dear Daughter Dorothy." 16mo. Cloth, limp, 50 cents.

Don.

By the author of "Miss Toosey's Mission." With frontispiece by J. Finnemore. 16mo. Cloth, $1.00.

The Wood beyond the World.

By WILLIAM MORRIS. Frontispiece by E. Burnet-Jones. Printed on Antique English paper, with decorative covers. Crown 8vo, $3.00.

"One of the most remarkable books of the year."... Chicago Journal.

John Galt's Novels.

A new illustrated edition. With an introduction by S. R. Crockett, and portrait and illustrations from drawings by John Wallace. The text revised and edited by D. Storrar Meldrum. 8 vols. Each 16mo, cloth. $1.25 per vol.

"He writes simply and graciously of familiar things." Philadelphia Ledger.

The Annals of the Parish and the Ayrshire Legatees. 2 vols.

From Jerusalem to Nicæa.

The Church in the First Three Centuries. (Lowell lectures.) By PHILIP STAFFORD MOXOM, author of "The Aim of Life." 12mo, cloth, $1.50.

Modern German Literature.

By BENJAMIN W. WELLS, Ph.D. 12mo, cloth, $1.50.

"Reveals much original research."—Journal.

Roberts Brothers, Publishers, Boston.

Channing Auxiliary Calendar

FOR 1896.

RHYMES AND CHIMES.

The Poetry of Steeples,

The Bell in the Belfry.

Beautifully printed in brown on Japanese paper. Boxed. Price $1.00, including postage. Address

CHANNING PUBLISHING COMMITTEE,
1300 Taylor Street, San Francisco.

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

Now ready:—

1. The Public Service of Religion.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "A Year of Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."

"In 'The House Beautiful,' Rev. Wm. C. Gannett describes, with a rare combination of good sense and poetic insight, the essentials of a beautiful home, giving to flowers, books, and guests, for instance, their due place in its furnishing, while love is the bond that binds all together in gracious influence."—Literary World.

"It is on the side of sincerity, quietness, and simplicity. Meets with our entire approval."—The Critic.

"Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on 'The dear Togetherness' is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. Our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and, if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so."—The New Unity.

Sent postpaid on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites

many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods

in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus,

love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR OCTOBER.

The Glory of the Present Hour. Rev. Frank L. Phalen. Perhaps To-day. Rachel B. MacMullin. Salvation: What it is and is not. H. W. Crosskey, LL.D., F.G.S.

Hidden Treasures. Maud L. Cotton.

Savonarola: A Sketch. I. S. Fletcher Williams.

Somewhere. Philip Falconar Deane.

The Vision of Rabbi Zeb. E. L. R.

Praying to Christ. Martha Perry Lowe.

Tolerance in Religion. Edwin Burt Beckwith.

Passing Joy. Elizabeth Hill.

The Growth of Religion.

A Vacation Glimpse of England. J. T. Sunderland.

An Epitaph. C. Leech.

Divinity in Humanity. W. H. Fish, Sr.

The Shrewd Layman.

Types of the Spirit. William M. Bicknell.

The Mist. Hattie Tyng Griswold.

The National Conference.

One Upward Look Each Day.

Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor; Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women; Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work, Christopher R. Elliot; Literary Notes.

Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

. Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

LITTLE LAKE.

[From the Armenian of Bedros Tourian.

Why dost thou lie in hushed surprise,
Thou little lonely mere?
Did some fair woman wistfully
Gaze in thy mirror clear?

Or are thy waters calm and still
Admiring the blue sky,
Where shining cloudlets, like thy foam,
Are drifting softly by?

Sad little lake, let us be friends!
I, too, am desolate;
I, too, would fain beneath the sky
In silence meditate.

As many thoughts are in my mind
As wavelets o'er thee roam;
As many wounds are in my heart
As thou hast flakes of foam.

But, if heaven's constellations all
Had dropped into thy breast,
Thou still wouldst not be like my soul,—
A flame-sea without rest.

There, when the air and thou are calm.
The clouds let fall no showers;
The stars that rise there do not set,
And fadeless are the flowers.

Thou art my queen, O little lake!
For, e'en when ripples thrill
Thy surface, in thy quivering depths
Thou hold'st me, trembling, still.

Full many have rejected me:
"What has he but his lyre?"
"He trembles, and his face is pale;
His life must soon expire."

None said, "Poor child, why pines he thus?
If he beloved should be,
Haply he might not die, but live,—
Live, and grow fair to see."

None sought the boy's sad heart to read
Nor in its depths to look.
They would have found it was a fire,
And not a printed book.

Nay, ashes now! a memory!
Grow stormy, little mere;
For a despairing man has gazed
Into thy waters clear.

—Alice Stone Blackwell, Boston Transcript.

A GREEK INSCRIPTION.

Prof. Mahaffy has had a strange bit of luck with a Greek inscription from Egypt. Mr. Grenfell, who has just returned with a number of important newly discovered papyri of the second century before Christ, brought him the squeeze from a mutilated stone found at Dimeh, in the Fayum, giving the beginning only of a number of lines. It belongs to 104 B.C., and contains several proper names. Prof. Wilcken, of Breslau, heard of it, and thought that an inscription on another mutilated stone in the Berlin Museum, having only the ends of lines, might have something to do with it. He sent a squeeze to Prof. Mahaffy, who put the two pieces together, and found that they fitted exactly, though a few letters along the fracture are lost.—The American.

GOLD.

Probably the gold that was employed in decorating Solomon's temple is in large part doing duty at the present time somewhere among men. With the enormous increase of commerce, home and foreign, in modern times other influences came in which accelerated the gold-cheapening process. One of these was the introduction of labor-saving devices, which greatly increased the productivity, and hence the value of labor. As gold was cumulative, and not dependent upon the labor of immediate production, other lines of labor shot ahead of it in productive value. But much the greatest influences in cheapening gold were the labor-saving devices of finance, which by far exceeded anything possible in mechanical invention. Gold is worth less than a third—between that and a fifth—of what it was worth in Queen Elizabeth's time. There were counterbalancing causes which prevented its decline in proportion to its real and its practical increase. A shekel of gold will now do as much commercial work as one hundred shekels could do in Solomon's time, though it has not declined in specific value in nearly that proportion. Financial devices have given it almost incredible celerity in practical movement. Artaxerxes owed Egypt a hundred shekels in gold. He loaded it on camels, and sent a small army to guard it; and the caravan wended its way, occupying a month in reaching from the Euphrates to the Nile. But now Chicago owes London the hundred shekels, and it is cabled into the London bank in four minutes. London owes it to Amsterdam, and the gold plunges beneath the North Sea and rises in the Dutch city, while you are winking twice. Amsterdam owes it to Paris, and with a flash it is there, Paris owes it to Chicago, and back it is again where it started from, ready to be flashed to Calcutta or Tokio. Thus working one hundred times as fast, our telegraphic shekel is equal to one hundred of Artaxerxes, leaving ninety-nine pieces for other employment and practically increasing the supply in proportion to demand to that degree.—The Interior.

Here and There.

A Sister of Charity is the first woman to receive a decoration in Holland. She was made a knight of the order of Nassau-Orange by the two queens of Holland during their recent visit to Overysel.

An ibex, killed in the mountains of Arizona this last summer, is said to be the third of these animals ever killed in the United States. The two others were found in Oregon. The ibex is a big-horned wild goat, belonging to the Alps and the Pyrenees, and never supposed to exist in our American mountains.

The captive balloon which the French expect to employ at the World's Fair in 1900 will be 144 feet in diameter, and is to ascend to an elevation of 1,950 feet. This is twice as high as the Eiffel Tower. The balloon is to be managed by a wire cable, varying in diameter from 3.93 to 4.71 inches, and will probably be capable of taking up 160 passengers at once.

It is said that the post-office system of British India is the most up-to-date concern of the kind to be found anywhere. Besides collecting and delivering letters, parcels, and other articles, it acts, to a certain extent, as a banker to the general public, sells quinine and salt, pays military pensions, and collects the revenue accruing to the government from land and other sources.

It is stated that in Japan massage is practised almost exclusively by blind persons. The idea is that the sense of touch is so much more delicate and developed in those who have lost their vision that the employment of them as "masseurs" and "masseuses" is quite in accord with the natural fitness of things. Blind persons are largely used for this purpose in St. Petersburg, and at a massage school there the professor is also blind.

The Negro Building and its exhibits are likely to be the most significant part of the Atlanta show, and will probably be looked back to in coming years as marking an epoch in the rapid advance of a race from slavery to the full possession of its long-delayed birthright in the arts and sciences, the occupations and industries so long monopolized by the Caucasian. If the Atlanta Exhibition does nothing more than to afford this opportunity to the race to demonstrate its fitness for progress and citizenship, it will be worth to the South and to the whole country all that exposition cost. The Interior.

ASK Your Grocer for

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

Two Mince Pies, equal to our Grandmother's, from each package of None-Such Mince Meat, without the worry and work. For sale by all Grocers.

MERRELL-SOULE CO., Syracuse, N. Y.

A Prize Loaf of Home-made Bread

The highest prize for bread making awarded by the Lewiston Fair, Lewiston, Maine, was received by Miss Katie B. Kennedy, of that city, for a loaf of home-made bread shortened with COTTOLENE. The recipe was practically the same as thousands of housewives use, the only material difference being the substitution of

COTTOLENE

for lard. Bread, cake, and pastry shortened with COTTOLENE is not only lighter, but of better flavor and of greater healthfulness. If you want your bread to be prized by all who eat it, use COTTOLENE, but use it right. Never use more than two-thirds as much COTTOLENE as you would of lard. Genuine COTTOLENE is sold everywhere in one, three, and five pound tins, with trade marks—Cottolene and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin. Made only by

THE M. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY, CHICAGO, 224 State St., BOSTON, and PORTLAND, ME.

A College Town Pulpit.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S MONTHLY SERMONS.

50 Cents a Year. 5 Cents a Number. Reduced rates in quantities.

Series for 1894-95.

1. The Soul's Cry for God.
2. Jesus as Humanity's Ideal.
3. Sectarianism: Its Evils, Causes, and Cures.
4. The True Cross of Christ.
5. Was Jesus God? How he came to be worshipped.
6. Loyalty to Conviction.
7. Is Life a Blessing?
8. Robert Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible.
9. A Religion for a Republic.
10. The Surest Way of Doing Good.

Order from Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, Ann Arbor, Mich.

"Unity Pulpit"

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season. Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery. Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents.

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.
 2. God in the City.
 3. Reaping Time.
 4. Called to be Saints.
 5. Prosperity and Adversity. (By George W. Stone.)
 6. The Religious Situation.
- Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrance. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment, Individual and Universal. By Rev. William E. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simons. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. O. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION, 141 Franklin Street, Boston.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Rooms To Let.

Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at 36 RUTLAND SQUARE.

CHURCH CARPETS

AT MANUFACTURERS' PRICES. 658

JOHN H. PRAY, Sons & Co., CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY, WASHINGTON ST., OPP. BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON.

Pleasantries.

A colored pastor in Texas, when demanding his salary, gave as his reason, "Brudern, I can't preach heah and boad' in heb'n."

Said a little boy who, during a visit to Florida, was obliged to drink condensed milk, "Mamma, I just wish that condensed cow would die!"—The American.

Artist: "I painted this picture, sir, to keep the wolf from the door." Dealer (after inspecting it): "Well, hang it on the knob where the wolf can see it."—Tit-Bits.

"Why, Howard, child, how did you cut your lip that way?" cried Mrs. B. "Playing," said Howard. "I was playing I was a goat, an' I tried to eat a tomat-ter-can." Harper's Round Table.

Dealer: "Can't I sell you one of these stylographic pens? The price has come down to $1." Scribbler: "Is that so? Now, if you can persuade the ink to come down, I might buy one."—Standard.

George W. Cable, the novelist, electrified a Sunday-school class of pretty little girls by telling them that he had three children at home, half of them girls! Rapidly scrambling through their mental arithmetic, they fairly rustled with surprise at the startling statement, and then heard with an audible sigh of relief his explanation that the other half were girls, too.

The Sunday-school lesson was about Moses, and the teacher of Freddie's class asked the boys what they knew of him. Freddie's face brightened. "Well," said the teacher, "what do you know about Moses, Freddie?" "Oh," said Freddie, "I don't know much about Mr. Moses; but I know his boys, Johnnie and Will. I play with them every day."—Selected.

Prof. A.: "Do you know, I find it difficult to remember the ages of my children?" Prof. B.: "I have no such trouble. I was born 2,300 years after Socrates, my wife 1,800 years after the death of Tiberius Cæsar, our son John 2,000 years after the entrance into Rome of Titus Sempronius Gracchus for the re-enactment of the 'leges Licinæ,' and our Amanda 1,500 years after the beginning of the Folk-wandering: that is perfectly simple, you see."—Fliegende Blaetter.

At the tomb of George Washington at Mount Vernon a lady had just picked up a pebble from the walk to carry home with her, when a workman came up with a wheelbarrow full of gravel, which he dumped on the spot. "Have you—have you fixed up the place that way recently?" the lady asked, in a slightly apprehensive tone. "Bless you, miss," was the reply: "we has to do this about every two weeks, so as the tourists can have something to carry away for mementums."

The editor brought home with him from Chamounix the business card of a "boot merchant," which serves not only as a souvenir of the man whom he patronized, but as an excellent example of foreign English:—

"Claret Tournier Joseph
Boot merchant

in front of the Hotel Croix-Blanche.

"Great choice of Alpinboots Reperations and shoking for the glaciers. Great choice of gaitres, boots, stiks, cornets, and jugger's cup.

"All those goods are delivered ni good conditions."

An exchange tells a story which may be taken as a fresh manifestation of a certain well-known Scotch characteristic. Upon his accession to the throne, the emperor of Russia was appointed colonel-in-chief of the Royal Scots Greys. While dressing for dinner, an enthusiastic subaltern communicated the information to his soldier-servant. "Donald," he said, "have you heard that the new emperor of Russia has been appointed colonel of the regiment?" "Indeed, sir!" replied Donald. "It is a vera proud thing." Then, after a pause, he inquired, "Beg pardon, sir, but will he be able to keep both places?"—The Interior.

MEDICAL CHIMES.

A certain esteemed clergyman, whose church is in the most attractive part of the city, but who for present purposes must remain nameless, was feeling a little "pardonable pride," as the outgoing political office-holders express it, in having succeeded, after years of soliciting, in raising enough money to provide his church with a set of chimes.

As every one took the first occasion to congratulate him, it was quite natural that, on meeting Mrs. Blunt, one of his most fashionable parishioners, he should say, in his happy enthusiasm: "And how do you like the new chimes, Mrs. Blunt? You must be glad to hear those good old hymns at night. They must remind you?"

"Yes," she interrupted, "that is so. Since the chimes began, I've taken my medicine quite regularly."—The Budget.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

COOK'S TOURS. ESTABLISHED 1841. HOLYLAND TOURS.

All Travelling Expenses Included.
Parties under Personal Escort will leave New York, Nov. 6 per S.S. Augusta Victoria. Special Tour spending Christmas at Jerusalem and Bethlehem. Jan. 8 per S.S. Normania; Jan. 22 per S.S. Kaiser Wilhelm II.; Feb. 12 per S.S. Fulda; Feb. 19 per S.S. Normania; Feb. 29 per S.S. Werra.
Fares range from $675 to $1,225. Illustrated descriptive pamphlet free on application.

COOK'S NILE STEAMERS
will leave Cairo
Rameses III.....Nov. 12 | Rameses III.....Dec. 10
Rameses Great.....Nov. 26 | Rameses Great.....Dec. 24
and weekly thereafter.
Dahabeahs and Special Steamers for private parties. Programme of European Tours. Season 1896 on application.
THOS. COOK & SON,
New York, 261 and 1225 Broadway; Boston, 332 Washington St.; Philadelphia, 824 Chestnut St.; Chicago, 234 South Clark St.
Official Ticket Agents for all Trunk Lines.

WANTED 5000 MORE BOOK AGENTS
men and women, for the fastest selling book of the times
DARKNESS & DAYLIGHT in NEW YORK
With 250 new illustrations from flash-light photographs.
Introduction By Rev. Lyman Abbott.
A Christian woman's thrilling story of years of rescue work "In His Name," alive with intense interest, touching pathos, humor and story. Most splendidly illustrated. 86th thousand in press. Bishops, Ministers, etc., say "God speed it." Eminent women endorse it. It sells at sight, and pays Agents from $50. to $100. a month. Get It Pay Freight to all points, Give Credit, Extra Terms, Premium Copies, and Free Outfit. Write for terms and specimen engravings to HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Conn.

DIABETES FLOUR
Also Gluten Dyspepsia Flour, Barley Crystals, and Patent Biscuit Cake and Pastry Flour.
Unrivalled in America or Europe.
Pamphlets and Baking Samples Free.
Write Farwell & Rhines, Watertown, N. Y., U.S.A.

THE GREAT CHURCH LIGHT REFLECTORS
FOR OIL, GAS, ELECTRIC LIGHT
I. P. FRANK
551 PEARL ST. N.Y.

Atlanta Exposition

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors. Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Convenient to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.

SPEAKING OF LAMPS

There are few daintier table pieces in existence than the PRINCESS Lamps, in Dresden China, complete, Silk (chiffon-trimmed) Shades to match, from $3 upward. The BLACK IRON, DRESDEN CHINA and FRENCH CHINA Lamps are shown with the new "AMPHIER" and other shades. The ever popular Blue DELFT ware appears in handsome VASE-SHAPED Lamps, some of them mounted in fancifully-twisted wrought iron. AMERICAN METAL Lamps in OLD BRASS, IMPERIAL, BYZANTINE (red flecked, "Empire" green), embellished with gold ornamentation, sometimes in the classic torch design, ANTIQUE or ONYX and GOLD, seem to range from $5 to $18. Then there are beautiful foreign VASE LAMPS, RUDOLSTADT, and other patterns, with gold mountings and central-draft burners, from $8 to $15. Large globes seem to be "the rage" this year—tulip-shaped or round, from the ostrich egg to the football size.

IN LAMPS, NEVER SUCH BARGAINS.

ABRAM FRENCH COMPANY, CHINA, CROCKERY AND GLASSWARE MERCHANTS, 89, 91, 93 Franklin St., BOSTON.

PIANO

If no dealer sells the Ivers & Pond near you, it will pay you to deal directly with our Factory. If a thoroughly reliable piano is what you want we can save you money. If you want time let us explain our EASY PAYMENT PLAN, the fairest and easiest. Reduced prices for pianos that have had slight use. Don't buy before writing us.

IVERS & POND PIANO CO., 183 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.

DURKEE'S SPICES

THE WELL KNOWN "GAUNTLET BRAND" EXCEL IN PURITY, STRENGTH & FLAVOR.

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building,

BEACON STREET, BOSTON,

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES
of Copper and Tin.
BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1895.

NUMBER 45.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; The Unitarian Position.	713
Concerning Keats: Mythology for Children; Natural and Revealed.	714
BREVITIES.	714
UNITARIAN NATIONAL CONFERENCE.
The Origins of Liberal Thought in America, by John Fiske, Ph.D.	715
The Theology of Unitarians, by Charles Car- roll Everett, D.D., LL.D.	717
Tuesday Evening Meeting:
Our Young People; Pedagogical Methods in Sunday-school Work, by G. Stanley Hall,	719
Cultivation of the Spiritual Nature, by Rev. Benjamin R. Bulkeley.	720
The Lend a Hand Club, by Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D.; Character and Citizenship, by Rev. Thomas R. Slicer.	721
Church Extension:
The Pacific Coast, by Rev. C. W. Wendte.	721
New England, by Rev. D. M. Wilson.	722
The Central West, by Rev. T. B. Forbush.	723
The Western States, by Rev. A. M. Gould; The Southern States, by Rev. George Leonard Chaney.	724
The Holy Spirit, by Rev. Howard N. Brown.	724
Incarnation, by Rev. W. C. Gannett.	725
Atonement, by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford.	727
Forgiveness, by Rev. Mary A. Safford; Unitari- anism and Philanthropy, by Rev. Francis G. Peabody, D.D.	728
Modern Applications of Liberal Religious Prin- ciples to Social Problems, by Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer.	731
Discussion.	732
Our Japan Mission, by Rev. Wm. I. Lawrance, Thursday Night Meeting:	733
The Outlook; Address of Rev. S. R. Cal- throp.	734
Address of Hon. Carroll D. Wright; Address of Hon. Horace G. Wadlin.	735
Address of Rev. M. J. Savage.	736
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Good Roads; A Fortunate Find.	742
Woman in Burmah.	743
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.	737
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.	737
SPIRITUAL LIFE.	738
LITERATURE.
Book Notices.	738
Literary Notes; Books Received.	739
THE HOME.
Guy Fawkes and the Fifth of November, by Fred Myron Colby; Kassy's Boomerang.	740
A True Story; The Four Apple-trees; Mutual Surprises; Large Spiders.	741
POETRY.
The Secret Kiss, by Rebecca Palfrey Utter.	740
Motto to Song XXXI, by Henrietta R. Eliot.	742
The Sea-birds' Foe.	743
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS.	742
EDUCATION.	742
TEMPERANCE.	742
HERE AND THERE.	742
CHARITIES AND REFORMS.	743
SCIENCE.	743
PLEASANTRIES.	744

Editorial.

THE pastoral letter of the House of Bishops of the Episcopal Church this year is of much more interest to the members of that Church than to those of other communions. Last year the letter was largely concerned with matters of doctrine, especially contending for a narrow interpretation of two doctrines which have come to have a broader meaning than the bishops like to have put into them. This year, however, methods of denominational administration and of ritualistic observance which have little interest outside of the Episcopal Church are the things mainly discussed. The question of Christian unity is the main subject in which the bishops deal with the relation of their Church to the larger world of Christendom. The subject continues to excite their "earnest solicitude, though the prospect of any immediate or tangible result is not encouraging."

THE bishops regret that their overtures have not been accepted. They declare, however, that they do not mean to budge from them. "But, however earnest and persistent our endeavor to keep alive this great movement and the deep yearnings which inspire it, we can imagine no circumstance that would induce us to consent to any departure from the ancient deposit of the faith and order committed to our keeping for the common benefit of mankind, or to the impairment of any truly apostolic and catholic tradition of the Church, or to any measures which, in bringing us nearer to post-Reformation communions, would create any new obstacles to reunion with the old historic branches of the Catholic Church." These utterances show that the bishops are willing enough that all the world should become Episcopalian, and mean that there shall be no Christian unity without it.

UNITARIANS, on the other hand, at their National Conference have made what it seems to us is the only really practical overture concerning Christian unity that has yet been made, and the only one that can be realized. They offer as a basis not a form of doctrine, a liturgy, a method of government, a traditional form of priestly succession, but the essence of Christianity itself, as summed up in the life and teachings of Jesus, that practical religion is love to God and love to man. This is a basis of union which is older than that offered by Episcopacy or by any other denomination. It lies at the foundation not only of Christianity, but of Hebraism and all true religion. In accepting it, the Episcopalian is not obliged to give up his Prayer Book or his doctrine of the apostolic succession, the Methodist is not obliged to give up his bishops, nor the Presbyterian his elders, nor the Roman Catholic his ceremonies, nor the Baptist his love for immersion. All this matter of form and government is secondary. This is the real faith delivered to the saints, and on this basis Christians of all denominations may find a field for co-operation.

COMMENTING upon the basis of unity proposed at the National Conference, the Herald of Gospel Liberty, the organ of the Christian Church, says: "That is very good. But we are not hungering after religious unity or religious union merely: we are seeking Christian union and Christian unity. We seek union in Christ. We wish you to say Jesus Christ and Christ Jesus. If you are unwilling to say that, you do not 'hold in accordance with the teaching' of Jesus. Take out the Christ, and the unction will disappear, the anointing with the Holy Spirit will depart. The Unitarians are better than their creed. If their intellects are not Messiah-ed, their hearts certainly have been in contact with the Christ spirit, their souls have received the anointing from above, as is seen in their many works of philanthropy, their constant, broad, and deep love for humanity. All this indicates the Christ spirit. They have been drinking of the River of Life, that flows not only 'from the throne of God,' but 'of the Lamb,' even though imagining their drafts were only from some artesian well they had sunk to the same hidden flood as the Mohammedans and Buddhists. No: the Unitarians have been drinking of purer waters. Brethren, put Christ not only into your conduct, but into your resolutions; and they will taste sweeter to the rest of us. Your conduct says, Christ: let your resolutions say, Christ." Unitarians are more concerned in propagating the spirit of Jesus than merely repeating his name, and for this they have good authority in his teachings. But in the resolution referred to the name of Jesus is gratefully recognized, and all the more clearly because it is not confounded with the Messianic ideas of later Christology.

THE utter inadequacy of the historic episcopacy as a basis of union is shown in the fact that it has never been an element which has made for Christian union. The divisions which separated Peter and Paul very sharply have been repeated all through the history of the Church. Bishops have stood over against each other, and fought and wrangled for supremacy. From the very beginning Christianity became divided into sects. The unity of the Church was only secured through political supremacy. It was enforced by the sword, not by the gospel, with the result eventually that political as well as doctrinal divisions obtained. The Western Church was divided from the Eastern; and the Eastern Church divided into political segments, as it remains to-day. The historic episcopate has never been able to furnish anything more than an external basis of Christian union, and it has not succeeded in that; for men cannot any more readily agree on the external elements of Christianity than upon those which are internal and fundamental. In spite of the historic episcopate, the Episcopal Church is not at unity with itself. It is divided strongly into parties, and the tendencies they represent are as divergent as those which separate episcopacy from other communions. It is evident, therefore, that all that could be obtained through the basis of union proposed by the Episcopal Church would be one that is purely external and that would be of little or no value. In this matter we must work from the centre, not from the circumference; and this is what Unitarians are proposing to do.

NO MAN is better qualified to speak on the Armenian question than Mr. James Bryce. He is familiar with the subject in all its relations: he visited the country, and wrote a book long before the perpetration of the recent massacres. He knows the Turk as well as the Armenian, and the complicated diplomatic problems which enter into the recent questions. His article, therefore, in the Century for November is the work of one of the best informed English statesmen. His statement of the condition of the Armenian people and the injustice and outrages to which they are subjected only confirms the mass of evidence already put before us on this question. "The massacre of Sassoun," says Mr. Bryce, "was absolutely unprovoked, and has all the appearance of having been deliberately planned, in order to exterminate the Christian population of a district almost entirely inhabited by Armenians."

ONE of the greatest difficulties in mending affairs in Armenia Mr. Bryce finds in the jealousy of the European powers. Experience has shown, he points out, that there is only one way of reforming an Oriental government, and that is by putting it into leading-strings "either by superseding the chief officials and putting Europeans in their place, or else by giving them European adjutants who shall virtually direct them. This might be done in Turkey if the European powers were willing." But this is less practicable under the jealousy of the European powers than the present plan, which "is to introduce small changes in local government which may give the Christians a better chance of preserving their lives and property, and to institute a commission of supervision at Constantinople with which the European ambassadors may be in communication, conveying to it the reports of their consuls, and pressing it to see that justice is done in the provinces. This scheme, though somewhat complicated, may, in the opinion of several judicious British and American residents, be made to work. But it will require the closest attention by the European consuls and ambassadors; and the most unrelenting pressure must be brought to bear on the sultan if its provisions are not to be neglected or evaded in practice. Nothing but fear and threats will move a government which has up till now never expressed the slightest penitence nor shown the slightest remorse for the Sassoun massacre, nor taken any serious step to put an end to the hideous prison tortures which the British embassy has so often brought to its notice."

IN closing his article, Mr. Bryce treats of the influence which America may exert in this question. She does not hold such a responsibility as any of the six great powers; but she is entitled to protect her schools and missionaries, "and she has the enormous advantage of being obviously disinterested in all Mediterranean questions, having nothing to gain for herself in that region of the world. . . . The position of America is therefore a very strong one. The appearance of her gun-boats off Turkish ports has before now had a wholesome effect upon the Turkish mind, and these gunboats would do well to appear promptly whenever the rights of her citizens and the safety of their educational establishments are threatened." Without naming our minister at Constantinople, Mr. Bryce significantly says, "At Constantinople much depends also upon the capacity and the firmness of the envoy who embodies and speaks the will of a foreign power." It is evidently as clear to Mr. Bryce as it was to Secretary Gresham that our present minister at Constantinople does not embody and speak the will of the American people in this crisis, and it is a mystery why President Cleveland should keep him there.

THE UNITARIAN POSITION.

Any one who reads this and the last number of the Christian Register, containing the papers, addresses, and reports given at the Unitarian National Conference at Washington, will be able to form some idea of the characteristic features of the Unitarian position. He will see that there are certain advantages in the Unitarian position.

1. Unitarians have the advantage which comes from complete mental liberty. They are not committed to holding some creedal fort which ought to be abandoned. They are not fenced in by articles, standards, and confessions. They are not bound by allegiance to infallible popes or infallible bibles.

2. Unitarianism is free to move and free to grow. There are certain of the old churches which claim that all the truth was revealed eighteen hundred years ago: they deny the possibility of any progress in theology. Their faces are turned toward the past; but Unitarianism, while it accepts gratefully all the past has to offer, is perfectly free to move and to grow,—as free as the tree is to put forth new blossoms and bear new fruit. While sucking up nurture from deep roots below, it drinks in the rain and the sunshine from above. Hence Unitarianism can adjust itself to the new revelations of life and truth which pour upon it to-day.

3. Unitarianism is thus free to accept the facts and revelations of modern science. The churches bound to the mediæval creeds have had a great struggle to adjust themselves to the simple facts of geology, astronomy, and the story of the development of physical life on this planet. Some of them are still struggling to reconcile Genesis and geology, the story of Jonah or of Samson with the facts of history and experience. Unitarians, on the other hand, find no conflict between the facts of religion and the facts of science; and to them the story of the evolution of life on this planet, so far as it is evident, is more a help than a hindrance in the interpretation of religion.

4. Unitarianism is free to accept new ethical conceptions. Many other churches are bound not only by the science and theology of the past, but also by its ethical standards. Their views of the moral character of God stand in the way to-day of the development of the moral character of man. Ethics, like physical science, have been subject to growth. While we find the germ of all ethics budding forth and coming into utterance in the noblest prophets of the past, humanity has had to wait centuries for the full unfolding, development, and application of ethical principles. It is a notable fact that our views of the moral duty of man have grown faster than our views of the moral character of God, but each of these must react upon the other. Unitarians do not teach their children, therefore, that it was right for Abraham to take his son on the mountain to sacrifice him to the Deity, any more than it was right for the crazed Pocasset murderer some years ago to slay his child under a similar delusion. The lesson they find in the old story is rather that of the voice which came forbidding such deeds, and eventually showing that mercy was better than sacrifice. Unitarians, therefore, are not tied up to any scheme of ecclesiastical or traditional morality. They may heed the prophets of righteousness of our day.

5. Unitarianism is wholly free in the matter of service and ritual. Its worship is not controlled by synods and councils, by prescribed forms and traditions. Unitarian churches are not compelled to use a certain hymn-book or service-book, or to read the Bible in a certain order and to use certain epistles on certain days. Their ministers are not compelled to pray according to book and rule. They may read prayers if they want to, or they may pray from the fulness of their own hearts and the inspiration of the hour. They may wear gowns or not, white cravats or black ones, long coats or short ones with side pockets. The order of worship is controlled not by somebody outside of the congregation, but by the congregation itself. In the exercise of this freedom every congregation may adopt just such forms of service as minister to their needs.

6. Unitarians have the advantages of the Congregational system of church government. This secures to each church all the liberties of independency. This means not only the liberty to stand aloof from ecclesiastical control, but also the liberty and right to establish fellowship with every other church that is working for the same ends. The freedom of independency is the freedom to organize.

All this means that Unitarianism is not simply a religion for yesterday, but a religion for to-day, that it is a religion for the nineteenth century, adjusting itself to the advanced thought, knowledge, ethical conceptions, æsthetic tastes, and organic methods of to-day.

CONCERNING KEATS.

The recent hundredth anniversary of Keats's birth (October 29) has naturally made him the subject of a good many critical remarks. The most original of these, if not the most intelligent, we find in the columns of the New York Times. It is to the effect that only by the perfection of their execution are his poems taken out of the rank of minor poetry. His posthumous career is "an excellent illustration of the preservative power of fine workmanship." "Keats wrote nothing that, if reduced to prose, would have outlasted his own life." "It is by the purely literary quality of his work that it has come to be more extensively admired, as the decades of the century have passed," etc. A more perfect example than this of the fallacy lucus a non lucendo it would be hard to find. "He was so dry," the poet sings, "that you might call him wet." The criticism of our contemporary is so bad that you might call it good,—at least, good for nothing. It says the wrong thing so absolutely that a genius for blundering is evident in every phrase. The workmanship of Keats was indeed very perfect at its best; but there were stages in its growth, there were degrees in the perfection of his art. The failure of "Endymion" was a failure of faulty workmanship, a failure of excess. It was "over-languaged." It lacked self-restraint. Its main conception was sufficiently poetical. Its wealth of fancy was exuberant. But there was too much of a good thing. It cloyed the palate, much as Porphyro's table set for Madeline in "The Eve of St. Agnes" would have done with its

"Candied apple, quince, and plum, and gourd;
With jellies smoother than the creamy curd,
And lucent syrups tinct with cinnamon."

And while thus the most unripe or over-ripe of Keats's longer poems attests an essential quality that went far to palliate the excesses of his verbal luxury, of those things the workmanship of which was the most perfect, it is quite as true that what gives them their perdurability is not their perfect form, but their possession of "that penetrative and sympathetic imagination which belongs to the poet, of that imagination which identifies itself with the momentary object of its contemplation." It is Lowell's opinion that Keats had more of this than any man of these later days. He found him more essentially a poet than Wordsworth or Byron. Matthew Arnold, a critic as little likely as any one to be snared in Keats's sensuousness, has said that "in the faculty of naturalistic interpretation, in what we call natural magic, he is with Shakspeare."

Surely, these lofty praises were for something more than any mere perfection of external form, mere literary quality, mere fine workmanship. They mean a wonderful perception of the beautiful in things and their relations, and a marvellous gift for expressing what he saw and what he felt in words that answered to his thoughts as the shadow to the swan on "still St. Mary's lake" in Wordsworth's lovely poem. And take a dozen of the sonnets and the "Ode to a Nightingale" or that "To a Grecian Urn," and the whole conception is as beautiful as the most perfect phrase. Written in prose, these poems would have lived; for it would have been the prose of a poet. Indeed, we have prose of Keats's that is as poetical as his most lovely poems.

Of course, "fine workmanship" is a term that may mean much or little. It may include all that went to make Keats's poetry what it is,—his passion for the beautiful, his exquisite fancy, his strong imagination, his inevitable gravitation to the word that would express his thought and feeling. With this large inclusion it would be true that Keats's "fine workmanship" has kept his verse alive. But the same thing could be said of Shakspeare's or Milton's or Dante's. If, however, by "fine workmanship" are meant literary finish, perfect rhyme and rhythm, the use of words for their external light and color, nothing is further from the truth than that to such fine workmanship Keats owes his growing fame. Fair workmanship of this sort was never so abundant as in these last days. If it could make immortal poets, what a crop of them we should be gathering in! But because they have not in them the root of the matter, the soul of poetry, that which made Keats immortal, they will pass, and leave no sign more permanent than a ship's furrow in the sea.

MYTHOLOGY FOR CHILDREN.

We print in this week's issue the address given by Dr. G. Stanley Hall at Washington. It is rather beyond the wisdom of the little ones; but, if they could comprehend it, they would rejoice in his advocacy of fairy stories and myths "to fertilize the roots of life about the child's heart." We all know how sober, matter-of-fact people often discourage such reading for children; and it is interesting to know from Dr. Hall why they do so. We say of them, They have forgotten that they were ever children themselves. The scientific man says: "The traces of childhood in our soul are hardly more definite than the filmy lines of an acorn from which a tree has grown. The rudimentary organs of childhood in us have all vanished, and it is very difficult to keep en rapport with the child." So he makes a plea for works of imagination for them, and rebukes those who would weed out the crass supernaturalism from the Bible when it is "the very thing that the childish heart needs."

Many parents who guide their children's Bible reading can easily testify that, when the mythical parts of the Bible are given to young readers as they would give any other legendary story, it is accepted as naturally and does as little harm as any mythology.

It is only when these are given as literally true that little sceptics are produced. Great danger lies here; for this early scepticism asserts itself against reason in later years, and is a very witch-grass to exterminate.

It is odd that, while a liberal-minded teacher recommends the early reading of the myths and miracles of the Old Testament, the Hebrews, who rest their teaching on the Bible, should defer such reading till children are in their teens. A Jewish rabbi, who spoke at the Sunday-school meeting in Providence, said that, though he was brought up in a very strict orthodox Jewish family, and could repeat large parts of the prophets in Hebrew when a mere child, he was not allowed to learn anything of the story of the creation and the deluge till he was thirteen. Evidently, the fear of making sceptics was at the basis of such training.

Those whose rudimentary child faculties have not wholly disappeared, and who still delight in mythology and fairy tales and "Arabian Nights' Entertainments" and witches and elves and goblins and sprites, feel that children are actually defrauded if they have been deprived of such pabulum in their early years. To such friends of childhood it will be a satisfaction to know that the instinct to gratify this craving in the child heart is but an instinct to enrich the growing life. There is no danger in yielding to this taste so long as the other half of Dr. Hall's advice is remembered. Though he would plant the educational ladder down deep, among the very roots of things, where it shall be garlanded by the clinging vines of the imagination, he would not therewith be content. If that were all, the life would soon be strangled in a jungle of Oriental fable. "Do not," he says, "forget the going up." But, if the beginnings have been rich and sweet and happy, the upward way will be all the more full of life and promise, and blossom out into a symmetrical unfolding of the soul; for the life that is close to nature is also close to God, and must reveal his attributes in its own development.

NATURAL AND REVEALED.

Dr. Charles Carroll Everett, in his notable essay on "The Theology of Unitarians at the National Conference," which we publish in this number, effectively disposes of the antithesis which theologians have insisted upon maintaining between these words. They have usually separated them with a disjunctive "or." Dr. Everett unites them with a conjunctive "and." The whole attitude of Unitarian theology he finds illustrated in its thought of Christ and Christianity in their relation to other religious teachers and to other religions. "To the older Orthodoxy Christianity stood alone. It was true, while other religions were false. It was revealed, while in other religions are found simply human guesses. It came from heaven; while other religions were of the earth, earthy. Indeed, other religions were more often referred to as illustrations of the depravity of human nature than of its divine possibilities."

In contrast to this, Prof. Everett shows that "to the Unitarian the divine force is a constant element of history. It was present in the earliest period of the world, as the force which is to blossom into the beauty of the flower rests already unnoticed in the seed. When human life began, this strange and varied life of man, with its loves and its longings, this divine force, was still present, guiding and uplifting. The divine life in man, hardly conscious of itself, was yet responding in some vague, imperfect way to the Infinite Source from which it came."

It is curious to note how many errors in Christianity have been committed through a failure to apprehend this truth that natural and revealed religion are one and the same. The error of the Jews in thinking of their religion as a special descent from God was repeated in the Christian view of the Greek and Roman religions. It is amusing to see some of the old commentators ridiculing the absurdities of pagan mythology while teaching Christian mythology as veritable truth. The Protestant interpretation of the Bible is marked by the same forced distinction. It was not regarded as a natural literary growth, but as a book which came down from heaven like the tables of stone to Moses. The Puritans carried that idea into their politics. Only those who were church members, and therefore had received the special light of revealed religion, were allowed to vote; and they expressed their view of the inadequacy of natural religion to save men in words which are still retained in Presbyterian confessions to-day, and still believed by too many. Indeed, many of the old Unitarian churches, which in the Unitarian controversy became the natural heirs of Puritanism, are still hampered by this erroneous distinction in a double form of ecclesiastical organization in which a corporation, known as the "Church," and which was originally a select circle of believers, revolves within the larger circle of the parish organization.

In the Episcopal Church the same idea mischievously lurks in the theory of the historic episcopate, in which it is assumed that a certain line of priests received their authority centuries ago from apostolic sources. In the Roman Catholic Church the authority of the pope is supported by the assumption that he obtains special illumination from God by reason of his ecclesiastical office.

These are only a few of the unfortunate consequences of false conceptions of the nature of religion, when treated as though it were some æreolite dropping from heaven instead of a sentiment flowering naturally in the human heart, and coming to full fruition in the development of human society. Unitarians can render no better service than in watering the roots of natural religion in the confidence that in its normal growth we shall have the fullest revelation of God and of man.

Brevities.

Miss Frances E. Willard hit the nail on the head when she said, "What the world waits for is not the new woman alone, but the new man."

Election day in Massachusetts was bright. The day after the weather is always mixed. To the victorious it is bright enough, to the defeated somewhat cloudy.

The often expressed wish that Mr. Gannett's little book, "The House Beautiful," might be issued in more permanent form, has been gratified in time to make it available for Christmas gifts. Its suggestive chapters on the building and furnishing of a house and the best way to make a home ought to be put into the hands of all "the blessed twos" everywhere.

At the close of his bright and able article on "Woman's Position in Pagan Times," in the Forum for November, the late Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen says, "Until we cease to teach our girls the pernicious folly that they are to live only to love, they will, in my opinion, not be worth loving,—besides being exceedingly trying to live with."

Many who attended the National Conference would have been glad to consult a register of the names and addresses of those in attendance. Cannot arrangements be made next time to have an indexed blank-book kept by one of the secretaries, where the names and addresses of all in attendance may be entered? This is the custom in many other large conferences, and is of great service for reference.

In the business record of the National Conference which appeared in last week's Register, it is stated that the Thursday morning devotional meeting was conducted by Rev. H. B. Frissell, president of the Hampton Industrial School. This is a mistake. The meeting was most satisfactorily conducted by Rev. Frederick Gill of Arlington, Mass., who at a moment's notice consented to take charge of the meeting in the place of Rev. Edward Hale, who was announced on the programme, but was prevented by illness from being present. It is due to Mr. Gill that this correction should be made.

The Interior does not believe in the traditions of the churches that a minister is not good for much after he has passed the "dead line,"—his fiftieth year. But it says to ministers who are approaching this line: "Prepare yourselves for it. The first care should be of your health. Do not overwork. Do not fret. Cross the dead line in perfect health, and make it an object of life to do so. Then you can let yourself out for fifteen to twenty years of superb ministry, and be four times as good at sixty as you were at thirty. The dead line is already fading out. In another ten years it will only be a hateful reminiscence."

Unitarian National Conference.

We published last week the business record of the National Conference and various essays and reports. In this double number we present essays and addresses not included in the previous issue.

THE ORIGINS OF LIBERAL THOUGHT IN AMERICA.

BY JOHN FISKE, PH.D.

In approaching the subject of the origins of liberal thought in America, one cannot help remembering that the discovery of the new continent was itself such a stimulus to free thinking as the world had never before witnessed. From time immemorial the trade between Europe and the remote parts of Asia had followed certain customary routes. From ancient days, long before Olympiads were heard of, when Assyrian kings with curly beards commemorated their victories in arrow-headed inscriptions, men had used those same routes. Up the Red Sea, in the early prime of hundred-gated Thebes, came ships from the Indian Ocean, with gems and spices to exchange for Egyptian fine linens and amulets of amber from the Baltic; and five thousand years later Venetian argosies at Alexandria were laden with just such gems and spices to distribute to the merchants of Augsburg, the royal household at Paris, the lords and ladies of Haddon Hall. Empires rose and fell, creeds and pantheons came and went, stately temples reared their heads for centuries and slowly crumbled in ruin, and still, amid all the secular change, the world's great stream of trade flowed through the same unshifting channels, and there was nothing to show that this state of things, to which men's ideas and habits had always been adjusted, was not to endure forever. So it was in that recent time when Henry V. of England was smiting the French chivalry at Agincourt, and his cousin, Prince Henry of Portugal, was beginning the search for an ocean route to the Indies. Never did the human mind get such a wrench out of its ancient grooves, never were such vistas of new possibilities laid open, never was beheld such glorious hardihood, such startling romance, as in the time when Columbus sailed westward to find the East and Cortez met warriors of the Stone Age face to face. The men of Europe suddenly found themselves placed in new and unsuspected relations to the planet on which they lived. Worlds of barbarism and savagery, unheard of and unspeakably bizarre, were brought to their notice; strange constellations arose in the firmament; strange beasts and birds were encountered amid outlandish trees and shrubs in new climates beyond unknown seas. The old familiarity with nature's aspects received an abrupt shock. On every side loomed up new questions to be answered, new practical problems to be solved. All man's inventive faculty, all his patient inquisitiveness, all the courage he could summon, were forthwith called into play. The dreams of boundless riches, the eager thirst for new knowledge, the superhuman bravery which characterized the epoch of maritime discovery, are symptoms that reveal to us the highly wrought condition of the European mind at the time. A study of contemporary chronicles and letters cannot fail to bring home to us the singular intensity with which the thrill of venture-some romance was felt in every fibre of man's being.

The impulse thus given to free thinking must have been extremely powerful. It is customary to attribute the brilliant efflorescence of the human mind in the sixteenth century to the revival of Greek learning. Without seeking to diminish the respect due to that mighty cause, it may be contended that the influence of maritime discovery was equally important. While the Greek renaissance brought men into wholesome and stimulating intercourse with the highest achievements of literature, art, and philosophy, the discovery of the New World impressed upon them as nothing had ever done before the feasibility of doing things in novel ways. With the wholesale displacement of commercial relations, the European mind burst the bounds of the snug little world to which its habits and theories, its politics, civil and ecclesiastical, its science and its theology, had been adapted. The sudden and unprecedented widening of the environment soon set up a general fermentation of ideas. There was nothing accidental in Martin Luther's coming in the next generation after Columbus. Nor was it strange that in the following age the English mind, wrought to its highest tension under the combined influences of Renaissance, Reformation, and maritime adventure, should have put forth a literature the boldest and grandest that had ever appeared; that the era of Raleigh and Frobisher and the early Puritans should have seen even the highest mark of Greek achievement surpassed by Shakspeare. The gigantic revolution set on foot by Copernicus was already in full progress, the era of Descartes was just arriving, and the next century was to see modern scientific method receive its supreme illustration at the hands of Newton, while the principles of freedom in thought and speech were to find invincible champions in Milton and Locke.

Such was the age in which the work of English colonization in America was beginning. In looking for the origins of liberal thought in America, it is chiefly with English-speaking America that we are concerned. The Spanish mind, indeed, felt strongly the stimulus of the maritime discoveries, and the contact with strange races of men, until an age of chivalrous enterprise bloomed forth in the literature of Calderon and Lope de Vega and Cervantes; but the new spirit was not strong enough to prevail over an ecclesiastical organization that had been growing in power since the Visigothic times. The higher intellectual life of Spain perished in the fires of the Inquisition, and art and song failed to lead the way to science and free thought. No Spanish Locke or Newton followed in the train of a Lope and a Murillo, but so lately as the year 1771 the university of Salamanca prohibited the teaching of the law of gravitation as discordant with revealed religion.* With such a state of things in the mother country, liberal thought in the Spanish colonies was a plant of very slow growth. As for France at the end of the sixteenth century, there was a sturdy intellectual life there which no efforts of tyranny could more than partially repress; but circumstances threw the work of colonization into the hands of the Jesuits, and accordingly the history of New France, while eminent for devoted bravery and heroic endurance, shows scarcely a trace of liberal thinking either in politics or in matters pertaining to religion. Not with the French and Spanish portions of America, therefore, but with the colonies that developed into the United States, is our inquiry concerned.

The first and most obvious consideration which strikes us is that, while the two centuries following the discovery of America witnessed an unprecedented awakening of the European mind, yet it was only with those nations that had retained self-government that this intellectual awakening was to come to prompt and full fruition. From the British Islands and the Netherlands came the kind of public policy that allowed free thinking to take deep root and send up a thrifty tree of liberty. The planting of such seed in the spacious virgin soil of the New World was doubtless the greatest of all the manifold unforeseen results for which Columbus opened the way. It made political freedom the strongest power on earth, and thus favored the attainment of that equable flexibility of mind which allows the thought to play freely about the facts which are laid before it. Not in a moment was such a grand result achieved. Its complete realization has not yet come, and none of us may live to see it; yet toward that goal the whole impetus of men's civilizing work is tending, and there is no power that can prevent the consummation. Year by year, no matter how grave the questions with which we have to deal, we are becoming more and more able to let our minds play freely with them, to turn them hither and thither till all sides be seen and all aspects duly considered.

Not all in a moment, I say, has such a desirable result been achieved. So far is it, moreover, from having been brought about by conscious human effort that mankind have in general struggled desperately against it. Compared with the mass of men, it is only a few minds that have learned to regard absolute freedom of thought as something to be desired. Though the colonization of America came at a time when men's minds were stirred by novel ideas as never before, though the men of that generation were moving irrepressibly toward liberality of thought, yet there were very few who had any liking for liberal thought or any good word to bestow upon it. There were few who doubted that absolute truth was attainable concerning the most abstruse questions of philosophy and religion, and an exactly true belief on minute points of theology was deemed necessary for one's personal salvation. Changes in opinion simply wrought a transfer of allegiance from one orthodoxy to another, and the new orthodoxy felt bound as much as the old one to persecute all who refused such allegiance. From this point of view the history of the progress of liberal thought becomes curiously interesting, for it shows how one of the most momentous revolutions in human life has steadily gone on in spite of the inveterate antagonism of the very men concerned in bringing it about! To a considerable extent the history has been the same over a large part of the globe. The causes which have been at work in America have also been at work in Europe, and even beyond; and the liberal thought with which we are familiar is characteristic not so much of America as of the latter part of the nineteenth century. But along with the general causes there have been local causes which have especially concerned the New World, and a clear account of the matter requires us to indicate both the one and the other.

* Sempere, Monarchie espagnole, II. 152; Buckle, II. 92.

From the revolt of Henry VIII. against the Papacy down to the Revolution of 1688 there was in England a progressive movement toward liberal thought. It was at first a crude, unconscious movement in the direction of toleration, which is a necessary condition for the development of free thinking. When we have arrived at a truly cordial toleration of opinions, allowing to all free play to stand or fall, just as hypotheses in science are suffered to stand or fall, then is men's thought for the first time really untrammelled. Whatever, therefore, tended toward toleration of diverse forms of creed or worship was a step in the path that led to free thinking, and whatever tended to democratize the Church and relieve it from State control was a step toward toleration. The revolt of Henry VIII. at first but realized what the præmunire statutes of Edward I. and Edward III. had threatened. But by breaking up the religious orders, expelling abbots from Parliament, and making the headship of the Church a subject of fierce dispute, it contributed immensely to weaken and relax the bonds of conservatism; and it afforded a rare opportunity for the thoughts of laymen and small preachers to assert themselves. Thus the Lollardism which had been partially suppressed for more than a century now reared its head again defiantly, and, after learning lessons in democracy from Calvin, came forth as Puritanism, clad in full panoply for one of the world's most fateful contests.

In the course of Elizabeth's reign we find this Puritanism taking three different shapes. There were the moderate reformers, whose wish was simply to trim and prune the tree of Episcopacy; and, secondly, those who were afterward known as "root and branch" men, whose name is descriptive enough. Instead of pruning, they would uproot the tree and cast it away. To these Presbyterians the royal supremacy was no more than the papal a part of the living growth of Christ's Church: it was but stubble fit for burning. Kings looked with horror upon such views which threatened political danger no less than ecclesiastical. "A Scottish presbytery," cried James I., "agreeth as well with a monarchy as God and the devil. Then Jack and Tom and Will and Dick shall meet, and at their pleasures censure me and my council and all our proceedings." The case could not have been more pithily stated, yet even Presbyterianism stopped short of full-fledged democracy. For Jack and his friends, by means of synods and general assemblies, could create a governing body with power of enforcing conformity upon unwilling congregations. In protest against this somewhat oligarchical method, Puritanism assumed its third form, that of Independency. The beginnings of Independency are to be sought among the Brownists of Elizabeth's reign, though their day of glory first came with the Civil War. In the theory of the Independents, as fully developed, any group of persons wishing to worship God in common might come together and organize themselves into a Congregational church, existing by as good a warrant as any other church, and entirely free from the control of any bishop or synod or council. No outside power could prescribe its creed or interfere with its ceremonial. Each church became, therefore, a little self-governing republic, as completely autonomous as an ancient Greek city; and the union of such churches was based solely upon the spirit of spontaneous Christian fellowship. Such was the theory of Independency.

In these successive stages of Protestantism we may see the preliminary steps toward general toleration and toward liberal thought. In each stage the strength of the coercive power that could be exercised over men's opinions and expressions of opinion was sensibly diminished. From the coercive power of the universal Church, which had once been able to direct a crusade against the Albigenses, it was a long step downward to the coercive power of Queen Elizabeth, whose will to suppress Puritanism was perpetually held in check by motives of public policy. It was a yet further step downward from the coercive power of a sovereign to that of a synod, and thence again to that of a congregation. So striking is the progress that one who knew nothing of history might easily mistake the theory of Independency as providing practically for something like complete toleration. History tells us that this was far from being the case. Heresy, or dissent from the commonly accepted orthodoxy, has been no more tolerated in Independent churches than elsewhere; and, even in the absence of serious differences in dogma, persecution has been visited upon divergences from the customary ritual, as, for example, in the treatment long accorded to Baptists. In their militant days neither Presbyterianism nor Independency ever professed to be tolerant. The gravest reproach they could imagine was to be charged with encouraging free thinking. The eminent Scottish divine, Rutherford, gave expression to the prevailing sentiment when he declared, "We regard toleration of all religions as not far removed from blasphemy." Nevertheless, the movement which gave rise to Presbyterianism and to Independency was sure to advance to the announcement of the principle of universal toleration. That movement was itself the expression of a vast amount of free thinking, and it was not to stop short of recognizing the claims of free thought. The century that witnessed the beginnings of an English-speaking America saw also the genuine principles of toleration laid down by Roger Williams and Sir Harry Vane, and demonstrated with resistless wealth of learning and logic by Milton and Locke.

In an account of the origins of liberal thought in America, this English development is all-important; but it does not cover the whole field. America's inheritance from Europe comes chiefly, but not entirely, from the British islands. In the early days of the Protestant Reformation there were European countries in which religious toleration had advanced practically much further than in England. The England of Henry VIII. as compared with the Netherlands was in a crude and backward condition. The contrast might be likened to that between rural life with its narrow mental horizon and the varied cosmopolitan life of the city. England politically was a land of unrivalled promise, but she was not quite abreast with the most advanced culture of the time. Her government was mainly in the hands of country gentlemen who lacked some valuable elements of experience that were possessed by the burghers of commercial Antwerp and Ghent. A careful survey of the Middle Ages shows plainly an abiding antagonism between commerce and the ecclesiastical spirit. A general connection between the predominance of international trade and the secularization of public life is distinctly traceable. On the map of mediæval Europe one may point out peculiar spots where the Papacy never gained complete sway. In some of these, as in Bohemia and Southern Gaul, the resistance was due to Manichæan heresies brought in from the Eastern Empire, giving rise to a kind of mediæval Puritanism. In these we do not find a spirit of liberal thought developed, but rather an anti-Catholic fanaticism. The other peculiar spots lie in the great pathway of commerce between the Levant and the northern seas. In the free cities of Northern Italy and Southern Germany, in the Hansa towns, and in the Netherlands, priestcraft had less sway than elsewhere; and the general tone of thought was more liberal and modern. No city came so completely under the secularizing influences of maritime commerce as Venice; and it is significant that the Papacy, at the very pinnacle of its power and arrogance in the thirteenth century, utterly failed in its attempt to force the Inquisition upon that republic of merchants.

In similar wise we find the commercial Netherlands in the sixteenth century exhibiting practically such toleration in matters of religion as the British islands attained only much later and after prolonged and distressing struggle. From the time of Edward III. commercial intercourse with the great Dutch and Flemish cities was one of the most potent civilizing influences at work in England. It was a liberalizing influence in religion and in politics, and must be named among the causes which made the Eastern counties pre-eminent for heresy. In later days, when the Dutch provinces had saved their Protestantism, and recovered political freedom, they adopted a policy of toleration so broad as to seem to most contemporaries very eccentric. Their noble country was stigmatized as "the common harbour of all heresies" and a "cage of unclean birds." How it harbored heretics escaping from England is something that no American is ever likely to forget.

If after this glance at European conditions we cross the Atlantic and observe the group of twelve colonies that were planted during the seventeenth century, we find that five of them were especially notable for pursuing from the outset a policy of toleration, a policy favorable to liberal thought. These five, naming them in order of seniority, were New Netherlands, Maryland, Rhode Island, and Pennsylvania, with Delaware. In New Netherlands the Dutch simply maintained their traditional secularized policy. On the hospitable island of Manhattan all the varieties of European religion met on terms of equality,—Lutherans and Catholics, Quakers and Puritans, Moravians and Jews. After the English conquest this liberal policy was continued by the bigoted Duke of York, for reasons similar to those which made toleration a necessity in the province of the liberal and sagacious Calverts. The Catholic proprietors of Maryland wished to make their province a desirable home for Catholics who were inclined to leave England; and the only possible way of accomplishing this, without interference from the British government, was to pursue a policy broad enough to include Catholics along with all other kinds of Christians in its benefits. A similar necessity confronted Charles II. and James II. In order to secure as much protection as possible for Catholics, without interference from Parliament, it was necessary to pursue a policy broad enough to include Quakers along with Catholics. For such reasons James refrained from disturbing the liberal Dutch policy in New York. For such reasons both these Stuart kings supported the schemes of William Penn, in whose proprietary colonies of Pennsylvania and Delaware the principles of toleration were carried out on the whole more completely than anywhere else in English-speaking America. It is interesting in this connection to observe that the mother of William Penn was a Dutch lady, though perhaps it is possible to make too much of such a fact. The Quakers, who formed the strength of the colony, represented a phase of Puritanism more liberal than Independency. As contrasted with Independency, Quakerism was a notable advance in the direction of Individualism: it had outgrown the set of notions according to which a civic community ought to consist of a united body of believers. Pennsylvania, therefore, with its appendage Delaware, profited by the late date at which they were founded. They represented a more advanced stage of opinion than the colonies which started in the time of James I. Their proprietary government remained undisturbed until the Declaration of Independence; and in 1776 these two States were the only ones in which all Christians, whether Protestant or Catholic, stood socially and politically on an equal footing. For, after the accession of William and Mary had made the Episcopal Church supreme in New York and Maryland, the Catholic inhabitants of those colonies were disfranchised and made the subject of various oppressive enactments. Even the laws of Rhode Island, as first printed, early in the eighteenth century, expressly prohibit Roman Catholics from voting. The date of this statute is not known; but it was probably subsequent to 1688,* and may be due to the strong antagonism aroused by the conduct of James II. However that may be, the statute was not repealed until 1784.

The disfranchisement of Catholics was contrary to the spirit of the Rhode Island charter and to the views of Roger Williams, who certainly understood the rational grounds for religious toleration better than any other man of his time, save perhaps Milton and Vane. He represents the Protestant principle of the sacred right of private judgment carried out with unflinching logical consistency. In him the transition from Independency to Individualism is completed. The contrast between the two is illustrated in the controversy between Williams and Cotton which was called forth by the publication in 1644 of Williams's book entitled "The Bloody Tenent of Persecution."

John Cotton was a typical Independent, and by no means a man of persecuting temperament; but his view of the matter is extremely one-sided. He admits that it is wrong for error to persecute truth, but he holds it to be the sacred duty of truth to persecute error. Williams, on the other hand, sees that truth stands in no need of violent or artificial support, and that error contains within itself the seeds of death. He feels, too, that, when I venture to persecute what I call error in others, I virtually assume my own infallibility. Thus not until pure Individualism is reached is the fundamental fallacy of Catholicism escaped. In order to protect this sacred Individualism, Williams would have a complete separation between Church and State. Under no pretext whatever should the civil government interfere with religious matters. There should be no more statutes against heresy or heretics, no enforced attendance upon public worship, no support of churches by taxation. Roger Williams not only proclaimed such doctrines, but he lived up to them. He never took pains to conceal his dislike of Quaker doctrines. In his seventy-third year he once rowed himself in a boat the whole length of Narragansett Bay, in order to conduct a dispute against three valiant Quaker champions. Yet, in spite of vehement pressure from the neighboring colonies, he resolutely refused to allow the civil power of Rhode Island to be used against Quakers. Massachusetts in fury threatened to cut off the trade of the weaker colony, but nothing could intimidate Williams into what he termed "exercising a civil power over men's consciences." Among the public men of the seventeenth century Roger Williams deserves a pre-eminent place. He was the first to conceive thoroughly and carry out consistently, in the face of strong opposition, a theory of religious liberty broad enough to win assent and approval from advanced thinkers of the present day.

The separation of Church from State, which was effected with such remarkable success in the founding of Rhode Island, did not become general in the United States until after the winning of independence. On this issue the eighteenth century had its memorable struggle, in which the protagonist was Virginia, and the victory was achieved under the leadership of Jefferson and Madison. The early policy of Virginia was to drive out dissentients or subject them to civil disabilities; and, of the Puritans who went thither, for a while the greater part left the colony, many of them retreating into tolerant Maryland. After 1660 for three generations the Episcopal folk had it all their own way. But about 1720 began the wholesale immigration of Presbyterians and Lutherans into the Shenandoah Valley; and after the middle of the century trouble began when the tide-water Cavaliers tried to impose taxes upon these people for the support of the Established Church. The most numerous and powerful opponents of this narrow policy were the Presbyterians; and, inasmuch as these had come not from Scotland, where their own Church was established, but from Ireland, where it was persecuted, their experience had led them to approve the separation of Church from State. Their political notions were also strongly Democratic; and with the aid of their votes Jefferson's party not only abolished primogeniture and entail and other old English customs, but also carried the disestablishment of the Episcopal Church in Virginia. Madison's Religious Freedom Act of 1785, which not only effected this, but likewise did away with all religious tests, is a very important event in the history of the United States. The statute which declared that "opinion in matters of religion shall in no wise diminish, enlarge, or affect civil capacities," attracted attention far and wide. It was translated into several European languages, and published with admiring comments; and in the course of the next forty years it was imitated by one State after another, until all over the land religious freedom came to be almost as complete as legislation could make it. The qualifying adverb is still needed; for by the constitutions of Pennsylvania and Tennessee no man can hold office unless he believes in God and a future state of rewards and punishments; in Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, the two Carolinas, and Maryland, belief in God is required; and in Arkansas and Maryland a man who does not believe in God and a future state of retribution is deemed incompetent as a witness or juror.* Such curiosities of law-making—survivals from a lower state, like the caudal vertebrae in man and the higher apes—are common enough in history.

The various stages here mentioned in the progress toward religious toleration and toward the separation of Church and State are important symptoms of the progress of liberal thought. Of course, Madison's Religious Freedom Act could not have been proposed by an Endicott or sustained by a community that would not endure the presence of Baptists or Quakers. The sketch here given shows an enormous advance in liberal thought in the course of two centuries and a half. But such a survey is far from telling us the whole story. A further inquiry into causal agencies is needed; and the best field for it is furnished by that theocratic Puritanism which cast out Roger Williams, the Puritanism of the four confederated New England colonies, and especially of Massachusetts. No one can deny that in Massachusetts during the nineteenth century liberal thought has advanced further and has permeated the community more thoroughly than in any other State of the American Union. For at least three generations the intellectual ferment upon which liberal thought in the United States has thriven has come chiefly from Massachusetts. Yet among our colonies which attained social maturity during the seventeenth century there were none which made such emphatic exhibitions of intolerance and bigotry as Massachusetts. She was as clearly and avowedly founded upon an illiberal principle as Rhode Island was founded upon a principle of liberality. The Endicott type of mind is the very antipodes of the Roger Williams type; yet it was in the land of Endicott, and in a congenial soil, that Theodore Parker lately flourished. Whence came so great a change? The answer will remind us that there are two sources from which liberal thought is nourished. The one is the secularized Gallic spirit that deems it folly to interpose obstacles in the way of the natural working of reason and common sense: the other is the intense devotion to spiritual ideals, which, in spite of all inherited encumbrances of bigotry and superstition, never casts off its allegiance to reason as the final arbiter. The former spirit is of vast use in the world, although its tendency is to deaden into mere worldliness, as typified in a Franklin. The latter spirit may commit many an error, but its drift is toward light and stimulus and exaltation of life, as typified in an Emerson. In the darkest days of New England Puritanism the paramount allegiance to reason was never lost sight of; and out of this fact came the triumph of free thinking, although no such result was ever intended.

The aims of the Puritans who settled in New England were not all alike, but one dominant aim with many was the founding of a Commonwealth in which Church and State should be identified, somewhat after the pattern of the old Hebrew theocracy. To this end the suffrage in Massachusetts and New Haven was limited to persons qualified to receive the sacrament in Congregational churches. This Massachusetts idea was never adopted by Plymouth, and the founding of Connecticut was at least in part a liberal protest against it. In New Haven it was soon suppressed by the act of Charles II., which put an end to the separate existence of the colony. In Massachusetts, where this theocratic policy prevailed for half a century, the result was the growth of an unenfranchised class, which came to include four-fifths of the community. During the first generation, when the policy was administered by broad-minded, sagacious men like Winthrop and Cotton, its evils were not flagrant. But after 1650, with such fanatics as Norton and the aged Endicott at the helm, it soon became evident that the rulers were at variance on many points with the mass of the people. This was shown with glaring force in the Quaker persecution, when the violence of Endicott's party produced a popular reaction of feeling, which enabled the Quakers to carry their point, and remain in the colony in defiance of statutes. It was further shown in the Half-way Covenant and the founding of the Old South Church in 1669, as parts of a movement toward extending the suffrage; and again in the rise of the Tory party under the lead of Joseph Dudley, opposed to the pretensions of the clergy. The magnificent work of the Massachusetts theocracy in resisting the crown throughout the whole reign of Charles II. can never be forgotten. Nothing was ever done in America that contributed more toward the maintenance of political freedom. But, in spite of its merits, the faults of the theocracy were such that we cannot regret its speedy overthrow. When that overthrow was effected, by the charter of 1692, there were a great many people in Massachusetts more or less hostile to the kind of Puritanism entertained by their grandfathers, and thus prepared for a more liberal mental habit. There was also a marked secularization of thought, a diminution of interest in theological problems, and a deadening of religious zeal.

A wonderful series of changes was set on foot by the writings and preaching of Jonathan Edwards, and the group of revivals between 1735 and 1750, known as "The Great Awakening." Few figures in history are more pathetic or more sublime than that of Jonathan Edwards in the lonely woodlands of Northampton and Stockbridge,—a thinker for depth and acuteness surpassed by not many that have lived, a man with the soul of poet and prophet, wrestling with the most terrible problems that humanity has ever encountered, with more than the courage and candor of Augustine or Calvin, with all the lofty inspiration of Fichte or Novalis. An interesting historical essay might be devoted to tracing the effects wrought upon New England by this giant personality. The "Great Awakening," in which he took part, and to which his preaching powerfully contributed, revived the popular interest in theological questions, disencumbered of the ever-present political implications of the previous century. In many ways his theories acted as a disintegrating solvent upon the beliefs of the time. For example, the prominence which he gave to spiritual conversion, or what was called "change of heart," brought about the overthrow of the doctrine of the Half-way Covenant. It also weakened the logical basis of infant baptism, and led to the winning of hosts of converts by the Baptists. Moreover, the uses to which Edwards put his doctrine of the will produced a reaction toward Arminianism, which not only affected the teachings of the Baptists, but predisposed many persons to join in the wave of Methodism which was just about to sweep over the country. A similar reaction against Edwards's views of divine justice, re-enforced by some first faint inklings of Biblical criticism, pointed the way toward Universalism. Still more, the discussions aroused by Edwards's speculations on original sin and the atonement began to undermine the doctrine of the Trinity and prepare men's minds for the Unitarian movement. No such results would have been possible save in a country where education was universal and the Sunday sermon a favorite theme of discussion. Sooner or later the perpetual appeal to reason, with the familiar use of metaphysical arguments and citations of Scripture, must lead to novelties of doctrine and to negative criticism; while for the education of the popular intelligence nothing could be more effective. In seventeenth-century Puritanism, therefore, in spite of its rigid narrowness, there were latent the speculations of an Edwards, the further conclusions to which some of them were pushed, the reactions against them, the keen edge of the critical faculty in New England, and much of the free thinking of a later age.

* Hildreth, i. 461.

* Stimson, American Statute Law, § 46.

In the course of the eighteenth century some influence was doubtless exercised in America by the English Deists, and at the very end of the century by Thomas Paine. There is no reason to suppose that any appreciable effect was produced by the atheism of the French Encyclopædists, which was mainly a reaction, largely emotional and aided by the shallowest of metaphysics, against the effete ecclesiastical system in France. It was too remote from American ideas to exert much influence here. The Deism of Voltaire found a few scattered admirers. A quiet religion of humanity, which set little store by miracles or abstruse doctrines or the divine authority of Scripture, was held by a number of eminent persons of strong, prosaic common sense and feeble spirituality, among whom may be named Franklin and Jefferson and John Adams. This phase of free thought was of considerable importance, but the dominant influence in New England down to the rise of the Transcendental movement was that which could be traced back to Edwards.

In the early part of the present century the most advanced phase of liberal thought, represented by the Unitarians in Massachusetts, was trying to hold an utterly untenable position, half-way between narrow Orthodoxy and untrammelled free thinking, when the ground began to be cut from under it by the Transcendentalists, whose native temperaments, not wanting in kinship with that of Edwards, were stimulated by a brief contact with Kantian and post-Kantian speculation in Germany. In Emerson's poetic soul the result was a seminal influence upon high thinking, in America and in the Old World, the power of which we cannot but feel, but which it is as yet too soon to estimate. In the middle of the century some wholesome destructive work still needed to be done, and it was well done. When German criticism, with the other weapons in the powerful hands of Theodore Parker, freed us from the spectre of Bibliolatry, it might indeed be said that the promise of the Protestant Reformation was at length fulfilled. The change wrought in the Unitarian Church since Parker began his preaching has been to some extent followed by analogous changes in other churches. On every side the last quarter of the nineteenth century has been pre-eminently the age of the decomposition of orthodoxies. Here and there and everywhere they are crumbling into ruins; and, as the world has long since left behind the age of trilobites and the age of dinosaurs, so in the world to which we are coming there will be neither a place nor a use for orthodoxies.

For, as I must observe in conclusion, there is all about us a resistless and worldwide influence at work, to which all the temporary and local causes I have mentioned have been but the ministering servants. From age to age our knowledge is growing from more to more. From the discovery of America, from the astronomy of Copernicus and the physics of Galileo, down to the universal Doctrine of Evolution in our own time, there has been one grand, coherent, and consecutive tale of ever-enlarging, ever more organized and rationalized knowledge of the world in which we live. By this enlarged experience our minds are affected from day to day and from year to year in more ways than we can detect or enumerate. It opens our minds to some notions, and makes them incurably hostile to others, so that, for example, new truths well-nigh beyond comprehension, like some of those connected with the luminiferous ether, are accepted, and old beliefs once universal, like witchcraft, are scornfully rejected. Vast changes in mental attitude are thus wrought before it is generally realized. Into the new scheme of things old beliefs no longer fit, and are therefore cast aside and forgotten. Now, our orthodoxies are of older date than the goodly fabric of modern knowledge. They are the outcome of more primitive and childlike thinking. They have ceased to fit the world as we know it; and, therefore, they fade and fall away from us in spite of all our efforts to retain undisturbed the venerable and hallowed associations. In this inevitable struggle there has always been more or less pain, and hence free thought has not usually been popular. It has come to our life feast as a guest unbidden and unwelcome; but it has come to stay with us, and already proves more genial than was expected. Deadening, cramping finality has lost its charm for him who has tasted of the ripe fruit of the tree of knowledge. In this broad universe of God's wisdom and love not leashes to restrain us are needed, but wings to sustain our flight. Let bold but reverent thought go on, and probe creation's mysteries till Faith and Knowledge "make one music as before, but vaster."

THE THEOLOGY OF UNITARIANS.

BY CHARLES CARROLL EVERETT, D.D., LL.D.

In these days of differing and changing beliefs it is not easy to define accurately the theology of any body of Christians. At the first glance this difficulty might seem to be greater in the case of Unitarians than in that of most others. Almost every other denomination expresses its belief in a formal statement of faith. To know what each believes, it might seem that one had only to read its creed. I am not sure, however, that the existence of a creed does not increase the difficulty. It introduces a complication. In these days, to learn accurately the theological position of the members of any denomination that has a creed, one must do three things. One must ascertain the real meaning of the creed; then one must learn, as best he may, the beliefs actually held by those who profess this creed; and, finally, one has to ask in what relation these beliefs and the creed stand to one another in the minds of those who profess them. In order to learn the belief of Unitarians, only one of these things has to be done. There is no common theological formula to which all subscribe.

It is not necessary to compare the belief of Unitarians to-day with that held by those even of the last generation. That their theology has undergone changes in the past, and that it is still undergoing change, is a fact that Unitarians frankly and somewhat proudly accept. Development in theology is regarded by them as a sign of life. There has been a great movement in the thought of the world in regard to all other matters, they insist: why should not theology advance with the rest? This change is very obvious when we notice the way in which Theodore Parker is spoken of by Unitarians of the present day, and compare it with the way in which he was spoken of by those who were his contemporaries. I do not say that all Unitarians would to-day accept the teaching of Theodore Parker; but he is recognized as one of the heroes of the denomination that during his life held itself aloof from him, the names of Channing and Parker being often linked together, while preachers who hold views similar to his are welcomed to the pulpits from which he was excluded. The task is further simplified by the fact that, as I believe, there is a greater uniformity of belief among Unitarians than among the members of most other religious bodies. A creed is intended to promote unity of faith. In practice, however, it tends to produce divergence. The belief which a man holds, or thinks that he holds, is apt to be a compromise between what he would believe if left to himself and what the creed teaches. There is no natural line where these two meet. So the line in any individual case is more or less individual and capricious, while the fact that a certain belief is forced upon one tends to produce a recoil to a greater or less distance from it. Unitarians being unhampered by any constraint, trusting merely to such faculties as God has given them, tend to reach results more or less similar.

There are, however, two real difficulties that meet us in our attempt to describe the theology of Unitarians. The first of these springs from a tendency which is met to a certain extent among liberal preachers of every name, but which is, perhaps, most marked among Unitarians,—the tendency to keep what is commonly known as theology somewhat in the background. Comparatively few of our ministers have to any great extent an interest in theology, as such. In this the Unitarian preachers of the present generation differ from those of the past. We love chiefly to preach religion in its simplicity and in its uplifting power. We dwell to a large extent on the ethical and humanitarian aspects of religion. There is a tendency to keep in the background points of difference, and to bring forward the great positive principles in regard to which all unite. This is a healthy tendency, but it makes a little more difficult the attempt to define accurately the theological views held by Unitarians in general. In saying this, I have, however, already stated one of the most important points in the religious beliefs of Unitarians. It is the belief that religion is more than theology, that true life is the essential thing. This, however, may be in part my excuse if my presentation of Unitarian theology should be found one-sided or imperfect.

The second difficulty to which I referred meets us when we attempt to make our definition of Unitarian theology a distinctive one. There is, I suppose, no body of Christians that does not contain many advanced thinkers. If, by some irresistible call, all those in the various Christian denominations and outside of them who hold views similar to those which Unitarians cherish as their own should come forth and range themselves under a common name, great would be the multitude. These beliefs are found masquerading under strange names. Some of the treatises, for instance, on the doctrine of the Trinity put forth by one theologian and another of orthodox sects are read by Unitarians with some surprise. When they have brushed away the obscurities that result from the use of technical phrases, they are surprised to find that what is announced as Trinitarianism is what they have always cherished as Unitarianism. Perhaps one important distinction between the Unitarian and Christians of other name is that he is content to speak the language of the nineteenth century. He sees no reason why he should not call things by their simplest names. When, therefore, he sees some theologians calling by the name of Trinity a conception of the Deity that Theodore Parker might have held, in order that they should speak the language of those whose thoughts they had left behind them, he sees no reason why he should follow their example.

I have said that the Unitarians have no generally recognized and formal statement of belief. The nearest approach to this is a sentence that was introduced a year ago, with much enthusiasm, into the preamble of the constitution of this body. The statement is this: "These churches accept the religion of Jesus, holding, in accordance with his teaching, that practical religion is summed up in love to God and man." This, you will notice, speaks only of practical religion. There is no word of theology in it, yet it throws much light upon the theology of Unitarians. It suggests what appears to me to be the most characteristic feature of Unitarian theology. This theology contains no hint of anything similar to what has been called a "scheme of salvation." By a scheme of salvation I understand some artificial and indirect way by which men may be saved. This has generally involved a plan by which men may be accepted as being what in fact they are not. If we look over the history of religion, we find such schemes of salvation at almost every turn. Sacrifices, and, indeed, nearly all religious rites, represent some such artificial and often ingenious method of winning the favor of the Divinity. All such schemes are swept away at a stroke by the sentence that I just read. It insists upon natural relations instead of artificial ones, real relations instead of substitutes for them, life instead of expedients for covering up the lack of life. Religion is simply love to God and love to man. Man cannot be saved by any scheme, for his salvation consists in the development of his best nature.

The "scheme of salvation," which under various forms long prevailed in the Church, was based upon certain legal fictions. The suffering of another and the righteousness of another were, in a certain sense, imputed to the Christian. This is what has been known in a special sense as the "scheme of salvation." The expression has been very dear to the Christian, and has called forth his gratitude for the love displayed, and also admiration for the divine ingenuity by which the desirable result has been reached. This—the typical scheme of salvation—is now losing much of its prestige; but it is succeeded by other, though more tenuous schemes, the number of which increases almost yearly. These often lack to a large extent, if not wholly, the fictitious element which marked the earlier one. They have, however, in common with the historic scheme, the element of arbitrariness and artificiality. They represent something outside of the life of the world and of history. Such a scheme is often assumed to exist even when it is not understood. Many put their faith in Christ on the ground that, in some way which they do not understand, he makes the divine forgiveness possible. It is not necessary, they believe, that they should know the way by which their salvation is secured.

The great tendency of orthodox theology to-day is to what is known as a Christo-centric religion. Christ is all. In this form of religion, little is known or thought of God except as he is manifested in Christ. Christ is all and in all. In some forms of this Christo-centric faith the work of Christ is fulfilled in the establishment of his kingdom upon this earth. In others there is recognized more of a mystical relation to him. In these views of Christ and of his work we have still, in a more sublimated form, a scheme of salvation. Christ and his work are superimposed upon the world. They are something apart from the great movements of history and of life. There is still an artificial narrowness. We still have something foreign, not only in degree, but in kind, to any other religious movement that the world has seen.

There remained something technical. Among the older Unitarians something of the same view of Christianity was recognized. To some of them Christianity still assumed the form of a scheme. At present, however, the tendency is to look upon Christianity in a larger way; and I am inclined to think that this tendency has to a very great extent reached its legitimate result.

Perhaps this fact may in part account for that comparative lack, among liberal Christians, of interest in purely theological discussion of which I have spoken. On the one hand, there is less interest in the controversy in regard to these narrower forms of belief. It is felt that the battle has been fought, and that to renew the strife is to a large extent the threshing of old straw. On the other hand, the study of theology under the large form in which Christianity is now generally held by the Unitarian lacks something of the zest which was connected with the narrower modes of thought. A scheme is never quite perfect, do what you will with it. You cannot draw a circle that will include the earth and the heavens. You cannot make an artificial scheme that will at every point fit in with the realities of the world. You cannot make such a scheme which the human spirit will not in time outgrow. Do the best that you can, the result will need constant patching and enlargement and readjustment. To explain and to readjust such a creation has furnished occupation and interest to many a theologian. The view of the Bible which has been so largely held in connection with the "scheme of salvation" has furnished a most interesting field for such labor. The Bible was believed to be from beginning to end the directly revealed word of God. While it was regarded in this way, it was necessary to show that it was without self-contradiction, and that it was at every point in accord both with science and with our highest spiritual and ethical sentiments. Looked at in this light, it became one of the most fascinating of riddle books. Of course, in many passages the theologian introduced much into it that was not found there. So far as these passages were concerned a most interesting transformation took place. That which the interpreter introduced into the Bible was his own human thought. When he drew it out, it came with all the authority and dignity of a divine revelation. From the nature of the case the Unitarian has not this kind of interest in theological discussion and Biblical interpretation. Such artificial construction, such ingenious riddles, have no place in his thought. There remain to him, however, the great mysteries that have stimulated and awed the thought of the most profound spirits in all ages, the mysteries of life and of death, of mind and matter, the mystery of freedom, of the great movements of history, of God's revelation of himself,—not merely within the pages of a single book, but in all of nature and of human life. From this point of view the study of the Bible assumes an interest far grander and deeper than could be offered by the ingenious efforts toward a superficial harmony to which I have referred. Such study naturally appeals to fewer, but there are among Unitarians on both sides of the ocean those for whom they have great attraction. It may be that some of these profound problems can never be wholly solved, yet the wrestling with them gives strength and inspiration; and, if the shadows do not wholly pass away, yet there shines from time to time light out of the darkness.

We can here see the difference between faith as it is understood by the Unitarian and faith as it has been to a great degree understood in the historic Church. To this latter faith has been very largely concerned with special and superficial matters. Faith had to do with the Bible, the infallible word of God. It had to do with the creeds that men had formed. The mysteries that made most demand upon it were those connected with the scheme of salvation. Human reason must be humiliated. Human love must be narrowed. An eternity of suffering the result of sin in the little span of human life must be somehow reconciled by faith with the infinite love of God. How many noble and tender souls have striven to blindfold their reason and hush the protests of their hearts, that they might yield themselves unquestioning to the faith that was demanded of them. Because the Unitarian had not faith such as this he has been regarded as unbelieving. But to the Unitarian there comes also the demand for faith. There are mysteries enough in the world, and there is no need that men should invent them. It requires faith to recognize the supreme goodness that is working in a world where there is so much of suffering. It requires faith to look at death, and see there life. It requires faith to hold fast to the highest in spite of all that would drag down toward the lowest. It requires faith to trust to the best instincts of the soul, where there is so much that would mislead. There is much to help this faith. There are scenes in nature, there are moments in human life, in the presence of which faith alone seems possible. There is the great movement which the history of the world presents, to which faith seems the proper climax. But, with all such help and such inspiration, faith remains faith.

Though she may climb to the loftiest mountain summit, she reaches at last a point where she must spread her wings and soar. Such faith is not faith in an ingenious scheme, but in the eternal verities.

I have spoken of the absence of any scheme of salvation as one of the most characteristic marks of Unitarian theology; while I have been careful to claim for the Unitarian no monopoly of this or any other special form of thought. I have referred to this, because more than any other aspect of the case its influence is felt in every part of the theology we are considering. If I had spoken of any one doctrine as distinctive, as of the unity of God or the nature of Christ, it would have stood very much by itself; but in the characteristic that I have named we have a fundamental principle, the effect of which is all-pervading. I have spoken of it as though it were a negation. In fact, the Unitarian belief is sometimes regarded, when compared with the older Orthodoxy, as being made up chiefly of negations. It has been regarded as a somewhat colorless residuum that remains to theology after certain positive elements had been removed. On the contrary, the negations of Unitarianism have been largely negations of negations; and their result is not negative, but positive. What has been denied are certain limits which theology had imposed, certain shadows which an imperfect theology had cast. The wind that sweeps the heaven clear of clouds does a negative work; yet its result is really positive, for it reveals the glory of the heavens. When a traveller sees for the first time the Pantheon at Rome, it does not always at once occur to him that the two little belfries that stand one on either side of the dome were not parts of the original building. He is conscious only of a certain cheapening of the effect, of a certain lack of complete satisfaction in the structure before him. A moment's reflection, however, shows that these appendages were added when the building was adapted to ecclesiastical usage. As he in imagination sweeps these impertinences away,—the grand old temple stands before him in the simplicity of its original perfection,—Christianity has given to the world more of good than we can ever fairly calculate; but this Roman temple is not the only thing that ecclesiasticism has robbed of its true beauty.

The world with all its manifoldness of form and of life is yet one. The course of its history, from the lowest to the highest, follows a single line. This grand unity of nature, material and spiritual ecclesiasticism has also cheapened and disfigured. The theological schemes of which I have spoken form excrescences upon the unity of the world, and stand to it in a relation similar to that in which the petty belfries stand to the temple of the Pantheon. When these are swept away, the process is one of negation. The result is a grand affirmation.

The ecclesiastical schemes do not merely add excrescences to the simplicity of nature. They draw lines and erect partitions which represent no fundamental division, but simply confuse and conceal the simple proportions of the whole. The world, according to such scheming, does not represent a single life. Its history has not been a growth, but an accretion. It has been built by a series of creations, one larger being superimposed upon another. Above all, the great glory of the spiritual life, the beauty of the love of Christ, does not belong to it. It is something foreign. The Christ came from afar. He stooped to this poor world. He moved through it, substituting other laws for its laws,—rather, setting all laws at naught,—and departed, leaving a method by which not those who merely share his spirit, but those who in addition to this, sometimes even without it, fulfil some technical requirement, may be saved. I recognize as deeply as any other the wonderful beauty of much that has gathered about this scheme of salvation. The story of the descent from heaven, and all the marvels that are connected with this strange career, have a fascination for the imagination and for the heart. To many the world looks bare and cold without them. Many feel helpless and forsaken without some such special scheme by which they may be saved; but in the simplicity and unity of the world's history there is a grandeur and a beauty that no invention of man can equal. I have no doubt that, when the complicated theory according to which the movements of the heavenly bodies were once explained, the theory of crystal spheres,—of cycles and epicycles,—was given up to many who had become accustomed to this cumbersome machinery, the heavens seemed empty and uninteresting. But who to-day, so far even as æsthetic interest is concerned, would give up the simplicity of our modern astronomical science for this antiquated and complicated arrangement? Man's inventions may be ingenious, but in nature there is something better than ingenuity. It is the simplicity of nature that the Unitarian theology seeks, and, as we believe, in part has found.

In what I have said I must not be understood to affirm that all Unitarians deny the truth of all the stories of so-called miracles that are recorded in the New Testament. This is not the case. For the reasons that I have already given, I cannot state to what extent this is done. I am confident, however, that very few, if any, Unitarians would to-day base their belief in Christianity on any such foundation; and I am inclined to think that all, or nearly all, who accept as true these stories of the miraculous, would see in the so-called miracle the manifestation of some higher and unfamiliar law, and not a suspension or violation of all law.

It is this interest in the simple and natural manifestations of the life of the world that led to the glad reception on the part of many Unitarians, of the theory of evolution, as this was made something real and tangible in the work of Darwin. This theory has slowly made its way to a somewhat reluctant acceptance by many Christians of every name; but I think that among Unitarians there were many more than elsewhere who hailed it with delight. At the same time this theory has done much to make the Unitarian conscious of his true position.

In the light of this theory, many distinctions that have seemed absolute had to disappear. There is no material substance that is not in some way and in some degree instinct with the promise and potency of the higher life. The lowest forms of being point toward the highest. The whole history of the world is animated by the impulse toward a common end. As Emerson sang,

"There is no great and no small
To the soul that maketh all."

It is the soul in its pressure toward the full realization and consciousness of itself and of its divine relationships that has made the world.

This whole attitude of Unitarian theology is well illustrated by its thought of Christ and Christianity in their relation to other religious teachers and to other religions. To the older Orthodoxy Christianity stood alone. It was true, while other religions were false. It was revealed, while in other religions are found simply human guesses. It came from heaven, while other religions were of the earth, earthy. Indeed, other religions were more often referred to as illustrations of the depravity of human nature than of its divine possibilities. One theological writer, more liberal than many others, has in somewhat recent years affirmed that in Christianity God came down to man, while in other religions man was struggling up toward God. This statement is dishonorable to Christianity as well as to the other religions over against which Christianity is placed. In Christianity also there was found the aspiration toward God. Jesus himself looked up with prayer and felt his spirit enkindled and exalted by the thought and by the presence of the infinite Spirit. And not alone in Christianity was the divine life manifested in man. Not alone in Christianity did the divine stoop to the human. It is impossible that the human soul should lift itself, however little way, toward the Father unless the Father draw it. There can be no breath of earnest prayer and upward aspiration unless the divine Spirit manifests itself in the utterance.

To the Unitarian the divine force is a constant element of history. It was present in the earliest period of the world, as the force which is to blossom into the beauty of the flower rests already unnoticed in the seed. When human life began, this strange and varied life of man with its loves and its longings, this divine force, was still present, guiding and uplifting. The divine life in man, hardly conscious of itself, was yet responding in some vague, imperfect way to the infinite Source from which it came. The mistakes, the degradation, the abominations, of some of the lower religions, are still indications of the lofty nature and relationships of man.

"The fiend that man harries
Is love of the best."

In the religions of the world it sometimes appears really as a fiend prompting to all devilish excesses. Indeed, the selfishness and lust and cruelty of man have often been blended with the religious impulse, just as a spring of living water may be defiled by the impurities of the soil up through which it has pressed. But this living spring of the religious life in the heart of man, this spring that has its source in the divine heights, has tended to free itself from this defilement and to bring pure refreshment to the souls of men.

Theologians have spoken of the revealed religion as if there were only one, as indeed there is only one; but they have spoken of it as if it manifested itself only under one special form, that of Christianity and of the Hebrew preparation for this. What, then, shall we say of the other religions that have seen something of God? We cannot see even a landscape that does not manifest itself to our vision. We cannot see a work of art unless the artist has revealed himself to some extent in his creation. How, then, can man anywhere or at any time have seen anything of God, unless God had shown something of himself to him? When the Vedic worshipper sang the praises of Varina, the just and the holy punisher of sin, by whom the winkings of men's eyes were numbered; when the Mazdean bowed before Ormuzd, from whom all the goodness of the world came, and who was himself the good and the hater of evil; when the ancient Chinese recognized a divine ruler of the world who was no respecter of persons, who looked not at men's descent and position, but at their deeds,—had there not come to all these some revelation of the highest? These visions indeed appeared in the midst of beliefs and forms that were of a lower order, but the visions were no less real. There is, then, no religion that is not a revealed religion; and there is no religion that is not a natural religion. That these statements seem to contradict one another, and their combination seems to suggest a meaningless paradox, shows the low and imperfect view which many take of nature and of man.

It is this low and imperfect view so generally held of nature in general and of human nature in particular that makes it so difficult for the Unitarian to make his position fairly understood. If he says that Jesus was a man, he is understood to say that he was mere man, as though there were ever such a thing as a mere man. If he says that Christianity was the result of a natural religious development in the world, he is understood as saying that it is only a human invention, as if there were ever a natural or human religion which was not in some degree the manifestation of the divine Spirit that has been all along present in the world. If, on the other hand, to avoid such misunderstanding, he insists that Jesus was divine, he is understood to be separating him from the world, and placing him in the heavens. When he denies this interpretation of his statement, he is accused of juggling with words.

The source of such misunderstanding is in the fact that men have been so accustomed to place, in their thought, God on the one side and the world on the other, the Divine on the one side and humanity on the other, that any community between the two forms of being seems impossible unless they are forcibly brought together in an external combination. Unitarianism did well to insist, especially through the voice of Channing, on the dignity of human nature. The words "dignity of human nature" sound sometimes to us strange and meaningless enough, as we look upon the selfishness and greed that play so great a part in the affairs of men. We must remember, however, that the greatest and the best are as truly men as the lowest and the meanest. Both belong to the same race. If the one class shows pitifully enough somewhat of the actual condition of humanity, the other class shows no less clearly something of its possibility. The Unitarian formula which I have quoted implies something of this dignity of human nature. It speaks of love to man, just as Jesus did, as one side of the religious life. The phrase you will notice is "love to man." It is not pity for man, it is not merely sympathy, it is not merely duty toward man: it is love. Love implies that to the lover there is something lovable in the object of his affection.

The dignity of human nature consists in the grandeur of its possibilities. These possibilities result from the fact that in man the divine force which has been the moving power in the development of nature may attain to consciousness of itself, and thus to a more direct manifestation of itself. If the world is a godless world, then it is well that a God should descend from the heavens for its redemption.

Within a few days I have met a pamphlet written with great learning and strong logic to prove that, without the supernatural birth of Jesus, Christianity would be without basis and without significance. I imagine that few Christians would take such extreme ground as this; but, to very many, the power and significance of Christianity consists in the fact that it came from above to the world, and was not the natural outgrowth of nature and history. Our theories do not change the nature of things. If you call Jesus a God, none the less does his humanity remain. If you call him a man, he is no less divine. The Unitarian bases the honor which he pays to Jesus, the reverence that he feels for him, and the obedience that he owes him, not upon theories, but upon facts; not upon any official dignity that he finds in him, but upon the work which he actually accomplished. If nothing is so important to man as religion and morality, then he who has done the most and the best for these deserves the highest place in the reverence of man. If, as most, if not all, Unitarians believe, the moral and religious teaching of Jesus was higher and more complete than the world had known, and if the religion that owes its origin to him is loftier and better adapted to man's spiritual nature than any other, and if his life was so in accord with his teaching that it adds to his power and is glorified by it, then there is needed no thought of superhuman origin or of official rank to draw forth the deepest gratitude and homage.

"All hail the great Immanuel's name,
Let angels prostrate fall!
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all."

Thus has the church sung often in inspiring strains. The Unitarian knows little of diadems and prostrate angels. A different note fits better with his faith:—

"And those who dearest hope and deepest pray
Toil by the Life, Light, Way, which thou hast given."

It appears to me that these humbler and more human strains express the truest homage.

But, it may be asked, what, then, is his authority? What right have we to find in him in any sense a revelation of God? The Unitarian takes from Jesus his definition of religion, but he does not hold it merely on the authority of Jesus. The scholar thanks his teacher not because he has solved his problem for him, but because he has trained him so that he can solve it for himself, or, at least, so that he can see for himself that the answer that the teacher has given him is the true one. So the Christian may be grateful to Jesus for such development of the spiritual life as makes confidence in its largest utterances possible rather than for any statements that are to be accepted merely because he made them. Yet for these highest utterances there is an outward authority,—

"Out from the heart of nature rolled
The burdens of the Bible old."

So sang Emerson in a poem that well might seem the prelude to the later religious thought. Because they rolled out of the heart of nature, do they reveal the power that is working in and through nature less than if they had been grafted upon it from without? "Out from the heart of nature" must come the revelation of what nature is, and of what the power is that is manifested through nature; and of such revelations the highest, because it is the highest, must be the truest.

Thus does the liberal thought restore to the world the fair products that had been torn from it. And the beauty of the Christ life, not merely lent it for its brief adornment, remains to testify to the richness of the soil from which it sprang, to testify to the fact that a divine force is working through this life of ours that seems to us often so low and meaningless; that even in our hearts it may work some fruition if we will suffer it.

In regard to the thought of God, I know of few Unitarians who are greatly attracted by metaphysical speculations or theosophical constructions. In the formula that has served us in some sort as a text the Unitarian speaks of love to God as the first great element of religion. If God is to be loved, then God must be thought of as a being whom it is possible to really love. This by itself would sweep away beliefs that make it difficult or impossible to love him if he be such as they describe. Unitarians love to think of God as Jesus taught us,—as the wise and loving Father. Moved by the influence of the later scientific thought, they love to think of him as one who reveals himself in the order and beauty of his universe rather than in interferences with this. What is loftiest and best reveals him most truly. In the mother's love for her child, in the friend's love for his friend, in the patriot's love for his country, in the good man's love for his kind, in the true man's condemnation of sin, in the aspiring faith of the saint, in the great heart of Jesus, full of tender love of his fellows and of generous indignation toward those who would oppress their brethren, full of the consciousness of God and of longing to lift men into the same consciousness,—in all of these the Unitarian finds revelations of God; and in the inspiration that sometimes comes directly to the devout heart, and sometimes with its warning and condemnation to the sinful soul.

To the Unitarian the thought of the future life fits in with his other religious faith. "Eye hath not seen," cried the apostle, "nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart to conceive what things God hath prepared for them that love him." So the Unitarian does not picture the coming life in the likeness of the earthly life, with the trouble all left out. He does not picture a hell where lost souls suffer for evermore. The next life is to him simply the natural flowering of this. But what special shape this flowering will take, how can he know? He believes that there the highest aspirations shall find their fruition, that spirits shall somehow live in God. And this means that they shall live the highest life that is possible for each.

In regard to the dear ones who have gone from us, he says with the poet, whose words have been so often on our lips this evening:

"What is excellent,
As God lives, is permanent;
Hearts are dust, hearts' loves remain,
Heart's love will meet thee again."

Such, most imperfectly stated, is what I conceive to be the theology of at least most Unitarians. Would that we were more worthy of it!

Tuesday Evening Meeting.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE.

Rev. E. A. Horton, before introducing the speakers for the evening, said that he was ready to maintain in calmness and with judicial equity that there was nothing of more importance before the Conference than the question, what to do with the young people. They have been running away from us while we have discussed metaphysical papers. They have felt the frigidity of our churches, and have gone to a more genial religious hearthstone. You may come here, and crown the past with your garlands of praise; you may discuss the nebular hypothesis and its relation to the evolution of Unitarianism; you may do other things of equal gigantic stature. But, until you come down to the practical matter of handling the young people, the chimes may be hung in the future Church of Unitarianism, but there will be no happy throng of young people coming together to worship God in spirit and in truth.

We are to consider to-night, he said, the young with reference to the great word of "education." Millions of free men seem to find in this watchword the talisman that will make men nobler and grander. "Education" is the watchword of the republic. But what kind of education is meant? The American republic must fully understand that a public school system, however fully equipped, graduates simply smartness, without rounding out and balancing the moral nature, unless in some way the conscience be made sensitive.

One of the most serious problems that ever challenged the progress of this nation confronts us,—its religious development. Take in and assimilate all you can from every other denomination, but remember the church we represent is of the people, for the people, and by the people. While it is quite possible that we may have bishops,—I am told we have them now,—let us remember that the great heritage to us is the freedom to think. We want to teach our children that, and rally the young people, so that they will carry on the campaign of religion for the people.

Remember, too, that we are to teach the young people something about citizenship. As Mr. Batchelor has said, the great aim of our teaching is to make children of God. He who remembers truly what the flag means will recall, also, the truth that, unless the government is preserved in its integrity, you will have no church. We want our young people to admire the past and listen to its eloquent whisper, but to remember that America is given for our trust and stewardship, and we should look upon it with respect, and know that the soil here is as sacred as that of Greece or Rome.

Besides this enthusiasm, we must interest our young people in the practical matters of to-day. If the union of young people's organizations is a success, as by the grace of God we mean to make it, that will prove one of the most helpful means of reaching and educating the young and bringing them, through the gates of the Sunday-school, into the church.

Mr. Horton then introduced Dr. G. Stanley Hall as the first essayist.

PEDAGOGICAL METHODS IN SUNDAY-SCHOOL WORK.

BY G. STANLEY HALL, PRESIDENT OF CLARK UNIVERSITY.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen,—I bring you to-night no eloquence, but a plain, homely, frank, earnest, and, I hope, practical talk.

Some three years ago several of us at Clark University began to collect data for a history of religious instruction throughout the world. We have progressed a good ways in the collection of documents. We have a great many original letters from all over the world and from many different faiths; but we soon found that we must go back of the documents and history, and study the soul of the growing child and youth. So, nearly two years ago, we issued sets of questions which we widely distributed, asking for answers. We have upwards of six thousand sets of answers from as many people, some answered by parents, some by the children themselves, with regard to their religious experience and training. I should be glad if any of you who may be interested in this work would send for these questions, if you will answer them. As briefly as I can, I will give you some of the results.

If I could imagine myself a clergyman for a moment, which I really wish I could for my half-hour,—although I am so much of a pedagogue that I should want to be turned back at the end of that time,—I would take as a parable one not found in any Scripture,—the biological parable of the tadpole's tail. I know a lady in Cambridge who some years ago did what so many have thought might be done,—snipped off the tail of a tadpole, thinking that thereby she could expedite the growth of the hind legs of the frog; but she found that, if you amputate the tail, the hind quarters never develop. The legs do not grow, and therefore the tail is an organ absolutely essential in the growth of the legs.

That is a parable of very deep and wide biological significance for our theme. It would apply to every rudimentary organ. It would apply to the prehensile toe of babies,—to Mr. Robinson's babies, for instance, who hung from a stick over the bed some seventeen minutes, and not one of them could do it at the end of two or three or five months. The reason is that the muscles that are involved in that particular movement are developed as rudimentary muscles; and after a few months, having no use, they pass into something better. So the rudimentary organs of the human body are absolutely indispensable for growth.

There is nothing that more conduces to a sense of the presence of God than to see under the microscope the development of an embryo. As it changes, you say it is going to be protozoa, or later metazoa. When further developed yet, you say it is going to be a vertebrate, then, perhaps, a mammal, a dog, an ape, man. And the strange part of this mysterious development is that by it you and I and every member of the human species, since we were a drop of protoplasm, pass through in our own individual lives every stage that life has passed through since it began on the globe. The stages, to be sure, are telescoped into each other, so that the embryo passes with great rapidity from one to the other, so that it is not always possible to note the growth of the different stages.

If you will bear in mind my text, the first point to which I wish to call attention is that, in order to teach children religion, we must begin, not with revealed, but with natural religion. Revealed came later. No matter for the definition, but what we know now as natural religion is the only pedagogical basis for teaching any other kind of religion later. It is an elementary organ; and, if you snip it off, the higher forms of religion will not grow well or be strong.

Every child that lives and is normal is an abject fetiche worshipper: it is an animist, a polytheist. It passes through all the stages of idolatry, and it must pass through them if its finer, higher qualities are to be developed. We find that every normal child has its own amulets, charms, fetiches, mascots,—things in inanimate nature to which they ascribe elements of psychic life, with which they are symbolically en rapport, by which these rudimentary organs of the soul find exercise. How many of these rudimentary organs of the soul there are we do not know, but more than the seventy of the body of which Weismann speaks. These instincts and feelings are deeply stirred: they are reverberations from the remote ancestral past, and are set in sympathetic vibration in the unspoiled child. He lives in a closeness with nature which the adult knows nothing about. Saint Francis d'Assisi gives us some gleams of this as he addresses the Brother Wind, Brother Sky. It shows itself in other ways, as when Richard Jefferies said that he wished to have his body burned and the ashes scattered that they might return to nature; or, as when poor James Thompson wants to be eaten by the worm, that the worm may be eaten by the bird, and so he might be diffused through the cosmos, because he wished to become a part of animate nature.

I have been a frequent visitor at the crematory at Forest Hills; and I have been much struck with this fact,—that a great many people scatter the ashes of their friends over the ground. Some take them carefully away to strew them on some mountain-top or lake, getting something in this way that might be called a religious satisfaction; and yet it is only a part of that old, deep, animistic rapport with nature which is the common root and the only root of religion, of science, of literature, and of art. If we dwarf it, if we do not allow it to develop rightly in its season, all the aftergrowth will be like the legs of the tadpole whose tail has been prematurely cut off.

You remember that Socrates says, in substance, O Miletus, you certainly would not dare to say that I do not believe in the deity of the sun, the moon, and the stars? That would be going farther than I would go. If an undevout astronomer is mad, an undevout biologist is mad. These things are at the root of the ontological passion of man.

These rudimentary organs must not be interfered with. It is a very dangerous thing to have an inflammation of a rudimentary organ. It makes the worst kind of cranks. It arrests the development of adjacent rudimentary organs. They need to have free growth.

Every child has something in his soul that is in common with the soul of the flower. We have facts coming to us from all our experience with natural children to show this. One child lies on his stomach for three hours, gazing into the root of a harebell, and says he never was the same being afterward that he was before, because something had taken place between them, and he felt different after that toward all animated nature. We have known children who have fallen in love with flowers, with names of plants. Love animates the great majority of the signature names. Take any book of flower lore, and try it on your own children, and you will have a revelation. You will realize among other things what the old doctrine of signatures meant, and how old cures were originally suggested. Froebel said he gazed into a flower until he was hypnotized, and said, "Kindergarten," and cried, "Eureka!" and the thing was done. So of animals and birds. Mythology is full of the rapport of children with these. Polytheism, animism,—these are indisputable fertilizers of the heart out of which are the issues of life.

We are coming to see nature in the new light. Go to a book-store, and you will see that nature books are demanded,—White of Selborne, Burroughs, Audubon, Thoreau. I see one house advertises forty-three nature books of various kinds for the coming year. They help in the revival of the love of nature, and it is a blessed thing for the children and for us. If we have passed the golden age, it is a blessed thing for the children that we are coming to understand that nature is dynamic,—that it is not dead matter, but full of life. It is not unclean: it is a reservoir of infinite force. We are coming to acknowledge the claims of nature in its original meaning about to be. Horus utters its only song of "Hush, all hush!" and seems to describe nature as though it were veiling something about to be revealed. We are coming to see, in the language of Francis Thompson, as he draws a picture of his lady-love, who is not very good-looking, "I cannot see your countenance for your soul." That is what we are saying to nature. It is not an inanimate influence, but it is dynamic. Nature, all that constitutes the external universe, is bringing us to this new great knowledge. There is no such thing as a vacuum, no empty space. The old doctrine of the plenum did not express it. All is law throughout all visible life. If there has been destruction, it is to make way for higher life. The doctrine of the survival of the fittest means the survival of the best, so that goodness and love seem to be at the core.

I almost wish I might address you with the unction of a clergyman I used to hear as a boy, when, at the climax of his discourse, he would say, "Do you love the Lord, you, and you, and you?" (pointing.) I want to say to you, ladies and gentlemen, and I say it with no less solemnity, Do you, and you, and you really love nature? Do you know what that love is? Has it been shed abroad in your hearts, or are you still, in this day of the great revival of nature love, strangers and aliens to this new moving of the Spirit of God?

I believe that a real love and sympathy with nature gives us consolation in affliction. I believe that it gives eloquence and earnestness and background and depth to the inculcation of every Bible truth and of all religious instruction. I believe that it gives an earnestness that lifts us far above that kind of pessimism that sometimes grows about the word "evolution," which says that life is mostly painful. That is the tone of the decadent soul of the present time. To look with the fulness of life, of joy, of love, at nature,—that is the first condition of religious teaching. And so I say that every teacher of religion in the Sunday-school should be an ardent and earnest lover of nature.

My second point is this. There is a period of great importance called "adolescence," which is the religious teacher's peculiar opportunity. How should it be met? Adolescence is the time when every young maiden and man in the early teens ceases to be an individual, and becomes more interested than ever before in others. Before that every natural child is and ought to be selfish. There are physiological reasons for that. Every child that is not precocious and not spoiled is naturally selfish up to that time, but then the soul turns instinctively toward others. The social instinct is developed; and the great passion of love, love for others, that shrinks self, begins, and this we are coming to understand as never before. It is a second birth physiologically. All the cortical layers of the brain function more than in years before or in years after. Many of the small granules probably develop into cells. All the physical features of the body are changed, and very many of the remote ancestral strains of the blood appear. The likeness to parents that has not been seen before comes out. Blood from many different ancestral stocks is poured into the veins at once. We have all eight grandparents in three and a half generations; and Galton tells us that we each have some twenty million ancestors, if we reckon back to the time of William the Conqueror. These hereditary traits, then, are poured in, and appear at this time. In this country there is a very deep and significant biological law that is illustrated here. Where the blood is mixed, as it is in this country, the strain is far greater, and the problem of teaching young people during these critical years—for the period lasts from ten to twelve years before perfect maturity—is far greater than where the blood is pure. Compare, for instance, the Russians, Germans, and the Jews with our own people. They go through this crisis in a far different way. The period is less prolonged, less intense, less dangerous. The difficulty of meeting this strain and this critical period is seen in the many books addressed to adolescents. I have myself collected over two hundred text-books written to use in this country bearing upon this period, and I find that there are more here than I can trace in four of the chief countries of Europe. Plainly, we have recognized the needs of adolescence here.

Its importance is great. It has always been recognized. In every country where it has had indigenous origin, education has always begun at this period, in the early teens. Every savage race begins its authority at that time,—tattoism, initiation, instruction in the symbols of the tribe. That is the time when the Catholic Church, the Russian Church, and Episcopal Church confirm. It is the time when the Greek youth passes from earlier training to instruction in music and arts, when the Roman gets his toga virilis. It is the time when most conversions in Protestant sects take place. This is the period when real education begins; and the important law is that it works up toward the university and down to the kindergarten, just in proportion as civilization advances. There is a possibility of degradation here that does not exist afterward, and the main thing that the Sunday-school teacher should look at is that there must be now a radical change. Every boy and girl takes a certain area of their education into their own hands. The most confidential parent is almost certain to be deceived. It is a time of changing from fear to love; and the lack of recognizing this great power of youth with the lessons that are obvious here is one of the greatest lacks, and a lack that brings to my third point, What is the want of education in the world?

What we want is education of the heart. These instinct-feelings, as they are coming to be called,—these constitute the man and the woman. It is out of these that are the issues of life, and all the newer studies of the human soul are drifting toward that conclusion: that the intellect is but the echo, the frothy crest of the wave; that it is a shadow from some greater and more substantial thing that is away off, unseen; that we have knowledge not for its own sake, but knowledge for the sake of life.

Who has made history? Not the great intellects of the world, but the great hearts,—Wesley, Loyola, Buddha, Christ, the great hearts of the world, its prophets. Young men and young women,—especially, young men, as I have learned from my experience in teaching all these years—need first to feel emotion. They must tingle, burn. The erectile tissues must be brought into exercise. It is necessary that the new-forming tissue of every part of the body should be supplied with blood, that they should glow with excitement. If they cannot get excited about their lessons, if we teachers cannot interest them in them, then they will paint the town red, they will have dissipations, and will make no end of trouble to the faculty; but excitement they must have. These calentures are a part of them.

The great danger, the great evil, that threatens this country to-day is the lack of enthusiasm and heartiness in our young men. I do not know a single college where, within the last few years,—I think I may say since my experience as a college teacher began,—where there has not grown up a fashion of nil admirari, of apathy, affected when it is not real. The young men put on a critical spirit, a lack of enthusiasm. This is not only so in the colleges,—especially true in the colleges toward the East,—but it is creeping down gradually into the high school, and especially into the fitting schools. Young men are ashamed of enthusiasm. But what is youth without enthusiasm? Nowadays there is no such a thing as a green, gawky Freshman to be found. He appears rather a tired man of the world before he enters college even. He wants it distinctly understood that he has cut his eye teeth, that he knows what is what, and that there is not much that his elders or his youngers can teach him.

That reminds me of a passage of Dr. Holmes, who tells us that the world is full of people who belong to the tribe of the "Pooh Poohs." You find them in every walk of life. When one glows with enthusiasm and wants to do a great thing, they cry, "Pooh, pooh! it can't be done." I am sorry to say that, when I see them, I often feel as if I wanted to be an Indian; and the tribe I want to join is the Kickapoos.

My fourth point is that we must recognize that all education is genetic. I am fanatic enough to believe that we are living in an age when "education" is coming to be the largest word there is. It is akin to the word "evolution," and I do not think it is an unworthy designation to say that it is akin to what the Darwinian calls "environment,"—the entire environment from protoplasm up that makes man man; and therefore I believe that the highest test of a religious denomination, of a school system, of a college of civilization, is whether it can bring its young men and its young women safely through these calentures and dangers of adolescence up to full and complete self-mastery.

What we want is to begin down, and set the end of our education ladder deep down into the very mud, if need be. The eternal vice of all Orthodoxy is that it takes a cross section view; that it is always afraid of doubt, when doubt is the only engine of progress, so long as we doubt what is below us, and never doubt what is above us. It is an exceedingly difficult thing to keep en rapport with childhood, because the traces of childhood in our soul are hardly more definite than the filmy lines of an acorn from which a tree has grown. These rudimentary organs of childhood in us have all vanished, and it is very difficult to keep en rapport with the child. But we must do it; and my plea is for superstition, if you please. I may use that word, for you will strip it of all its dangers. I want to plead for superstition; for it is essential as dung to fertilize the roots of life about the heart, for they do lie warm about the child's heart. Why in the world do we who have reached Christian maturity, who have cast off these things of childhood, attempt to weed out from the Bible all that we consider crass supernaturalism, the very thing that the childish heart needs? We do not do that for the opera. If the child is going to see "Hamlet," we do not say so much is true and so much is myth. That would be to emasculate it all. But we do just that for the Bible. These are things for the adult. I do not find any better reading than Unitarian Sunday-school literature. I have read the text-books which you furnish, thanks to your secretary. But I do not find gradations in it. It is too much like an impressionist picture. It could be turned upside down. The main thing we want is to get down to where the children live. That is what we need. I do not want to say or to leave the impression that I think a child ought to be brought up a crass Catholic, and then allowed to work his way up to the Unitarian faith; and yet I could qualify that so that it would be about what I do mean. But symbols, rituals, saint worship, mass, some of the sacraments, and many more things of this sort, are essential, are indigenous to child nature. If you do not believe it, go to St. Paul's School in New York, and see what effects are produced by the Paulist Fathers. I do not know where, with such poor teaching, such tremendous effects are produced. The point is, then, that you must rouse in the child those emotions which shall stimulate the things which are to be developed.

Exhaust each stage. Rise through all the lower ones, and not over them. That is the thing Mr. Petrie complains of in missionary methods. He says a great deal could be accomplished by taking the savage fetich and developing all there is in it, not making a tabula rasa, but developing the best there is in it; and that is the pedagogical method.

We must not forget the going up. Develop children to the highest possible. We have hitherto lacked the means of doing that. Our congregations get good preaching, but our colleges are also now getting it more than they have had. But, to give adequate religious instruction to young men our philosophical lecture-room has not been adequate; and I welcome as one of the best signs of the times this Neo-Christian movement in France, which has enlisted over five thousand young students and professors without any dogmatism. Catholics, agnostics, Jews, Protestants, are all enlisted; and they call themselves "Neo-Christians." I beg you to look into that movement, and to read Des Jardine, who is, I think, the saint of the movement. That suggests something not unlike the Vedanta in India, or Sufism for the Mohammedans who wish to rise toward new possibilities.

We have reached a new epoch. Science and religion are one; and, just as the Unitarian body has unified culture and religion, the next step is to unify science and religion. And religion will be just as much larger when that unity is accomplished as it has been made by the unity of culture and religion. Year after year is to see progress in this respect, if we have the vigor for this severe mediatory work which is impending.

The world seems never to have been so ready for great movements as it is to-day. It seems as if all the best things were coming together toward this one centre,—this unfolding the soul of man, and bringing it to a higher standpoint. It is as if God had come to consciousness in the human brain—that most complex of all tissues in the universe—more than ever before, as if it were a mouthpiece of things that never could have been spoken before.

And the children are the hope of it all. The test of every civilization and of every culture is what they do for minds that are growing, that are most plastic. And we are most blessed in this; for there is nothing so worthy the love and reverence, the life-long devotion, as the soul—yes, and the body—of the healthy, growing child. Unity with nature,—that is the glory of childhood. It is the basis of religion and the unity of childhood with nature that is the glory of the Sunday-school teacher, of the day teacher, and of the parent.

CULTIVATION OF THE SPIRITUAL NATURE.

BY REV. BENJAMIN R. BULKELEY.

When we try to teach people by beginning at the bottom, we must never end there, but must remember that the ladder goes on and reaches up to spiritual things. It is to this thought I address myself.

The cultivation of the religious nature, the spiritual nature, in young people, is one of the most important objects to which we can turn our attention. We were reminded of that when we saw those crowds in Boston lately, and felt what they meant for the advance of Christ's kingdom in the world. It stirred our enthusiasm, and made us feel that we lacked something. I believe that, if we can inaugurate a movement which shall command the allegiance of our young people, we shall give such an impetus to the progress of Unitarianism that we shall have hard work to parallel it. The cultivation of the spiritual nature has been one of the objects of our guilds. The guilds have taken the young people who have not found their mission, who have wished to do something, and have made them part of the church life. Young people have left our churches because there has not been any particular organization devoted to them. The elders have felt that they could not trust the affairs of the church to the young people, that there was too much at stake; but, if you can with the guild train them, they will eventually take their place in the church work. You say to us, perhaps, that in our enthusiasm we distinguish between the young and the old, that we make lines of division. But we do not make them: the Lord made them. He has assigned to every special period something to do, something to bring, some necessity to face. The old can bring wisdom, the young can bring strength; and the young can bring elasticity and freshness which the old do not possess. There is, therefore, something for the young to do. Unitarians are always afraid of cant, of running into set phrase, of using the old forms of Orthodoxy. But I never heard a Unitarian talk too much about religion. The young people will not be too forward in that direction. What we need is the kind of organization that will welcome the young people, and will meet their aspirations and willingness to work, and provide a channel that shall enable them to express themselves. Ministers sometimes confess that there is nothing in their churches which a young person can join unless it is to rent a pew, but there is no organization which shall respond to the young. There must be some way provided to secure a closer union between the young and the spiritual life of the church. It is a shame to us that our churches should not have some simple form of confirmation whereby the young soul can meet with response when it says, Here am I, Lord: send me forth.

The guild is important because it gives to the young person something definite to do. It is on that account one of the most helpful agencies we can throw around the young life. In any training for the young we should begin at the bottom of religion. What we do in the church must be done religiously. Out of that may grow charity, study classes, hospitality committees, temperance meetings, every beautiful purpose under heaven; but let all these courtesies begin and end as the crown in the thought of the relationship between God and man.

So I say that one of the most promising agencies which we can use, toward which we turn ourselves, is gathering together all the young people, and massing them in one Christian endeavor (perhaps that is the best name that can be used).

One other thought. It has been suggested that there may be a possible union of the different organizations for young people,—the Unity Clubs, the temperance societies, the King's Daughters, the guilds, and all the rest that have a common purpose. Let the union be planned in this thought, the thought of the guild. You may not take the guild as a model; but let them blend in one great organization, which shall have for its purpose the furthering of the kingdom of God. Let us bid God-speed to this promising movement, wherein there shall be this massing of young people for one consecrated end. And, as during the time of trial of our Civil War, when the call came from "Father Abraham" for young life to save the country, the cry came back, "We are coming, Father Abraham, three hundred thousand strong!" so, as our denomination feels its need that the young people should come and help, let the cry be, We are coming, we are coming, to do thy will, O God! Send us to the bringing in of thy everlasting kingdom!

THE LEND A HAND CLUB.

BY REV. E. E. HALE, D.D.

The Lend a Hand Clubs ought to be represented in this meeting because of their past history, of their present activity, and of the future which seems to be before them. They are not denominational clubs in any sense, nor would any discussion of theological or ecclesiastical distinctions seem in place at one of their meetings or in their charters or constitutions. Yet the range of their work is very wide. It is even said that a Shakspeare club would become a Lend a Hand Club if at every meeting its members consciously arranged for some work to be done unselfishly for the benefit of other people.

In practice the Lend a Hand Clubs may be called so many institutions for the education of young people to public spirit. A Mutual Improvement Society is a very good thing: so is man's own personal introspection and resolution to improve his own life, which is called self-culture. But, just as self-culture may become very dangerous, so a Mutual Improvement Society may become a Mutual Admiration Society, and may show every weakness of selfishness. No Mutual Improvement Society, unless it goes farther than its name implies, is a Lend a Hand Club or a Ten Times One Club. As an integral part of the constitution of such a club, it must be of use to some person or persons outside itself.

Some of the largest and most efficient Lend a Hand Clubs formed within the last twenty-four years have been of men and women, leaders in the towns in which they lived. There are at this moment a few chapters of the order of "Send Me," in which some of the leading ladies of a town unite, belonging to all religious organizations, and meeting at regular times, to be of any service which they can for the kingdom of God. If a freshet sweeps away a town, if a fire leaves homeless a hundred families, the alarm may come upon other people unprepared: it does not find the order of "Send Me" unprepared. There is a treasury, there is system of action, there is experience, ready for the contingency. But in the clubs which belong to our organization there are only a few of these societies of men and women. By far the larger number of our clubs represent the boys and girls or the young men and maidens. They belong to exactly the classes whose needs and whose future are considered in this evening's meeting.

We give entire liberty to any club to form its own constitution, to adopt its own ritual. But, naturally, we are called upon to select ritual and constitution for a great many clubs which enlist under the "four mottoes." In nine cases out of ten, therefore, I may say that these clubs are made up of young people, of either sex, who are willing to "Look up and not down,

Look forward and not back,
Look out and not in,
And lend a hand."

In formal and informal ways we undertake to carry out the spirit of these mottoes, which are the translation into modern life of the three words, "faith" and "hope" and "love," representing the three eternities. Generally, each club has a leader or adviser, a person rather older than most of the members. The meetings are generally once a week or once a fortnight. They are opened by the singing of a hymn or by some form of prayer. The repetition in concert of the four mottoes, follows, and the club is then free to address itself to whatever training or work has been laid out by its committees.

The immense range of the work undertaken by the clubs still surprises us. No year passes that we do not have some curious additions to the enterprises which young people can take in hand. What pleases us at the central office and what satisfies us is the evident success of the arrangements in showing to boys and to girls that they are of use in the world, and in introducing them early into unselfish life. For we are encouraged, as we see them passing from childhood into manhood and womanhood, with the spirit of work, and with some certainty that in their attempt they shall succeed.

One of the oldest clubs, beginning as a society of Sunday-school girls not ten years old, made in one winter the flannels and other underclothing for one little child: it was quite an enterprise for girls not used to sewing. The same club now consists in its central organization of thirty or more matrons, many of them with children of their own, who maintain still the meetings which they have carried on for more than twenty years, and who do not scruple, on occasion, to furnish all the underclothing necessary for a large asylum. How many offshoots from this club are established in different parts of the nation it would be hard to say.

The Lend a Hand Club of Wellesley College dissolved itself when it learned that one of its members had established a "Ten," as we call it, in the State of Kansas. That is to say, each of the remaining nine undertook the formation of a separate society. This is in exact fulfilment of the missionary law which we prescribe in theory for all our societies.

Among the largest of the enterprises which have fallen upon the organizations of these clubs has been a very considerable influence in the regulation of the reading of prisoners, observable more in the State of Illinois, perhaps, than elsewhere, under the direction of Miss Winnie Taylor. In three or four of our large towns the reading-rooms and public libraries have been set on foot by the agency of these societies. It is easy to see that, if in a prosperous town fifty of the young men and fifty of the young women, of good character, energy, and public spirit, determine that there shall be a public library or a public reading-room, such a result is apt to follow. In one such town the president of the central organization said, in joke, to the leader of the Ten Times One Club, "Why, you are the Tammany of the place!" to which the young man replied, perfectly seriously, "That is exactly what we are, and it is exactly what we intend to be."

The truth is that a boy of fifteen, at the end of ten years, becomes a man of twenty-five. Even if the girl of fifteen does not advance so rapidly, or her friends think that she does not, she is still a woman at the end of so many years. If our young people have been trained, between the ages of thirteen and sixteen, to live for others and not for themselves; if they have been shown that such life is practicable, even in details which appear somewhat trifling,—it will be quite sure that as men and women they will assert themselves, with modesty, if you please, but with dignity and with effect. And the officers of the central board have every year to express new confidence in the power of such education, because every year they receive some new and remarkable illustration of the truth that time is certainly with us in our effort for bringing in the kingdom of God.

The clubs themselves are modest and reserved in reporting their separate action. Naturally, however, enterprises turn up, from time to time, which require or suggest their union. The central office tries to carry these forward, and does so with encouraging success. Prominent among these may be named the work of the "Tens" for Jennie Dean's school at Manassas, Miss Brigham's immense enterprise in providing reading for the blacks at the South, the relief in their starvation of the Sea Islands planters and farmers, and the summer outings for sick men and boys in the neighborhood of Boston.

CHARACTER AND CITIZENSHIP.

BY REV. THOMAS R. SLICER.

When I heard the statement of President Hall that he was a fanatic, it occurred to me that we had before us a fanatic of the best ordered mind that I had ever seen, as he presented to us the new Pantheism, whose new name is the immanence of God,—God central to the atom and central to the soul. And I was reminded that before some audiences to exalt such love of nature as he did might have been misconceived as a phase of that old Pantheism, of which so many people are afraid. It reminded me that in my own subject there was a change of term that corresponded to the change of term in his own. I can remember when to discuss citizenship was a reproach to the pulpit, because it was considered politics, and when to put into the minds of children the idea of their obligation to the State was considered something antagonistic to the purposes of religious instruction. But we have got by those days. We may love God at the centre of this world, and we may serve the State as the highest duty that man can render when one is the most religious in his purpose.

Three fundamental principles lie at the root of our religious instruction. Every child is taught these three principles in the Unitarian Sunday-school. First, that essential honesty is necessary to manliness; second, that questions are to be dealt with on their merits, and not by virtue of their traditions or associations; third, that man is not to be religious for the sake simply of being a better man, but that he may make the world better for his having been a man in it.

If I were dealing with an orthodox Sunday-school as to the first of these principles, I should have to say it is absolutely essential that you shall be rid of all sophistries and all dignifying of mythologies, as though they were realities. That we have not to meet. If I were speaking to a teacher brought up on the old lines of creed as to the second of these propositions, I should have to say it is living in the theory, and not in the reality, that divides men one from the other, and makes it almost impossible to reach the essential merits of any question that is dealt with. And so of the third principle I should have to say to those children who have been brought up under different conditions, It is impossible for you to be a fit citizen of any right State so long as you believe in the efficacy of "imputed righteousness."

Happily for us, the broad principles that underlie the teaching of our schools are principles that have to do with character and citizenship, essential honesty, dealing with things on their merits, and living not to be better one's self, but to make a better world for our successors through the influence which we exert. So, then, we have this formula growing out of the situation which confronts us in our schools. It is proper to say to our children that society is the divinest thing we have, whether you judge it by its accumulated influences of the past, or whether you judge it by that strong tie of spiritual inspiration that runs through it, by which the average man becomes the savior of the State, and by which we trust the common heart of the common people because it is divinely inspired and its purpose is divinely directed. It is diviner than the church. The church is a segment cut out of society. Or take a biological illustration, one used by a professor of Prague, who says that "society is an organism in which every cell has consciousness." The business of the teacher in the schools is to teach that the health of the organism depends on the absolute healthiness of each individual cell. It is not an organization: it is an organism in which every cell has consciousness.

In dealing with this question of the Sunday-school, every boy and girl should have set before them the ideals of citizenship which shall be so sacred that they shall rise through all stages of development, as President Hall pointed out, from the "fetich worship" of the flag, from the "hero worship" of the soldier, to the admiration of the statesmanship which has glorified our nation's history, and from that to the consciousness that in each soul is carried a kind of secret holy enthusiasm for the State of which that soul is a part. This seems the first duty of our present age.

It is not an accident that in every great movement for the common weal the men and women of the Unitarian churches have led. It was not an accident that in Buffalo, when a committee was appointed from the civil service executive committee to organize the good government movement,—it was not an accident, I say, that of those six young men five were Unitarians, bred in Unitarian Sunday-schools. It was an accident that they were appointed, but not that they should be chosen. It was not known that they were Unitarians, but they went to their work as naturally as to a divinely appointed task.

So it behooves us, as Unitarians, to understand that there is in this revival of civic righteousness an appeal that even the youngest can be made to understand. It is not first a question of politics: it is a question of ethics. All questions at their root are ethical questions, and all questions in their flower are social questions. It behooves us, therefore, in implanting the teaching of the Sunday-school, never to leave them without some ethical root in their souls. The ministry of this time, whether of the pulpit or the school, has no higher duty than to inspire the children with the kind of courage that is going to redeem this land after a while. The reformation will come first in the great centres, and then spread through the rural districts, watering them with streams of righteousness. This is an age of religious revival of political righteousness and civic virtue. He is not of this age, but is suffering from that curious affection called detachment from the contemporary, who does not understand that his business is with the daily life of men and women, so that the place where he works shall be saner and sounder because there has been a centre of Unitarian church and Sunday-school work.

Church Extension.

THE PACIFIC COAST.

BY REV. C. W. WENDTE.

Ten days ago I stood on the Pacific shore, and saw the sun set in splendor in the golden gate at San Francisco.

Turning away from the brilliant spectacle, I began the long journey over the lofty mountains and vast treeless plains that stretch between those far distant outposts of our Unitarian cause and the populous Middle West where our churches more thickly cluster.

Still journeying eastward, I reached at last the Atlantic seaboard, and greeted the rising sun, gazing once more with delight upon the scenes among which my eyes first opened to the light of day and the glorious birthright of a free, rational, and liberal religion. I represent in this symposium the missionary and church extension interests of a territory comprising the three great States of California, Oregon, and Washington. This vast district contains, if the adjacent State of Nevada be added, nearly three hundred and fifty thousand square miles, an area about equal to that of the fourteen States which, with the omission of Florida, form the Atlantic seaboard. But in population the Atlantic States contain over thirty millions of people, while the Pacific coast counts little more than two millions. It is not unreasonable, however, to believe that the population of the Pacific States will in the near future increase very rapidly, and ultimately number twenty or thirty millions. In view of this fact the question as to what is to be the religious future of this section of our country becomes one of profound interest and importance, and especially so to our Unitarian fellowship. For it has been amply proven by the experience of the past few years that the present order of society on the Pacific Coast is extremely susceptible to the influence of the Unitarian form of Christianity.

A FAVORABLE FIELD.

In California especially there is not a town of five thousand people in which a Unitarian society cannot be successfully planted, if wisely undertaken, and aided for a few years with missionary funds.

This is testified to by the large comparative increase of our societies during the past eight years or since a systematic policy of church extension was inaugurated on the Pacific Coast by the American Unitarian Association. The five or six previously existing congregations have swelled to twenty-five or thirty, covering most of the larger towns of the coast. Among these are some of the largest and strongest churches in the Unitarian body, such as San Francisco, Portland, Los Angeles, and Oakland. There are also several local conferences, Unitarian clubs, Post-office Missions, a general headquarters in San Francisco, and a denominational newspaper. It may be maintained that, in proportion to its population, more Unitarian churches exist in California to-day than in any other State in the Union outside of New England.

That this denominational growth is not forced and ephemeral is proven by the fact that during the past two years of general financial distress, a distress which has been exceptionally severe on the Pacific Coast, we have not lost a single society or church edifice save the one that went up in flames at San Diego. Two or three churches, it must be admitted, are now dangerously near the vanishing point, chiefly because they have overbuilt. They will need the immediate and generous attention of our missionary boards. Three or four missionary movements have been temporarily suspended until better times return. A few ministers, unable to stand the large reduction of their salaries, have withdrawn. But, on the other hand, during those two years we have begun several new movements, dedicated at least one new church edifice, and paid off nearly $50,000 of church indebtedness.

The intense conservatism of religious opinion and opposition of the established sects, which so dishearten and retard the efforts of our missionary workers in other sections of our country, do not exist for us. Our California communities, especially, are eager to hear and ready in goodly numbers to adopt the liberal faith. This is true also of the State of Washington, and measurably so of Oregon.

The only question, therefore, is whether our Unitarian body will be equal to the great opportunity thus presented to it. Will it display the necessary sagacity, generosity, and enthusiasm, availing itself of this opening for its free and rational gospel, while these young communities are still impressible and hospitable to new truth? If so, it will largely direct and shape the religious future of the Pacific West. Or will it, repeating its former mistakes, wait until other creeds possess their minds and other church organizations occupy the ground and forestall our missionary activities? No such missionary opportunity was ever presented to a religious body in America as California and its sister States offer us to-day. Five years hence it will be too late to avail ourselves of it. It must be now or never! Can it be possible that we shall pass it by unheeded?

OUR MISSIONARY POLICY.

Our present missionary policy on the Pacific Coast, so far as it goes, is judicious and successful. Its leading features are the grants of money from denominational treasuries to young and feeble churches, and the maintenance of a superintendent to whom is committed the general oversight of missionary affairs. I trust my testimony may not appear suspicious when I affirm that the office of superintendent, in a community so far distant from the centres of our denominational life, is one of great importance and responsibility. This feature in our denominational policy needs in every way to be fostered and developed. The superintendency is still in process of evolution with us. Some day, when we get over our idle fear of ecclesiasticism, and adopt wiser and more effective missionary methods, we shall select for our superintendents the most eloquent, able, and influential men in our body, and so increase the emoluments and dignities of the position as to make it the most honorable and desirable our Church has to offer.

With their natural aversion to all forms of religious propagandism, our Unitarian people still too often look upon the office of such a general missionary as fit only for a broken-down minister, who, perchance, has failed in all else. The time will come—let us hope it will not come too late for practical usefulness to our cause—when we shall give to our superintendents the same consideration and influence which other churches accord to their bishops. The title matters little; but, if you desire an able and consecrated supervision of your church-extension interests, you must not treat with indifference but confer honor and compensation upon those who devote themselves to this work, and make every Unitarian superintendent the unmitred elective bishop or overseer of our Unitarian missionary work.

The time has now arrived, it seems to me, when the Pacific Coast should have all the time and strength of its superintendent, and the latter should not be compelled, as until now, to devote the major part of his labors to the pastorate of a single church.

GRANTS TO CHURCHES.

As for the present system of appropriations to infant or feeble churches, it seems to be eminently wise. Many years of practical experience have taught me that, with few exceptions, such grants of money should be made directly to the churches, and not to the minister, the superintendent having, however, discretionary power in certain cases.

NEW FEATURES. THE CIRCUIT.

I said a moment ago that our present missionary policy was good as far as it went. But it needs to be supplemented by certain new features, whose desirableness has become apparent during the past years.

The first of these is the adoption of the circuit plan of missionary operations. By this method the pastoral oversight of several towns, contiguous to each other, is committed to a single missionary, who may reside in one or the other town, and visit each of his congregations in regular order, to preach and perform his pastoral duties. The American Unitarian Association should make a grant of money for every such circuit sufficient to defray at least half the income of its incumbent. The balance he will be expected to raise from the field, and his aim will be to make one or all of his church organizations independent of all denominational aid as speedily as possible.

In view of such grant from the denominational treasuries, the work of these circuit missionaries should be placed under the supervision of the superintendent, who will aid their individual efforts by occasional visitation, and in other ways. This plan is not entirely unknown to us, but needs to be formally adopted as a part of our missionary policy, and to be so systematized that these circuit missionaries shall be wisely chosen and their fields of labor assigned so as to prevent duplication of effort.

The Pacific Coast is admirably adapted for this method of church extension. Ten such circuits, covering twenty-five or thirty towns, could at once be arranged for. The result could not fail to be of great advantage to our cause.

NEWSPAPER PROPAGANDISM.

In the second place the time has come, as it seems to me, to supplement our present methods of literary propagandism by means of the printed tract, with a larger and more discriminating use of the secular newspapers. The modest advertisement of our Post-Office Mission, and the occasional sermons by our ministers, printed in the daily journals, point the way to a more general and systematic use of this great organ of public expression.

The newspapers would not only economically print our Unitarian utterances, but also give them a wide circulation, carrying our views to vast numbers of people whom, by our present methods of tract distribution, we could never hope to reach.

Without elaborating my thought here, I would suggest that, to begin with, we secure, if possible, a column a week in the leading newspaper of a number of towns in which as yet no Unitarian church exists. To this local syndicate of newspapers there should be delivered once a week a column of carefully prepared Unitarian matter. Not long, prosy extracts from sermons, but brief, pithy, pointed, pregnant utterances, setting forth our principles, aims, and history. If furnished to these journals in the form of plate matter, it would find the readier acceptance. In the Pacific States it would be easy to arrange such a syndicate of country newspapers willing to print our matter, either as editorial or advertisement, at comparatively slight expense. The editors' hearts are generally with us. If this plan were successful, it might lead to other and larger uses of the newspaper press, such as our Roman Catholic, and in some cases our orthodox Protestant, friends already enjoy.

Our present methods of literary propagandism are becoming antiquated, and need to be supplemented with fresher and more effective agencies.

APOSTOLIC VISITATION.

Finally, as a greatly needed auxiliary to our missionary work in the Far West, I desire to make an earnest appeal for the personal visitation of representative Unitarians from the denominational centres at the East.

We, of the Pacific Coast especially, are separated from these centres by long distances, making our own visits to them a very costly and occasional thing. Your aims, your doings, your very selves, are almost unknown to us. We are fighting for a cause without ever laying eyes upon its leaders. Only faint echoes of your conferences and May meetings reach us through denominational journals, or the report of some fortunate clergyman, on his return, of our membership. But few were to the Unitarian manner born, and the number of those even who were born at the East is rapidly decreasing. I hear of one good woman who, in an isolated community, is toiling to lay up money enough to go to Boston and hear with her own ears the preacher of Unity Church, whose weekly printed sermons are her spiritual comfort and inspiration. What a vast gain for our cause in general if Mr. Savage could once a year be released from his local engagements, and sent all over the country to preach with the living voice the glorious gospel of the blessed God!

Brethren, we need more often your personal presence and word. We need to feel that, in spite of our isolation, we belong to a goodly fellowship, and that you have a living and personal interest in us. You yourselves need to understand better to what you are devoting your money, your efforts, and your prayers. You need the broadening and quickening of transcontinental sympathies to keep you from becoming narrow and provincial.

We have known in past times and been thankful for the apostolic presence and word on the Pacific Coast of Dr. A. P. Peabody, Dr. Furness, Dr. J. H. Allen, Robert Collyer, M. J. Savage, Grindall Reynolds, Edward Everett Hale, William R. Alger, John Chadwick, and others. But these mostly came as seekers for rest and recreation, and it is long since any came. Send us, we beseech you, next spring an apostolic delegation, the general secretary, Mr. Batchelor, and the treasurer, Mr. Stone, among them. Let them visit and speak to each of our leading societies, and not entirely forget the weaker and needier ones. Thus shall we be strengthened for our arduous work, and be kept from developing a purely local form of Unitarianism, indifferent, if not hostile, to the general denomination. Thus, too, our cause will grow in the public esteem. Your own minds will be enlarged, your aims lifted higher, and together we will press on to actualize our ideal, and bring the good news of Jesus Christ to every creature.

NEW ENGLAND.

BY REV. D. M. WILSON.

Something worthy in the way of church extension ought to be done in that God's country of the East, where there are more people and piety to the square foot than in any other part of America, where, among the descendants of the Pilgrims and the Puritans, the majority of our churches have been gathered, and where the sternness of the climate and the soil is tempered with what a Southern clergyman recently called the fad of liberality. Some money, too, New England has given to the cause; but her most characteristic production is notable men and women. And, when our Washington church here boasts of the great men who have adorned her pews, she utters names which are the valued possession in an especial degree of the part of the country which I have the honor to regard as my field. President John Quincy Adams and Webster, Everett, and the Quincys, Sumner, and John P. Hale,—who are these but Unitarians bred and born in our old New England parishes?

Much as we have done and much as we may be proud of, however, we do not in New England rest content with past achievements. Indeed, we are sorely disappointed that we have not done more, and are anticipating that our greatest triumphs are yet to come. We are full of hope for the future. And the first word I really have to say to you is that the prospects of church extension in New England are growing brighter every day. The newer methods we have adopted, following upon our better organized Unitarianism, are beginning to have their effect. We have put our zeal and enthusiasm to harness, and so are making more satisfactory progress. These methods are applied both to old churches and new enterprises. The old and dependent churches which are so distinctive a feature of our New England conditions are being stimulated to new exertions, and are being united with other churches under one pastorate, and so brought as near self-support as the state of things will allow. The closest economy consistent with the most abundant life is practised with regard to all our churches which need help. To the newer churches we rigorously apply the principle of the reduction of a certain amount of the appropriations every year, and look forward to the regular and speedy enfranchisement from dependence of most of the churches now assisted.

Due regard for economy and business-like methods would, of course, dictate such a policy as this; but I must say I have pursued it as much, if not more, because I hoped something would be saved for new enterprises. The growth of the church is the thing. It is all very well to stop leaks and encourage habits of self-support; but, as I take it, we are not set in our places, we superintendents, just to effect the more economical management of a pension bureau. Here is a vast revolution in human thought going forward, here is a world of men seeking a newer faith through the grand old instincts of the human heart and conscience; and shall we have small part in it all? Shall we not organize into companies and corps,—the hosts who will have no religion but that which is rational and no other God than a loving and lovable one? I know what you would answer, and in my work I am anticipating that answer. While with one hand I am aiding the Association to bring dependent societies to self-support, with the other I am trying to build the new city of our God. With you, I feel that, even to exist, we must be more aggressive in our efforts to organize the great multitudes who are really with us, and who, when they stand together, will count for pure Christianity. I take to heart the saying of Carlyle, that no living thing in all this world can exist without fighting strenuously with those weapons or faculties or principles with which nature has endowed it.

In this spirit I am planning things to achieve. And, as we cannot too soon establish strong, influential churches of our faith, I am taking for guidance this principle; namely, that we must go to the towns and cities where we can do this work with the least expenditure of money and the least lapse of time. Like the apostles, where the people are, there must we go.

To this end, I am making a careful study of the large and growing cities and towns in New England. I have visited most of the populous centres where there is no liberal church, studied the character of the people, pored over the census returns, searched out all the liberals I could find trace of, and soon hope to test the most promising places by holding in them a series of meetings. Many interesting and instructive experiences have come to me in this work. At first, to my surprise, the effort to find avowed Unitarians seemed to be unavailing; that is, outside the parsonage of the orthodox church. There the avowal of Unitarianism is often plainly made, but, as it would appear, for private circulation only. In Connecticut I have done considerable of this work. That State invites consideration because it is one of the three New England States whose population is rapidly increasing, and because we have thus far established but few churches within its borders. Religious thought, too, is broadening there; and our ideas are gladly received, although comparatively few as yet call themselves Unitarian. In one of the last places I visited I could not find a single adherent of our faith. The nearest approach to such was an old gentleman I accidentally met, who assured me, with a shrewd look in his eye that people didn't think as they used to, and that there were many who did not now believe the moon was made of green cheese. Still prosecuting my search, I called upon the postmaster and the editor of the leading paper. I even ventured into the enemy's camp, and walked into the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association to inquire. As a last resort, I visited the Baptist minister. I frankly told him my errand, said it was a duty laid upon me to look after my own flock, and asked him if he knew of any such. No, he did not. "And, if I should meet any," he said, "I would hammer at them until—No," he continued, "I'll take that back. I would do my best to lift them higher." "Keep to your first statement," I returned. "Hammer at them as much as you please, but the other thing you can't do." After half an hour spent in pleasant conversation, we parted courteously; but it was the courtesy of duelists who were about to measure swords. And yet, notwithstanding this fruitless search, we have already succeeded in drawing from this town to meetings held in a neighboring town a number of loyal Unitarians. Some for years have been recipients of literature sent out by the Post-office Mission. Some are born Unitarians, who, with tears in their eyes, expressed delight at hearing once more their own faith preached. The most of them have enough knowledge of our faith to convince them that it is the only faith they can accept. With regard to that adjoining town in which the meetings are held, some facts as interesting have come to light. A young lawyer and his wife, formerly attendants of an evangelical church, have become ardent Unitarians. They have been distributing our literature, they have been gathering about them kindred spirits; and, now that we are holding services in the neighborhood, they make all arrangements for them. Whenever I fail to send a preacher, our young lawyer reads some printed sermon or delivers an address of his own. In the last letter I had from him he states that new faces are seen at every meeting, and that all present listened with the deepest attention to one of Mr. Savage's sermons which he read. Now here are some promising symptoms in a population numbering about thirty thousand. We should continue to work in this field, and develop it to the uttermost. Only a few miles away there is another large and thriving city of about forty thousand inhabitants. It is my hope that services can be held in both places, and that one minister be put in charge.

Two Sundays ago I began meetings in the historic old city of New London. New London is the centre of a population of about twenty thousand, and within half an hour's ride on the cars are other large and thriving towns. One enterprising minister could at first occupy this entire region, and influence to some extent the thoughts of fifty thousand people. There is some inspiration in preaching where there are such multitudes. We feel that our labors are effectual, and that, in time, we must draw enough to our standard to give it strong support. Here, too, when I first looked over the field, I had not been able to find a single born and bred Unitarian. A number of people I did find who believed in rational religion, and some who were in revolt against all religion in consequence of what they had been hearing in the evangelical churches. Yet in the opening meeting held that stormy Sunday evening we had eighty people present; and, to my surprise, I discovered among them a good sprinkling of genuine and loyal Unitarians. What will be the result of these meetings? No one can say, but the promise is that we shall have in the near future a flourishing society.

Two more movements have been started this year in this State of Connecticut,—the one at Willimantic and another at Rockville. The Willimantic movement is popular, having congregations of from two to three hundred. The Rockville movement has a nucleus in its fifteen or twenty earnest and intelligent supporters. But we can just as easily start other four societies in Connecticut. Believers in rational religion are numerous in other towns, and only need to be brought together to form new centres for the radiation of the light of our truth. And I do not see why it is not my duty to nourish these into existence. We cannot have too many churches, providing the communities need them and the expense of giving them a start is not too great. And it is my place, by virtue of such experience as I may gain, to devote myself to finding out the right place to gather a church and the right way to bring it to self-support, and, having given it a good start, turn it over to the care of some competent minister. This leaves me free to do the same thing in other places. In this way church after church may be organized, and perhaps at no great expense. And this is the only kind of church extension worth our gospel, the only missionary enterprise that will ever arouse the interest and enthusiasm of our entire denomination. "It is as easy to do a great thing as a little thing," is one of the easily remembered phrases of Dr. Bellows. In this case the great thing is the most natural thing, and employs in the most economical way the machinery we have. When we regard New England, with its dense population and its wealth, its intelligence and its religious faith, it seems a possibility to be realized. Then, too, we have in New England, and near by in New York, to aid in such an accomplishment, a notable body of liberal clergymen. These able and devoted ministers, most of them in a position to serve, have expressed their willingness to do their utmost in this cause. Their duties to their own churches performed, they stand ready to go to any point where they can advance our rational Christianity. It is not too much to say that I have at command in my department enough ministers to supply evening services without money and without price all the year round to a dozen different posts. The best preachers this country produces can be put one after the other into these centres of population I have been speaking about; and who then can say it may not be a comparatively easy thing to bring at once into existence eight or ten new churches in New England?

So far, in speaking about the possibilities of Connecticut, I have said nothing of the most important place of all in that State,—the city of New Haven. For years we have looked upon it as the one place in New England where we should have a Unitarian church. The services held two years ago afforded abundant evidence that Unitarians and liberal Christians are in sufficient strength to give a good start to any well-conducted movement. I have spoken chiefly of but one of the New England States.

There are cities and towns in the other States which call for Unitarian churches. Indeed, New England, as a whole, is still one of the best departments for building up churches. Here it can be done.

THE CENTRAL WEST.

BY REV. T. B. FORBUSH.

What is the opportunity for church extension in the Central West, and how shall we improve it?

The territory thus designated begins with Ohio, and reaches to Utah and Montana. It includes Manitoba at the north and Oklahoma at the south. It has more than twenty-five million inhabitants,—two-fifths of the population of our country. Scattered over this wide domain are some eighty-seven active churches, besides some twenty mission stations. Forty-six of these churches are self-supporting. Forty-one have received aid during the past year from the American Unitarian Association. There are also twenty-three organizations in a comatose state, waiting more favorable conditions or the coming of some prophet at whose word the dry bones shall live. Within the territory thus sparsely occupied there are thirty-seven cities of over twenty thousand inhabitants, ninety-five of more than ten thousand, two hundred and three of five thousand and over, in which there is no Unitarian church. Our word gets itself spoken in less than two-fifths of the larger cities of the Central West, while not one-sixth of smaller cities and large towns hear its glad tidings. Then there are the villages without number and the wide-stretching country-side. These unreached millions are, for the most part, thrifty, intelligent, more or less well educated, full of intellectual curiosity, eager for fresh thought, giving it hospitable reception. They are beginning to distrust traditions and authorities, and are dimly or clearly seeking after some larger truth concerning human life, if haply they may find it.

This questioning multitude of thoughtful men and women, scattered or in groups all over the Central West, earnestly looking for clearer light on the great problems of being, and rather in a state of spiritual adolescence, gives us our magnificent opportunity.

How shall we meet it worthily? That we have not heretofore been equal to it, that we are not equal to it now, is evident. We need more thorough method, and a more persistent and consecrated energy behind our method. One fact we must recognize. With our limited means, we cannot send men everywhere. We must often substitute the printed page for the living voice. This our excellent Post-office Mission workers are doing in praiseworthy fashion. They are sending out a steady stream of the living thoughts of our noblest thinkers all through the land. But this work should not be left in a few hands, however excellent. Every Unitarian should be an individual Post-office Mission, scattering winged words along highway and byway. Only thus can the great mass of the people be reached. There are those who think contemptuously of the tract. But it is a very subtle and pervasive power for the dissemination of truth. It goes where the foot of the preacher has never trod. Its white leaves fall silently as the snowflakes, moulding thought and influencing life, quietly sowing the seed whose harvest shall be the rational religion of the twentieth century.

But the printed page, valuable as it is, is not sufficient. Personal presence is the lever that moves the world. The Post-office Mission opens the door for the preacher, prepares the way before him, pilots him where eager minds and earnest hearts welcome his coming. The Central West waits the Unitarian missionary, who, in these hundreds of towns and cities, shall proclaim his message. There ought to be twenty ministers-at-large in this field instead of two. They would find abundant occupation, not only Sundays, but on week-days also, speaking to willing ears. And each one would soon make work for two others. The occasional gospel would create an appetite for regular gospel. The missionary would become an itinerant. Neighboring communities would group together, circuits of two, three, or four churches would be formed, and a settled ministry established. Out of these circuits self-supporting churches would eventually arise, having life in themselves, centres of life and light to the world. This propagation of the faith must not be left wholly to the missionary. Every local minister should take a hand in it. It should be his labor of love, his devout passion. No one who, having health and strength, is content to give one sermon on Sunday, or to preach only on Sunday, should take a pastorate in the Central West. The minister who there fills the measure of his opportunity must be evangelist as well as pastor. Every day must be Sabbath, every place a pulpit. If he is instant out of ecclesiastical season as well as in ecclesiastical season, he will find open doors at every hand. And, the more he cultivates it, the wider his field will grow. Experience steadily demonstrates: that, in any wise and successful missionary propaganda in the West, the men on the ground, the local ministers and the local conferences, must take the lead. Boston or Chicago may furnish money and advice; but church extension will really prosper only as it secures the interest, the care, the hearty co-operation, of the experienced workers already in the field. The future of organized Unitarianism in the West is largely in the hands of the men who compose the local conferences. Whatever strengthens those conferences, whatever inspires and aids them to do more and better work within their own boundaries, helps to make that future secure. Anything which weakens the sense of responsibility or lessens the enthusiasm of the local conference inflicts serious damage on our sacred cause.

The inquiring spirit which gives our opportunity is not one of criticism and denial, but rather one which is seeking larger thought and more solid foundations. It wants religion co-ordinated with modern knowledge. But it wants and will have religion. Science will not satisfy it. Literature will not satisfy it. Historic criticism will not satisfy it. Sociology will not satisfy it. It wants the church rather than the lecture-room. Science, criticism, literature, sociology, are all welcome; but religion is the chief concern,—rational religion, freed from disfiguring dogmas, yet gladly recognizing its historic root, and proclaiming love to God and love to man as its supreme ideal. Such religion is not only the need; but it is, I believe, the desire, the aspiration, of thoughtful men and women in the West. They welcome advanced ideas, but they hold fast to religion as the pearl of great price. They seek the field where it is to be found. If the necessity is laid upon them, they will sell all they have to possess it. There are hundreds of thousands, whose thought is substantially the same as ours, who shun the Unitarian Church because they believe it stands for cold negations, for criticism and denial, and has no deep, vital faith. They remain in evangelical churches because they can excuse errors of doctrine more readily than lack of a religious spirit. To win such, we must show that we stand, first of all, for religion. Only as we win them will our work have permanence. It is easy to attract attention by fighting old dogmas. It is easy to transiently draw a mixed crowd to hear some novel doctrine. The world is full of curious, restless, dissatisfied people ever seeking some new thing. But you cannot build churches of such material. Having no root, it speedily withers. Every popular breeze blows the dry stalks away. If the Unitarian Church is to prosper, it must win the sober, thoughtful, religious people. It must convince them, not only that its theories are correct, but that it stands for the largest faith, the grandest hope, the divinest religion the world has ever known.

With a wise method of propagandism and an earnest religious message, what more is needed save faith and consecration? We must have faith in our message as God's living truth, faith in its adaptability to the world's needs, faith in ourselves as divinely commissioned to preach this inspiring gospel. We are sometimes accused of self-glorification. Possibly, the charge has some color of truth. Possibly, the boasting may sometimes hide faint hearts. But we do not have, we cannot have, too strong faith in our gospel, or too profound a conviction of the greatness of our mission in this America. When we really believe that the one thing our country needs—needs more than scientific discovery, more than political reform, more than educational improvement—is rational religion; and, when we as really believe that our vision of this rational religion is a divine command to preach it,—we shall not need to plan church extension. It will come of itself, come faster than we can care for it.

Hand in hand with this faith must go consecration,—consecration of us ministers,—so that we shall seek not ourselves, our own comfort, emolument, or advancement, but shall be ready to put our hand to whatever work, however remote or difficult, that will most advance the kingdom of God; consecration of our young men and women, so that, when the call for service in any direction comes, the ready response shall be, "Here am I: send me!" consecration of you laymen and laywomen, so that these volunteers in our gospel crusade shall not go to war at their own charges, but shall know that you are standing by to comfort and sustain. Next to the feeling that God is on his side, nothing so cheers the isolated worker as the knowledge that he is not alone, but can unwaveringly rely upon the common fellowship for sympathy and support. Consecration is giving,—giving that which costs dearly for a sacred cause. Are we thus giving most precious things out of our lives for the faith that we cherish? To give is to live. God gives eternally. Only as we freely give—give ourselves and our substance—do we share that divine Life of beneficence which is above all treasure. We need a consecration which shall inspire the head, kindle the heart, and, going deeper still, shall touch the springs of power in the pocket, combining all into a great stream of helpfulness "whose waters shall o'erflow the world." Then, indeed, shall we begin, in the words of our constitution, "to do more and better work for the kingdom of God."

PROBLEMS IN THE WEST.

BY REV. A. M. GOULD.

The problems of church extension doubtless differ widely in different parts of our great country, and I shall speak only of those problems as they present themselves to us in the Central West.

The first and most serious problem we have to face there is the division in the ranks of the Unitarians themselves. When, a few years ago, I passed from the Congregationalist Church to the Unitarian, I found the men in the West divided into two hostile camps, disputing as to what Unitarianism really was. One side said it was "pure Christianity," while the other side maintained that it was pure character. But it seemed to me that these embattled theologians were something like the two knights who fought about the substance of a certain shield. These knights had come up to the shield, you remember, from opposite sides,—one from the east and one from the west; and one of them claimed that the shield was gold, while the other asserted that it was silver. I do not remember how the battle of the knights came out; but, when it was over, they both found that each was right. For the shield was gold on one side, and silver on the other.

So it seemed to me that there were two sides to the Unitarian shield in the West. To some it was "pure Christianity," and to others it was pure character. But I could not see any need of quarrelling over that difference; for, as I understood Unitarianism, there was not the slightest necessity that men should be agreed as to the substance of our religious shield. The other churches do indeed require that all who join them should see only one and the same side of their religious shield, and should describe it in the same words. But we stand for freedom in religion. We believe in letting each man call his religious shield gold or silver or brass, just as he sees it, with none to molest or make him afraid. Our shield has as many different sides as there are thinkers in our churches; and, when we talk of Unitarians in such an assembly as this, we are like the soldiers in Bayard Taylor's poem, singing "Annie Laurie" in the trenches the night before the battle,—

"Each heart recalled a different name,
While all sang 'Annie Laurie.'"

So each heart recalls a different religion, while all sing Unitarianism.

And I think that the men of the West and of the East are coming to see that, though they may differ, they need not be divided. But the old separation was still existing when I was chosen secretary of the Western Conference two years ago, and I soon became convinced that some form of union in the West was the first requisite of all successful church extension. Consequently, I suggested the plan of having the different State conferences of the Central West each choose one or more directors to serve on the Western Conference Board, and take the general direction of the missionary work. That suggestion was referred to a committee, of which Mr. Fenn was chairman, and was adopted with improvements at our last May meeting. And this idea of union and co-operation has since been approved by all of the State conferences which have met thus far this fall, and two of the three conferences have adopted the plan. If this plan or some similar one can be carried through, we shall have a united West, and can enter upon a united work, instead of being so largely crippled and helpless as we are by the present division. We can build up strong State conferences, like that in Iowa, where the churches have been more than doubled in the past five years; and we can develop a vigorous and life-giving centre at Chicago, which is absolutely necessary for every real and permanent religious life in the West.

This, then, is the first great problem of the West in church extension,—to achieve local union and co-operation; and we are in a fair way to solve it.

The second great problem is the money question. Of course, money is necessary, even for religious work; but, as far as my observation goes, the money so generously poured into the Central West by New England the last five years has done more harm than good. It has enfeebled and pauperized the societies that have received it. Perhaps it may be necessary to pension churches in other parts of the country, but it is not necessary to do so in the West. With the exception of a few strategic points, like university towns or State capitals, money is unnecessary, save to help the societies start. Any Western town of four or five thousand inhabitants, which has a church helpful to the community and a minister who is respected and loved, can easily support that church and minister, and will do it if it has to.

Within a week I have heard of a church, in a town of less than four thousand people, which had been helped regularly by the American Association. They expected the help this year, and had promised their minister all they thought they could raise and the few hundreds more from the East. But, when word came to the trustees that the Eastern money would not come, they immediately raised the sum among themselves without even letting their pastor know anything about it. And, within a month, I have heard of something precisely similar in another part of the West. The West has to pay for everything else it gets, and it has money enough to pay for any religion it really wants. What the liberal churches of the West need is not more money, but more religion. We need to have the religious spirit of the churches kindled by some well-planned missionary campaign. This would cost money, no doubt, but not nearly so much as the present system of subsidies costs; and, instead of leaving the churches weaker, it would help many to self-support.

The third problem and the last that I will mention is how to reach the young. Of course, if we do not have children and youth growing up into our liberal societies, those societies will be only transitory. They will speedily die of old age. And, in some cases, we already find the ministers burying their churches. Most of our societies try to have Sunday-schools for the smaller children; but nearly all of those Sunday-schools are weak in numbers and in courage, while only a few of the churches have any young people's religious societies at all. It seemed to me that the very first requisites of a healthy, growing church life was a large and interested Sunday-school. Consequently, I have put my hardest labor into this part of my work. I found that many of the Sunday-schools were actually teaching the little ones negations,—teaching them the stories of Genesis, and then telling them that those stories were not true, teaching them the plagues that befell the Egyptians, the passage of the Red Sea, the bread from heaven, and so on simply to criticise the stories or deny them. And, when I urged that such teaching was contrary to all laws of pedagogics, I was told that there were no other lessons than these published for the littlest ones. So we had to go to work and devise and print for the youngest pupils a series based on that conception of nature which President Hall set forth so clearly last evening. The child is close to nature, as the early savage was; and, just as the early man learned his earliest religion from nature, so the latest child can reach the child's religion best through the study of nature. Our first year is called "Mother Nature's Children," and takes up, first, "Cradling the Baby," showing how all life, from the human mother to the plant mother, cradles its little one. The next topic is "Tending the Baby," showing the careful nursing which Mother Nature provides for all her children from the human to the plant. The third topic is "Setting the Table," and so on, with one topic each month, and four leaflets in each topic. These leaflets are illustrated, because it is only through the eye that you can reach the youngest minds. And I may perhaps be allowed to say that, so highly are they appreciated in England, our Unitarian coworkers there have asked the privilege of reprinting them.

Besides this attempt to furnish to our schools material based on scientific principles, we have also tried to introduce some sort of local Sunday-school unions, though as yet without much success, the distance being so great that it has been difficult to bring the schools together.

For the growing boys and girls a Young People's Religious Union has been developed in Sioux City, and steps were taken at the conference in Iowa last week to organize Young People's Religious Unions throughout that whole State. I trust that this may be the beginning of better things in the religious life of our young people in the West.

These, then, are the three great fundamental problems of church extension in the Central West:—

1. To do away with the present division in our own ranks, and to develop a strong centre at Chicago, directly in touch with all the State conferences that centre about that great city, and so put new life and strength into those conferences.

2. To put the ideal of prompt self-support before all of our churches, and use our missionary money to kindle the religious spirit of the present churches and to start new self-supporting societies.

3. To improve and enlarge our Sunday-school, and create religious organizations for our young people.

If we can find the right solution for these problems, the future of the liberal movement in the West is secure; and there is no reason why there should not be five years from now two hundred churches, instead of one hundred, in that great natural centre of our country, and twenty-five years from now there ought to be twice as many societies there as there are in all New England. We have the only free and democratic religion of America; and, if we of this generation are equal to our opportunities, our children will find Chicago, and not Boston, to be the natural centre of our great and growing brotherhood of free churches. That great Mississippi Valley is to be the heart of the coming American nation, and the religion that is established there will find its way into the circulation and the life of the whole country.

THE SOUTHERN STATES.

BY REV. GEORGE LEONARD CHANEY, SUPER-INTENDENT FOR THE SOUTH.

We have had on our hands for thirty years a disunited Union. There are three things which may reunite it,—a common land, common interests, and a common religion. Nature has given us the first. Diversified industries will give us the second. Who or what will give us the third? Who, if not you? What, if not the Church which seeks for union in religion on the basis of its eternal principles?

We meet under happy auspices. At this very hour when I am addressing you the President of the United States is receiving in Atlanta the welcome of a loyal and hopeful South. The capital city of Georgia salutes in its foremost citizen the capital city of the republic. A free and independent State greets with trusty devotion a free and interdependent Union. I have heard within a few weeks, at the great Exposition in Atlanta, two thousand school children of that city singing "My Country, 'tis of thee," as they gathered around the old liberty bell of the first Revolution, and listened to eloquent addresses by leading men from North and South. This is one of the signs of the times,—signs of a deepened consciousness that we have one land and one country, a Union perfected at last in liberty, one and inseparable.

Again, on the very hills still scarred by the earthworks of war one may see palaces of art and factories of industry, in which are collected the evidences of that industrial development on new lines which is to tie the South anew to the Union by the bands of common interests. Visit the beautiful and significant building devoted to Georgia manufactures, and see how rapidly the ravelled sleeve of our national unity is reknitting in machinery that seems to think, and whose "thoughts are thoughts of peace." Once identify men's interests, and they will be one in act, though of two minds and divided hearts.

But add to these outward conditions of reunion the sweet influences of a common religion, and the Pleiades themselves are not more steadfast than such a constellated group of States would be. I invoke for the South whatever light and love the liberated Church may have to give. It is needed there, to complete the testimony of God, in which each church has its share. One-third of the land and one-third of the people of this country are in the Southern States. Only one thirty-third of the Unitarian churches are there. Already in a few years we have doubled our organized societies at the South, and extended the knowledge of our way in religion to many people who only knew its truths before, as secret longings and forbidden hopes which it was singular to believe and perilous to avow.

I do not carry our word to the South, or ask you to send it there, as if it were the all-in-all of religion. But I believe it is a needful part of the many-sided jewel of divine truth and life, and without its presence that jewel cannot give out all its lustre. I believe that, among the powers making for a better man and a better country at the South, the Church of the Two Commandments has its place. The historian of the future may discern what we cannot fully see; but, whether our church work is ever seen and known or not, it has worked hitherto for the reunion we all love and long for, and will work.

THE HOLY SPIRIT.

BY REV. HOWARD N. BROWN.

It is, perhaps, a sufficient definition for our present purpose if we say that the Holy Spirit is God made manifest in the mind and soul of man. Going back for our typical illustration to that day of Pentecost enshrined in Christian history and tradition, when the twelve were together in one place, and the room was suddenly filled as with the sound of a rushing, mighty wind, the essential feature of that narrative is the belief of the apostles that they then and there received a new measure of heavenly power from a source above their own life. They were like a piece of soft iron brought in contact with an electric current which straightway receives new properties and develops new activities. In Christian speech the Holy Spirit is, properly, the divine Life thus acting upon and transforming the life of humanity.

As to the basis of this belief in a Holy Spirit, the testimony of consciousness and experience in all times and among all peoples above the savage grade is hardly to be called in question. Everywhere in human life we find evidence which has led thoughtful people to conclude that man is capable of being visited and helped by a power outside himself. It is inherently probable that this should be the case. There must be in the universe about us an energy finer and higher than any whose undulatory movements we have thus far charted; and it would only be strange if our being were not sufficiently receptive and responsive toward that mysterious Presence to be sometimes moved and stimulated by it to a degree which yielded quite unusual results in thought and action.

But, though we accept and uphold the name "Spirit" which has come down to us as a fitting designation for what confessedly transcends the limits of our knowledge, we must admit that the circumstances of the time demand some explanation of the qualifying adjective. No one professes to know exactly what "Spirit" is. It is our word for an elusive Reality which we cannot wholly bring to the test of our ordinary standards of measurement. We do know, however, what we mean by holiness; and, when challenged to say why we speak of a Holy Spirit, we are bound to make reply.

It is to be observed, in the first place, that denial of our right to use this time-honored name almost always springs from confusion of two very different questions. This generation of men is, as a whole, supremely interested in the study of the outward universe; and it is only natural, perhaps, that this should become their chief oracle. But the question whether or not God is a holy being, as judged by what we know of the facts of outward nature, while perfectly legitimate, should not be confounded with the different question whether or not there is in us a "power not ourselves which makes for righteousness."

We might even grant that, so far as the testimony of the outward world can be gathered, it gives us no certain knowledge of a supreme Power which is holy; and this does not destroy or invalidate one fraction of the evidence which tells of an overruling Will that has given the law of righteousness to men. To decide against the presence of a Holy Spirit in the human mind, because not much trace of moral purpose is found in the process of evolution, is as if one should deny the presence of a magnetic current in soft iron because the characteristic signs of its activity cannot also be evoked from sticks and stones.

It is true that God cannot be a moral being in one place and an immoral or an unmoral being in another place. If there be a Holy Spirit made manifest in our life, there must be a Providence of good over all created things. But any difficulty we may meet in trying to establish the rule of goodness throughout nature is not to be used to discredit the evidence that God is in us working for righteousness.

One may reasonably predict that, when the investigations of natural science are carried to a more complete stage, this difficulty over which so many minds have stumbled in our time will, in large measure, vanish away. Nature is not so destitute of moral qualities as some have supposed. But, let that be as it may, the appeal to the outward world is, for the present, to the more uncertain tribunal. The facts there at our command are less sure, less immediate, and less complete than the facts to be gathered from our own history and experience. We may confess that we have need of much faith to believe in a divine Love which has created birds and beasts of prey; but we know very little on that subject, and there is at least a much closer approach to knowledge in our certainty of a Will and Wisdom above our own, working to establish in our life virtue and equity.

It must be plain to us all that recent doubts and questions as to the real existence of a Holy Spirit spring mostly from those interpretations of the life of the external universe which have made the picture black with stains of cruelty and injustice. Even if these interpretations should stand (as they probably will not), we have our refuge from them in a domain much more accessible to our thought, where we may walk with much more certain footing, and where the reverent and the wise have always found themselves face to face with an Eternal Goodness.

The very blackness of that picture of the struggle for physical existence which recent speculation has drawn does but emphasize the faith of religion that what is best in human life is derived from a different source. It is fundamentally impossible and unthinkable that a self-sacrificing love should be no more than the later modified form of an original savage hate; and no dream of the alchemists of the Middle Ages that there must be a way to transmute all substances into gold could be more fanciful than the notion of some people to-day that all the elements of our spiritual being are to be resolved back into the one physical impulse of self-preservation.

The more Godless the outward world is made to appear, the more we shall insist that man's spiritual development has come from no such ancestry, and is inexplicable without the Holy Spirit as its inspiration and guide. On the other hand, as men learn that nature is not Godless, and that evolution unfolds the story of a progressive incarnation of creative Life, or Spirit, so will religion stand ready to complete that lesson with its gospel of a holy Presence most clearly revealed by and most nearly akin to the good desires and aspirations of the human mind.

We speak of a Holy Spirit, believing that the law of holiness represents a Will higher than our own, and that more than our reason and determination is involved in the moral progress which humanity has made. We appeal to philosophy, affirming that no reasonable explanation of what has come to pass can be given, if we eliminate the Holy Spirit from our thought. We appeal to experience, being persuaded that the consciousness of all men testifies, more or less clearly, to the fact of help and guidance received from a living Power, which, however else it may be described, is at least superhuman in its origin and extent.

One great advantage which the doctrine of the Holy Spirit possesses at this present time is that it goes part way to meet the agnosticism of the age. It does not profess to know too much, but leaves many questions concerning which men are now hopelessly uncertain, or divided, entirely on one side. "Spirit" is as vague a term as the most cautious critic could desire, and all that the doctrine affirms of it is the quality of active goodness and beneficence.

How far this teaching by itself will suffice as a basis for religion is an inquiry to which we can here give only a passing glance. To enter upon its adequate discussion, we should be obliged to consider the fact of personality as one of the supreme facts in the life of man, and to ask what is before us while that is left without foundation in the groundwork of all being. Probably there can be no doubt that, so far as reason has an interest in religion, mere belief in impersonal Spirit must forever fail to satisfy its demands.

On the other hand, it has to be said that some working hypothesis in which men can confidently trust, even though it may go but very little way toward a satisfactory explanation of things, is, on the whole, of first importance. The doctrine of the Holy Spirit provides such a basis for effort and experiment toward right living. Without calling upon the untrained mind to subscribe to ideas which it cannot fathom or comprehend, it promises what is most needed; namely, a sure help for all honest endeavor after the good. Its very inadequacy from the theologian's point of view may constitute a practical gain. At all events, one may hazard the assertion that no small part of the most productive faith and piety of the present time is rooted in this idea of a Holy Spirit, and in not much conscious belief beside.

In a day when great numbers of thinking people are in rebellion against systems of theology which assume to know much more than they have adequate means for knowing, it is to be accounted some commendation of a belief that it asks these people only to assume the existence of a principle of goodness planted in the nature of things, and to order their lives on the supposition that, as they try to do good, the prevailing powers of the universe are on their side.

Beyond these negative considerations we shall find positive implications of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, even when stated in its lowest and simplest terms, which make it in itself a kind of gospel, full of significance and cheer. One of its corollaries is that we can safely trust the instincts and impulses of our higher nature,—especially and above all, the dictates of an unselfish love,—holding them to be the motives and guides given us by a protecting Presence, wiser and better than any skill of our own. And that trust, after all, is the bed-rock alike of religion and of ethics, to which the race again and again returns for safety and security after its sand-heaps of speculation have been washed away.

Such a consuming passion for knowledge as that which animates the human mind, one would think, must some time be crowned with success. Yet, up to this present time, it can only be said of systems of philosophy that they "have their day and cease to be." Every ardent quest comes at last to a veil that can neither be penetrated nor rent in twain. The discoverer may sail swift or slow: the end of his voyage is, all the same, a zone of mystery through which nothing can drive his adventurous prow; and then he who set out to find huge new continents of truth must perchance look about him to see where, amid the oceans of uncertainty, he can find some speck of island large enough and safe enough to call his home.

Complete and final intellectual satisfaction is not now attainable; and he who thinks he has reached the ultimate truth is merely too short-sighted to see, behind his definite conceptions, the long perspective of uncertainty. Yet our case is by no means desperate or even tragic, since it remains to us to accept the voice of conscience as the voice of God, to obey the promptings of the higher self, not, indeed, as if it were an authority that could not err, but as a directing agency controlled by great world forces, which is in the main constant to one far-off end, and whose deflections from the true pole we have the means to correct.

Such reliance upon the "inner light" made in our minds by the presence there of a Holy Spirit should naturally come to us in larger measure than to any who have lived before us. We begin with a trust in external nature which, however it first arose, has been fed and strengthened by a century of growing intimacy with Nature's ways, and of increasing wonder at the beauty and skill of her arrangements. In all that concerns insects and animals we have profound respect for the teachings of Nature, and we do not dream that our wisdom could provide them with more useful instincts than they have already learned in life's great school.

The step beyond this which men are sure to take connects their own ethical and spiritual being with the life of Nature, and carries forward to the intuitive or instinctive hopes and aims and desires of the mind all the confidence that is felt in the ability of life to protect and perpetuate itself on lower levels.

For example, our belief in an external reality is a leap of faith, and philosophy has been at endless pains to construct a bridge of logic over the chasm between the subjective and the objective worlds, which chasm every sane mind passes on the wings of an unquestioning trust. When asked what right he has to possess and use these wings of faith, the man of the future is likely to answer that God gave them. It matters not how they were given, by miracle or development: the fundamental postulate being that our spiritual life, like the framework of physical existence, is the workmanship of an indwelling Holy Spirit, we shall know that there is a gravitation of souls as well as of planets and suns, and that the groundwork of our mental being is supplied from a Source which, whatever its method, far surpasses our intelligence in its results.

Once more, it is a positive teaching springing from this doctrine that the future is full of hope for all those who strive to be fellow-laborers with the Spirit. We are familiar in these days with attempts to depict, even in minute detail, the more perfect society that may be before us; and these word-pictures excite so much popular interest that they must mean something in the life of our time. For one, I am inclined to regard them as signs of weakness rather than of strength. Socialism, as we know, is largely atheistic; and to be without God is still to be without an abiding hope in the world.

It is not the busy man of affairs, with the certainty of a good dinner before him at the end of his day's labor, who spends his time constructing the imaginary bill of fare of a supposititious feast. For him the knowledge that his dinner hour will bring some kind of ample repast is sufficient. It is the poor prisoner, or castaway, who, seeing no prospect of anything better than starvation diet, dreams out banquets of many courses, and gloats over the rich viands as one by one they are set before his fancy.

He who is at heart sure that the world is growing and is to grow better and better has little disposition to look beyond the reforms of the hour to a perfection which he cannot yet see. On the other hand, when men are noticeably haunted by waking visions of an earthly paradise upon which they feverishly linger, that is some evidence that hope of the future is becoming hard to support. It may even be said that belief in the immortal life of the soul is probably least vital where religion has wrought out its most elaborate pictures of the future state, and that confident expectation, such as Jesus manifested, makes little attempt to describe the glories of the hereafter.

Now there is but one secure basis for confidence in what is yet to come, and that basis the doctrine of the Holy Spirit essentially includes. Let people put on what appearance of bravado they please, they know well enough that they can do little or nothing if the stars in their courses fight against them. We must work with some native tendency of things, or we spend our labor in vain; and it is not truly admirable, but is really a kind of swindling, if we try to plant orange groves in arctic valleys simply because oranges are beautiful and good to our desires.

What the Holy Spirit would foster and build, that the future at last will surely see. Nothing else has the ghost of an opportunity to live and grow. He therefore who, in all he has to do, reverently and soberly reckons as with a Higher Will, which is directing the course of things toward good, and who, not mindful of himself, asks what that Will demands of him, as its servant and instrument, for the suppression of wrong and the furtherance of right,—this man has belief in the Holy Spirit; and that means the root of all spiritual religion. Let him add to that what he can; but let no man deny him a place in the kingdom, if that be all he has, while, obedient to the moving of the Spirit, he spends his life in service or in sacrifice.

INCARNATION.

BY REV. W. C. GANNETT.

The great affirmation of religion is that God and man are in essence one. All forms of anthropomorphism, all types of incarnation, are but varied expressions of this one affirmation. God and man are in essence one: in its low and far beginnings Religion said that, when it personified the powers of the sky and the storm and the sea, when it told their biographies in personal myths and legends, when it carved their faces with human features and gave them perhaps a hundred human hands, when it endowed them with all of the human vices and some of the human virtues. This we call anthropomorphism. Man could not do otherwise. He cannot do otherwise. He has to imagine, to image the invisible in terms of the visible, the unknown in terms of the known. He has to think of the Power without in terms of the Power within; that is, in terms of self-consciousness. Though we will to mask the process by refusing to christen the image in the mind, no less it is there,—the image; and the image is always a personal one, dimmed away perhaps into vagueness, shredded away perhaps into fragments; the human only approximated, it may be, as when Egypt, singling out some part or quality of the human for the god, divinized cats and rams and bulls. But always and everywhere man has had to think of, still has to think of—that is, to mentally image—the unknown Powers in terms of self-consciousness. Do we call them "impersonal"? Try as we may to disguise it, the impersonal is still the imp of the personal. One way or another, therefore, man always makes God in his own image. The Genesis verse, where God says, "Let us make man in our image," only states the same truth the other way round.

The belief in incarnation is but one form of this anthropomorphism. Given the God, and grant him the wish to make himself visible, he must choose between rock, tree, brute, and man, or these enlarged to their greatest. Let rock stand for the sky and the star and the mountain and sea. According to the chronicles of human religion, the Powers have chosen all these forms of self-manifestation. But, when they would manifest themselves at their fullest of being, inevitably they have climbed into manhood. They could not do otherwise, because, so far as we yet have explored either earth or the heavens or the hells, we find, or at least we are able to recognize, nothing above human semblances. The very archangels are our saints, with wings; and the very devils are our "bosses," with horns. If we knew anything higher than man, our gods would have taken that higher form. As it is, they have to content themselves with the human.

So here and there over the earth we find these theophanies,—the gods becoming man, as men have believed. Of all the lands whereon they have lit in flesh, the lands of the Hindu and the Greek have given, perhaps, the most gracious examples. "In Vishnu land, what avatar?" asks Browning, in his poem of "Waring, the Traveller." For in Vishnu land the god has not done arriving: he is still breaking forth in the flesh, as many a time before he has come,—now as the fish that saved the good Manu at the time of the deluge, and now as the tortoise that supported the world in the churning throes of creation, and now as the man-lion who routed the demon-king, and now and again in some favorite hero of legend, and most of all in the good Krishna, he of miraculous birth and the shepherd companions, he who, in the Bhagavad-Ghita, proclaims himself the Supreme, the Redeemer; in all his incarnations gentle, humane, self-sacrificing, and a god that bringeth salvation. So with the Buddhas, who from the mystic other-world emerge as men, whenever this world needs redemption. Four-and-twenty times had they come before our Buddha appeared; and already in Thibet the worshippers worship the unborn Buddhas elect who are yet to come in the flesh, named and known in advance from their future feats of salvation. The Orient loves incarnation, and has what it loves. Only forty-five years ago the Incarnate God was executed in Persia. His title there was the Bab, or "Gate,"—the young prophet whose lofty morality, whose charm of personal presence, whose power to inspire lowly followers to be heroes and martyrs of faith, whose fate after six years of teaching, whose idealization in legend after his death and before, are such correlates all to the story we love so well,—as Estlin Carpenter has just been reminding us. Only three years ago the Bab's successor died in Acre,—again the Incarnate God, as his followers call him.

But more familiar to us are the incarnations of Greece. "Imitate God," was the conscious aspiration and maxim of Plato; but "Let the gods imitate man" was the unconscious law by which the ancient myths of Plato's race had already constructed themselves. God's manlikeness was fundamental in the Greek mind. Coleridge's phrase, "the fair humanities of old religions," was right both in its noun and in its adjective for the Greek religion of old. Very human the maidens that glance in the forest and stream; very human allies haste from the skies to aid the heroes of Homer's tales of the battle; and the marble statues that glowed in the shrines of the temples and lined the Greek streets tell what the average Greek would hardly have been surprised to meet in the flesh,—had he not been brought up on the stories of incarnation? and here was the story in marble. That scene in Acts, of the hill-town in Asia Minor, where the two apostles were taken, the old man for Zeus, and the young man for Hermes, and barely escaped from the sacrifice offered them,—and then barely escaped being sacrificed,—is, doubtless, a glimpse of the mind of ten thousand towns of the time. And what shall we say to the apotheosis of the Roman emperors as another glimpse at the incarnation capacities of the time in which Christianity rose? It has been described as a "popular religion" of the provinces in the second century,—that deification of the man who as emperor embodied the power and the majesty of Rome, the god-man of Rome, with altars and temples and priest-hoods dedicated to him.

And now we must come to our own Christian religion, which, because it is a lofty religion, has emphasized as no other religion on earth has done the man-likeness of God. Even when we name God "Our Father," we humanize him. But it is only a small part of Christendom that, outside of the prayer of Jesus, prays to "Our Father" by name,—so small a part that, practically, we may say, The God of Christendom is a man.

How came it to be so? The half-familiar story can be told in three years or three moments. Shall we try to hint it once more in the moment way? It is a story of the meeting and blending of two great rivers of thought. One was the Jewish dream of a Christ, a Prophet-king, who would deliver the people from the oppressor, and lift them up to righteousness and glory, and establish the kingdom of heaven on earth. It was the old national dream, springing from the older and deathless faith that the Jews were God's "chosen people." The other stream of thought was Greek. All around Jewry lay the bright Greek world. That world, too, had its old religion; but in the time of Jesus the old faiths were dying and dropping from the mind, like brown leaves from the trees of November. In their place monotheistic philosophies were rising; and one idea among the Greek thinkers was that God created all things by his Logos, his Living Word. It is easy to think of a word as projected outside of the uttering mind, and having operant force of its own; easy from this to personify that word as living; easy, then, if it be God's Word, to conceive of it as a secondary God, acting as Creator, Inspirer, and Providence. We ought not to find the idea hard to understand, if we think we understand our Emerson's phrase, "The good laws are alive," or his line, "And conscious law is king of kings." This Logos idea for the Greek had its rise in old Platonic and Stoic sources; but Philo, the Greek-minded Jew of Alexandria, living when Jesus lived, gave it clearest expression and vogue. Now, when Paul bore Christianity out into the Greek world,—thereby saving it from being a tiny Jewish sect of which we might never have heard,—the "Christ" he preached was already in his mind a being far above a merely Jewish Christ. He was a new Adam, the Image of God, a universal Christ. And Greeks who heard of this Christ soon began to say, "This is no other than our Creative Word of God made flesh and come on the earth as man." So Jewish "Christ" and Greek "Word" began to blend into one being, and in that blending the God of Christendom was born! In that blending the God of Christendom was born. The Jew had furnished the human, the Greek had furnished the divine element; the Jew furnished the ethical, the Greek the functional element; the Jew furnished the historic and the temporal, the Greek furnished the transcendent and eternal element of the new god. Jew gave him body, Greek gave him soul. The figure is Jew, the transfiguration is Greek. Son of Man, Jew,—Son of God, Greek. Both parts were essential to the "incarnation." An august ancestry!

The Gospel of John, so called, the Greek Gospel of the four, and the latest written, is the biography of this new Jesus. It is one of the books of the world's unsparable scripture, but we seek in vain in it for a Sermon on the Mount or for parables of the kingdom of heaven. Its emphasis is not, as in them, on morals and life, but on the person of the Christ, the word and light of God, that "lighteth every man who cometh into the world," and that at last took flesh and dwelt among men, full of grace and glory. As years went by, the emphasis upon the person of the Christ grew greater. John's Gospel shows the thought as it was, perhaps, about the year 125. Justin Martyr, a generation later than that, expands the thought a little, dwelling more than John upon the spiritual and essential Christ, of whom every race partakes. Abraham and Socrates were Christians in virtue of the indwelling Christ, to whom they were obedient. The year 200 comes, and the word "trias"—a little later, in Tertullian's Latin, trinitas—is dropping into Christian theology, though as yet with a very embryonic meaning; and Clement is teaching that Christ is the immanent God enstructured in the constitution of the world, enstructured in the human soul, redemption being the progressive education of the human race by this indwelling teacher. The year 250, or thereabouts, brings Origen with his momentous and far-reaching phrase, "the eternal generation of the Son." It brings Sabellius, teaching that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are but three forms or aspects of the one. And it brings into Christian theology, but only to be repudiated at this time, the star-word homoousios. And the year 325 brings the Council of Nicæa, in which the doctrine of the Trinity flowers full-calyxed, and homoousios ("same-natured," "consubstantial") becomes the test of orthodoxy; and Christ is henceforth "very God of very God." And the Trinity was but a midway point in the mighty speculation! What is the nature of the Christ? How is he perfect man, yet perfect God? has he two natures, or but one? has he two wills, or only one? Over such problems the Greek Christian world thought and wrote and quarrelled for three centuries more. Council after council met to settle them, and met in vain.

And what is our comment on this birth-story of Christendom's God, so much more wondrous to thought than the shining Christmas stories that make the pearl-gate into the Gospels,—what is our comment to-day, after fifteen hundred years, and in the light of the evolution idea? The comment looks in two directions. One way is this: be the doctrine what we call true or what we call false, it is well for the world that Athanasius won the field of Nicæa. Well, for three reasons, at least:—

(1) His triumph made God real, the Infinite, Absolute, Unknown God,—no less being than that,—real,—real as a person, real as sandals on feet and tunic on body and look in the eyes and words from the lip could make him; real, too, as goodness; real, too, as love.

"The very God! think, Abib; dost thou think? So the All-Great were the All-Loving, too,—So through the thunder comes a human voice, Saying, 'O heart I made, a heart beats here! Face, my hands fashioned, see it in myself! Thou hast no power, nor mayst conceive of mine, But love I gave thee, with myself to love, And thou must love me who have died for thee!' The madman saith He said so: it is strange."

So writeth Browning's "Karshish": so say we with him, "strange"; and, fact or not, a blessed faith for that time's need. It was an immense equipment of faith for Europe to start on the stormy centuries that followed the break-up of the Roman Empire with a good God as solid as incarnation had made him.

(2) Athanasius's victory made the unity of God and man real. This was in truth the great point at issue, the unity of God and man, not the unity of God with Christ as an individual. Men often fight, as they build, better than they know. The Christ was very man of very man, as well as very God of very God. In him the whole race stood, when the signers signed at Nicæa their names below that word Homoousios, "Consubstantial," God and Son of God, one in their nature. It is really much more to say one with than like to. It takes one into the family: it is the difference between the kin and the guest. And that is a difference almost worth quarrelling over. Had Arius triumphed, man as represented in Christ would have stood outside of God's being, the guest of his welcome, not the child of his inmost nature. Again, we must own, it was a great equipment for faith to enter the stormy centuries of Europe's remaking, with this fact—God and man one—locked fast in its creed. Even if the casket were as seldom unlocked for inspection of contents as the shrine that held the bone of a saint, the bone, the sacred fact, was there, dimly believed in, some day to kindle with resurrection.

A third gain should be credited to the incarnation belief, though perhaps an Arian victory would have been as good as the Athanasian for this end: the belief in the incarnation of God in Christ has made it forever impossible that any character less good than that of Jesus should be accepted as symbol of Christendom's God. The Father must be as good as the Son, and we know he was good. The Father must be as good as the Son whom we know. The words are simple, the thought is deep and far-reaching; for to make God as good as his saints is to put the axe to the root of a good many dogmas.

This, then, is half of our comment. It is well for the world that Christendom's God was born as the God-man. The other half of our comment is this: that the whole story is a kindergarten story. The great central doctrine of Christendom, God incarnate in Christ, is but an object-lesson in the kindergarten of faith. It puts a vast truth in the concrete form in which minds can most readily take it. The vaster a fact, the truer a truth, the more we need the symbol, the type, the object-lesson, to represent it. If the symbol is not given us, we make one for ourselves,—we as individuals, we as the race. It is another psychological law, akin to the law with whose statement this paper began. You remember Tennyson's words, touching this very theme of ours in his musical way:—

"Where truth in closest words shall fail,
The truth embodied in a tale
Shall enter in at lowly doors.

"And so the word had breath, and wrought
With human hands the creed of creeds
In loveliness of perfect deeds,
More strong than all poetic thought.

"Which he may read that binds the sheaf
Or builds the house or digs the grave,
And those wild eyes that watch the wave
In roarings round the coral reef.

See, thou that countest reason ripe
In holding by the law within,
Thou fail not in a world of sin,
And ev'n for want of such a type."

Is this saying that the central dogma of Christendom is an error,—an age-long, world-wide mistake? Yes, if the object-lesson is taken as literal history and the whole of the fact, its rounded and final statement. So is any kindergarten story an error taken in that way. If not taken so, then no, not a mistake. The trouble is that of our theologies we like not to say "kindergarten," whereas theology is nothing but kindergarten statements. That, when we know it, is what makes it safe to have a theology. Till we do know it, it hardly is safe, though inevitable. And certainly too long, and too widely still, Christendom's kindergarten story has been taken to cover the whole of the fact of incarnation. Even where it is not so taken, the advent of the God-man as unique historic fact there in Palestine eighteen centuries since is the centre of faith as held by many of the wisest and best that we know,—by such men as Phillips Brooks, to name one for type. By no means does a man like Brooks hold that Christ was the whole of the incarnation. All the thoughtful orthodox theologians are saying to-day, I suppose, that the incarnation not only revealed God to man, but man to himself,—his oneness in nature with God. They are making return to the Gospel of Origen, Clement, Justin, and John,—that the same Word that took flesh in Jesus is the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. It is the old Stoic gospel of the immanent God, the pre-Christian gospel, which they are returning to with stress and delight. It is saying much the same thing to say that a new Christ is emerging in Orthodoxy, the human within the divine. It is Christ, the All-manly, Christ, the All-brotherly. "All-manly" means character: "All-brotherly" means daily service. And more than ever his true worship is felt to be imitation. "Be a Christ!" Everything is summed up in that," cries Mr. Stead; and many an orthodox heart amens. None the less, or rather all the more in virtue of this participation in incarnation by men, allowed by the new Orthodoxy, is it true, as we were reminded last night, that the orthodox theology is becoming more and more Christocentric. And this means that the Palestine incarnation is still held as centre of faith by those wisest and best just referred to. So what shall we do? We must choose. The incarnation as held by friends is either actual, localized, dated, historic fact, as they say, or else it is a kindergarten statement of a fact that transcends history,—an object-lesson which the mind of man made for itself at that wonderful era, and in which it has ever since faced, hardly knowing it, the dim outline of the greatest of all truths.

Now, just what the light of evolution gives us is the power, to some of us the necessity, of looking at old doctrines in this latter way. It is no longer a question of "error" versus "truth." Priestley, a hundred years ago, could treat of the dogmas that rose around the "Sermon on the Mount" and its preacher as the "corruptions" of Christianity. We cannot speak that way. The Nicene Creed rose as naturally—I would almost say, as grandly—in the mind of man as the Beatitudes rose in his heart. Jesus would have been amazed at it, to be sure; but bring him across the years, set him down in the Darwin century, train him a bit in its thought, then bid him look back to Alexandria and Nicæa and their incarnation-feat over his memory, and I think he would have recognized that feat's true nature,—parable work! He was a great kindergartner himself in his method; and I think he would know an object-lesson in history, when he saw one. In every case,—is that any too strong a statement?—in every case where an old orthodox doctrine differs from the later form of that doctrine, the earlier form is the concrete, dramatic "object-lesson," the "kindergarten" form, of the truth aimed at, while our later form is some larger statement of the same fact or law, of which the object-lesson now appears as parable or symbol; now appears,—of course it did not so appear then, when men first wrought it in a sad sincerity as the verity of God. It is thus with the Incarnation doctrine, thus with Vicarious Atonement, thus with Original Sin, thus with Election, thus with all the old dogmas of Christendom, formulated three hundred and fifteen hundred years ago. In each and every case the difference between the earlier and the later form is not so much the difference between error and truth as men have been wont to think. It is much more the difference between the concrete and the universal, the illustration and the law. No: the true name for Orthodoxy is not "Error" any more than it is "Right-thinking." It is no good omen for Unitarianism when Unitarians break into applause over bright slurs upon Orthodoxy. Is that all the acumen we have,—not to say, all the heart?

I hardly know whether orthodox friends, however, will like the word "kindergarten" better than "error." It sounds less hostile, but more patronizing; and patronage is harder to forgive than hostility. And yet I suspect that many of them, so expansive is their own thought to-day, will thank you for suggesting it. It covers the case, as they themselves recognize the case; that is, it is a word that leaves their old thought true, but their new thought truer,—this the large of which that was the small. And we all like to find we have grown, as long as we don't have to call our childhood an "error." So I recommend you to try the word "gently." I have tried it, and really thought it gave some orthodox friends relief. It is psychological and illuminating.

The crown of my paper ought to be an answer to the question, "What is the larger form of the incarnation thought, of which the Palestine incarnation is the concrete illustration?" I have short time to hint it. That object-lesson, be it said, has much work yet to do in the world. Nevertheless, it is beginning to fade by expansion into the larger truth. This larger truth, of course, is God incarnate in humanity. It is the old pre-Christian, Stoic truth, immensely intensified and deepened and ennobled by the eighteen centuries of Christendom's object-lesson. I spoke of the help that Orthodoxy is already giving in the new interpretation of the truth, and I cannot but think that its part is destined to be far larger than ours in the beautiful transfiguration; for we are a very small body, and will be, if true to our principles. They should still lead us onward, and give us our home, as before, among visions that must wait to be popular. But in simplest truth we may say that the larger incarnation is the central truth of Unitarianism, even as the smaller incarnation has been the central truth of the older Christianity; and that no one soul in modern time has been so eminent a prophet of this grander meaning as our own Channing. The distinctive faith of Unitarianism has never been its thought of God, although that gives us name: it has been our thought of man. It is our faith in the dignity of human nature. When this faith in the dignity of human nature comes full circle, it is faith in the intellectual and moral unity of God and man. It thus rounds again into a thought of God, and gives us back the incarnation doctrine in nobler form than ever,—God incarnate in humanity, not merely in the one man Jesus. This, I suppose, is what Dr. Hedge had in mind when he said that Unitarianism would better have been named "Humanitarianism." It certainly is the faith which Channing calls his "one sublime idea." "One sublime idea has taken hold of my mind: it is the greatness of the soul, its divinity, its union with God by spiritual likeness." "In ourselves are elements of the divinity." "All minds are of one family." One could quote passage after passage: it is Channing's constant emphasis. Emerson has it, of course, at the height of his ethical rapture. "If a man is at heart just, then in so far is he God: the safety of God, the immortality of God, the majesty of God, do enter into that man with justice."

God incarnate in man, in humanity! Break the thought into syllables. This very body of ours, its blood and its bone and its mystic nerve, the holy microcosm to his macrocosm; our mind thinking out his thoughts inbreathed, inspired in us,—he the Raphael behind Raphael, the Newton behind Newton, the Edison behind Edison; his justice, his right, organizing itself in the instincts of conscience, the whispers and thunders of ought; he becoming incarnate in Garrison, incarnate in Frances Willard and their armies of followers, incarnate in myriads of saints hung upon many a cross; his heart of love beating in mothers and fathers and children, making two one the wide world over of life, and out of the oneness again repeopling his worlds; and waking in hearts here and there "love for every unloved creature, lonely, poor, or small," and so setting new ideals, new incarnations of love, at work in the world. "In thy face have I seen the Eternal," said dying Bunsen, looking up in the face of his wife bending over him. He spoke for millions of living. "God could not be everywhere, so he made mothers," said the old Jewish proverb with splendid audacity, voicing the fact of his incarnation that way. In the "Bonnie Briar Bush" book you remember how the poor girl comes home from her wayward London life to her hard, proud, righteous, heart-broken father in the home in the Highlands, and how she afterwards says to Marget, the wise woman-friend who sent for her, hinting the broken heart,—"It iss a peety you hef not the Gaelic," Flora said: "it iss the best of all languages for loving. There are fifty words for darling, and my father will be calling me every one that night I came home." "Fifty words for darling," and God put them all into just his one Gaelic tongue, an almost dead language at that, and into just a single softened heart; "fifty words for darling," and the Father of all trying to utter them every one in his millions of parents.

All this is mystic, is pantheistic, I know. Well, let it be so: the doctrine of incarnation is always mystic, always verges on pantheism, whether that be a bad or a good thing; and this is the new-old doctrine of incarnation, God in humanity. I know, too, that there is the fact of evil in man, and the conundrum waiting in ambush, Is the good God incarnate in evil? I shall just pass it by for now, only turning in passing toward the evolution thought that has some light to throw on that problem. This new form of the doctrine calls incarnation continuous, progressive, ascendant, as well as universal. It recognizes grades of projection of the word into the visible flesh. It recognizes lower and higher. The brute and the cousins below him, the angel and the cousins above him, come into the scope of the plan. It takes all nature, all history, and all of humanity to reveal the whole of the God. One can insist, if he will, on a foolish question, "But who best embodies the God?" And the answer of course is, The best man,—if you know his name. But you do not, for you do not know all God has done and is doing in history; and, therefore, the question is foolish. But, answered or not, the great fact is,—incarnation universal, continuous, perpetual, progressive. The true church of the incarnation is the Church of All Souls.

This is human theology. To-day there is a conscious, deliberate, scientific exploration of human nature to find man; and the result of the exploration is also the discovery of God. Of this human theology the poets as yet are the best interpreters. It is good to rise above differing doctrines to poetry that solves them and makes them as one, to poetry that knows doctrines to be lower forms of itself. The old theology argued too often, or tried to, from God to man: this human theology argues from man to the God. We find it of old in Jesus, who argued in both ways. We can find it to-day in the prose of professors and preachers. But we find it perhaps at its clearest in simple verses like Whittier's or Blake's. Who can forget the sounding rhythms of Browning, his "Saul," and how the argument climbs at the end, proving God's love from the man's?

"Do I find love so full in my nature, God's ultimate gift,
That I doubt his own love can compete with it? Here the parts shift?
Here the creature surpass the Creator,—the end, what began? . . .
Would I suffer for him that I love? So wouldst thou,—so wilt thou!
So shall crown thee the topmost, ineffablest, uttermost crown;
And thy love fill infinitude wholly. . . .
'Tis the weakness in strength that I cry for! my flesh that I seek In the Godhead! I seek, and I find it. O Saul, it shall be A Face like my face that receives thee; a Man like to me
Thou shalt love and be loved by, forever: a Hand like this hand Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee! See the Christ stand!"

It is the boy-prophet's vision of the God who is Infinite Man, his chant of the incarnation potential. But we will close with lines that are simpler and larger still,—verses that once I found pinned at the end of Theodore Parker's last sermon,—the one in which he told, "What Religion may do for a Man." With these in his heart he left his people, and died. The verses were not printed with the sermon,—perhaps strength did not allow him to read them; but there they wait in the manuscript, attesting his thought, if he could not return, to have them his last words. They are by William Blake, "the mad poet," whose madness named them

THE DIVINE IMAGE.

To Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love
All pray in their distress,
And to these virtues of delight
Return their thankfulness.

For Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love
Is God our Father dear;
And Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love
Is man, his child and care.

For Mercy has a human heart;
Pity, a human face;
And Love, the human form divine;
And Peace, the human dress.

Then every man, of every clime,
That prays in his distress,
Prays to the human form divine,—
Love, Mercy, Pity, Peace.

And all must love the human form,
In heathen, Turk, or Jew.
Where Mercy, Love, and Pity dwell,
There God is dwelling, too.

ATONEMENT.

BY REV. W. HANSON PULSFORD.

Some one has said, and I think said wisely, that one hindrance to high living is the lack of clear ideas; and I do not know that there is any department of Christian thought in which the lack of clear ideas has been more conspicuous than in that which concerns itself with the atonement. The original doctrine is clear enough. Right or wrong, the originators of the great orthodoxies of Christendom were generally, to do them justice, extremely lucid. Since then the art of getting down on both sides of the fence simultaneously has been brought to such perfection, and so many have maintained that the new wine of truth (carefully diluted of course) can still be held safely by the old bottles of mediævalism, that people have become thoroughly confused. Even among ourselves there is here and there a lingering suggestion that somewhere in behind it all there is something in this doctrine of atonement that we are unable clearly and fully to grasp. As has been said to me more than once, when I have asked for a definite statement as to what the death of Jesus has actually done, "Well, I cannot tell you; but I know that there is something there." To this the obvious retort is, "Produce your something." A something which cannot be produced we cannot be expected to deal with.

It is, then, perhaps not out of place to try to make perfectly clear that we have entirely departed from the old theory of atonement. All forms of it go back, if you analyze them carefully, to that cruder theory which now the more thoughtful orthodox reject,—that man is, owing to the fall, a creature naturally evil; that he is at enmity with a just God; that God because he is just is bound to impose penalty; that the penalty was exacted in the death of Jesus; and that thus man, according to the compact, can go free if he believes in and accepts "the atoning efficacy of the propitiatory work of Jesus." You may say that that is now all obsolete, but it is not so obsolete after all. An anonymous friend, who is presumably interested in my salvation, has recently sent me a pamphlet for prayerful consideration, stating just what I have set forth as the only way to salvation. We have wholly outgrown this old doctrine and the thoughts on which it rests.

We are not accustomed to take things on any authority of facts; and the doctrine of atonement as commonly presented rests not on the authority of facts nor on the authority of reason, but on the supposed authority of Scripture. If you ask a man why he believes it, he says, "Because the Scripture says so"; and, if you demand his reasons, he cites proof texts. To us the idea that a thing not true in itself can be true, because it stands in the Bible, belongs to the past. The Bible is no longer to us a repertory for the theological brickbats of controversy. The statement "Paul has said so, and therefore you must accept it," is no longer valid for those who think of the Bible as an imperfect record of the long, slow way whereby men have been climbing out of the darkness of the earliest days toward that fuller light of God which gleams more brightly on our horizon than on theirs.

The beginning of humanity was not that of a perfect creature in a glorious Eden of innocence, that paradise of the idle man. His birth is a slow, upward struggle out of primitive darkness. There has been no age in the history of the world so dark as the earliest. When we see the savage hewing himself an idol out of a piece of wood and bowing down to worship it, we no longer regard him as having lapsed from the days when God and man walked together, but are stirred with wonder and delight that away down yonder, where there seems to be no God, there are in that savage heart promptings which lead him to hold out blind hands toward a something which he cannot see, feeling after God if haply he may find him.

The next point, that which concerns the justice of God, can only be fairly attributed to the wanderings of an imagination distorted by an overdose of scholasticism. You know the story whereby the writer of tracts seeks to make clear the propitiatory work of Jesus. A schoolmaster lets the bad boy go free of the punishment he has deserved, and at his own request visits the punishment on an innocent boy who offered to take it instead. I imagine that, if any schoolmaster under any school committee should show no better sense of justice, the result would be his instant dismissal. The received doctrine of atonement in its picture of the justice of God makes him unjust to Jesus. A God who could crucify Jesus is no God for me. It also makes God unjust to man because the only way whereby we are learning little by little to draw nearer to the higher life is by being brought to understand that there is steadfastness in the ways of God, that no sin ever goes without its consequence. The old doctrine is not just enough for the new thought.

Moreover, when God is described as being satisfied with this sort of jugglery, when he is presented as a God who needs to be appeased before his love can forgive, a God is set before us who may have been possible in the dark ages, but is not high enough for our reverent adoration. The God we love must be at least as good as his creatures. Imagine an earthly father whose boy has gone from home, and has fallen into evil ways. After many years the son comes home broken-hearted, and would have his father stand by him in the endeavor to build up out of the broken fragments of a wasted life something better and nobler. You cannot imagine that earthly father demanding that he shall be paid, propitiated, his justice satisfied, before he can reach out the father's hand to take the boy home, and give him a father's help toward a new and better life. God must be nobler than any earthly father if he is to be God for you and for me. We can accept no doctrine of an atonement which sets forth to us a God who must be propitiated before he can forgive.

As a matter of fact, we have no real right to the doctrine. I, for one, do not care to keep the old labels when we have changed the goods. I prefer to leave the old labels with the old articles, and, using a nomenclature which is Scriptural, to speak rather of reconciliation, "word over all beautiful as the sky," as one of our own poets has called it. Reconciliation is not a passport system for heaven in the hands of a few, but the interpretation of the whole process of the universe, whereby God, unfolding himself little by little in all human life, brings peace and harmony out of the jarring discords of earlier things. Life, because it is imperfect, is full of contradictions. When Mr. Stevenson, half in play and half in earnest, wrote the story of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," he was describing human character more truly than he perhaps thought. Only too often there seem to be two natures within us. Desire prompts us to pleasure, to make things easy for ourselves. Over against it, opposing and denying its behests, is the stern imperative of right and duty. In the same way the individual stands in opposition to society. We are impelled to make a place for self, to win wealth and power somehow, to make good our claim to the pleasant places of the world, whatever may be the lot of the surging crowd about us. Our self-interest is one thing, our compassion for the less fortunate is its denial. There seems too often to be no common ground where both can stand. In the world of thought, too, how continually what I might call the larger truth of religion presents itself as a denial of that which has gone before! The very fuller freedom and deeper life for which we stand seem to too many to be mere negations of and to threaten to destroy the religious life from which they have sprung. In short, on every side and in every department the conflicts of human interests and of human thought call for reconciliation. The old and the new, the lower and the higher, the truth of the past and the truth which is at hand, the individual and the social, are apparently in irreconcilable antagonism. The ideal is at war with the real. Man and God are in a state of alienation.

Reconciliation is the process whereby a larger thought and larger life solve the antagonism. When men, learning the lesson of the high inspiration of life, enter into their inheritance, they find that duty is but pleasure made wise and worthy of the human heart. They learn that the passion for their own delight can be fully satisfied only in so far as that delight is the joy of humanity. When you find your true self, you know that your interest and the interest of those about you are identical. When the enthusiasm of humanity fully reveals itself, it is found to be, after all, the same thing as personal blessedness in its highest form. The selfish man, when his selfishness is on the plane of the high living of Jesus, discovers that so to love one's self is to know the blessing of the unselfish life. Thus it is that the process toward more developed life and fuller thought which is the whole open secret of the universe is the process of reconciliation. God is no task master outside of us, and has no law in antagonism to our true life. In him there is no contradiction to that which is the highest we desire. God is our father, and we are God's children. God's life is in our life, and our life comes to its mightiest only as God is within. When the dream of the great Teacher is fulfilled, and the rule of God shall be over men's hearts, we shall know it only as the rule of the hidden nature which still slumbers within. Men shall then be brothers in a great home where love is the law of life and service blossoms into liberty. Then shall we know that the contradictions which are about and within us now are but the discords which prepare for the larger harmony of God which draws near as men grow into the stature of the Master, and learn to work together for the coming of that yet fuller reconciliation which is the day of the love of the Eternal.

FORGIVENESS.

BY REV. MARY A. SAFFORD.

"God's greatness flows around our incompleteness, Round our restlessness his rest."
—Mrs. E. B. Browning.

The poet sees the highest truth. We are indeed environed by God; and our lives unfold in strength and beauty as we come into right relations with this envining reality, through obedience to the moral law. But this spiritual growth is checked by our own feelings, thoughts, and actions. We are envious, unkind, unjust. We transgress the divine law. We wrong the divine love. Is there forgiveness for us? If we repent and pray for pardon, will God set aside the law that whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap, and utterly blot out the consequences of our wrong-doing? Once it was easy to believe that the moral law might thus be set aside, even as it was thought that the majestic order of nature could be changed by human petitions, that the rain might be brought from the clouds, the destructive whirlwind turned aside, the plague and the earthquake averted. But, gradually, there was developed that conception of the unvarying order of the universe which the discoveries of Copernicus and Kepler and Newton rooted so firmly in the human mind that to-day the intelligent, thoughtful person does not expect the steadfast laws of nature to be set aside in his behalf. He knows that frosts will whiten all the plain, when those conditions occur which cause its glittering crystals to be formed, although his corn may not be ripe. He knows that floods will follow melting snows and heavy rains, though life and property are swept away. He knows that the sun will not stay in its downward course, though at its setting he must die. Ay, more: he knows that moral laws are as immutable as those of nature, that whatsoever is sown must be reaped. He sees the repentant prodigal turning homeward, he hears the father's words of welcome, and marks his loving embrace of his long-lost child; but he also notes the fact that the law of consequences is not set aside, that the penalty of wrong-doing is not remitted.

The father forgives his repentant child, but years of dissipation have planted in the constitution of the prodigal the germs of physical disease and suffering. In unsteady nerves and weakened frame he must bear with him to the grave the effects of his evil deeds. In his licentiousness he has robbed an innocent soul of the white flower of its purity, and no forgiveness can destroy his bitter memory of the ruin he has wrought, can remove the terrible effects upon himself and others of his base act. Only by patient striving can he slowly outgrow the evil and win the good. But, if neither the inner nor the outer effects of his sins are removed by his father's forgiveness, in what does this forgiveness consist?

When you sin against your friend, and he forgives you, his act does not blot out the consequences of your wrong-doing: it only makes you feel that, despite your sin, he loves you still. As long as you doubt his love, as long as pride prevents you from seeking his pardon, there is a wall of separation between you and your friend; but, when you have confessed your sin and have been forgiven, this wall is broken down, and, conscious that his love is still your own, joy and peace succeed to doubt and vague unrest. This, I think, is the real nature of forgiveness, both human and divine.

The Father loves us while yet we wander far away. He loves us while he leaves us to bear the penalties of our transgressions. Even in the law of retribution this love is manifest, because in and through the action of this law God seeks to lead us home. But, while we continue sinning, we are not conscious of this divine love. Between it and our souls there is a wall of separation which we ourselves have builded by our own wrong-doing. But, when we sincerely repent of our transgressions and seek the better way, this wall of separation is broken down; and, made conscious that God's love enfolds us, we feel we are forgiven. As the sun does not cease its shining because we close our eyes to the light of day, so God does not cease to love us because we turn away from this love and wander in the paths of sin. But, as we must open our eyes if we would enjoy the sunlight, so we must repent of our wrong-doing, turn from evil unto righteousness, and open our souls to divine love, if we would be conscious of its healing power.

Sin builds the barrier between us and God that nothing save true repentance can remove. Law is not set aside.

"Our deeds still travel with us from afar,
And what we have been makes us what we are."

But, as those who have long attempted to swim against the current, and have been bruised and beaten back when once they change their course and take the opposite direction, are helped upon their way by the same waters that before buffeted and punished them, so we, when we cease to oppose God's laws and strive to act in harmony with them, are helped onward by the very same forces that before seemed ready to crush us. We bear with us the marks of past strife; but, while before it seemed as if the might of the universe were arrayed against us, we now feel that all its powers are leagued to bless us. There comes to us a consciousness of strength and peace and rest that words cannot express. We are reconciled to law, to God. We feel the touch of divine love; we know the joy of forgiveness. God has not changed, divine law has not been set aside; but we ourselves have changed our relations to this law.

God's love was in the law when we opposed it, even as now, when we strive to act in harmony with it; but the love that was then "a consuming flame" is now "like sunshine in the air,—

"And Love and Law are both the same, Named with the everlasting name."

Because divine law is as love-full as divine love is law-full, divine forgiveness for the most sinful soul is not only possible, but inevitable, when that soul truly repents and turns from evil unto righteousness. If God's love were not unchanging, the soul might fall short of divine forgiveness, even as it sometimes fails of human forgiveness; but, in the keeping of Eternal Love, the soul is safe, because love seeks ever the highest good of all. It waits but the opportunity to bless. It asks for no atoning sacrifice, but, like the sunlight, pours its wealth of good into every chamber of the soul that is open to receive it. This is the consoling, inspiring truth that makes it possible for us to bear the shame of sin, and yet press forward for the prize of our high calling.

"Discouraged in the work of life,
Disheartened by its load,
Shamed by its failures or its fears,
I sink beside the road;
But let me only think of thee,
And then new heart springs up in me.

"Embosomed deep in thy dear love,
Held in thy law, I stand;
Thy hand in all things I behold,
And all things in thy hand.
Thou ledest me by unsought ways,
And turn'st my mourning into praise."

Friends may forsake, human love may fail; but in the blackest night of the soul's sin and shame God's love abides. This is the life-giving truth that we must strive to make more and more a divine reality in human consciousness, if we would be true to the faith committed to our keeping, and lead many souls out of darkness into light. In our strong reaction from the popular view of forgiveness as the blotting out of the inevitable consequences of wrong-doing, in our eagerness to teach that character is salvation, we must not ignore the saving power of hope. Souls burdened by sin and shame need not to be pointed to the law of consequences; for of this law they are already despairingly aware in the bitter harvest they are reaping of their past evil deeds. What they need is something to inspire in them new hope, to make them feel that they may be what they might have been, and constrain them to earnest striving for the best. Despite what seems to us its irrational doctrines, the Salvation Army is strong to uplift and save the fallen, because it sings and preaches and incarnates forgiving, saving love, thus quickening hope and aspiration in souls indifferent, sullen, or despairing. And we also need to preach and sing forgiving love, need to preach and sing it as never yet it has been preached or sung,—love revealed not in Jesus only, but in every loving life; love not for the few alone, but for all; love that ever flows around our incompleteness, to bless and to save. This is the love we need to preach and sing, and more and more incarnate, that what Dinah Morris was to Hetty Sorrel, what Victor Hugo's good bishop was to the poor galley-slave, each one of us in some degree may be to souls that will have faith in God when they shall have more faith in man, when they shall find the divine in the human, and learn the meaning of unfailing love.

UNITARIANISM AND PHILANTHROPY.

BY REV. FRANCIS G. PEABODY, D.D.

Two years ago, at our Chicago meeting, I had the privilege of narrating in part the history of the early Unitarianism of New England, in its relation to philanthropy; and it has now seemed best to your Council that this story shall be told again, with such new aspects by it as have within two years come into view. And, certainly, it is a part of denominational history which with each year appears more significant. The growth of Unitarianism in New England seventy-five years ago is commonly—and rightly—described as a movement of theology. Certain men of that community found themselves burdened by the thought of God then dominating the Congregational churches, and emerged from it into a simpler and, as they believed, a purer statement of Christianity. That was certainly the essence of the early Unitarian position. It has often been criticised as an intellectual rather than a religious movement, and it certainly may be thus contrasted with an emotional movement like that of Wesley or an ecclesiastical movement like that of Newman. It was primarily an intellectual protest, a philosophical and theological transition. It stood for the simplicity that is in Christ, for the human leadership of Jesus, for the universality of the love of God, for the immediate presence of the Holy Spirit. Its theology was not traditional or ecclesiastical or even primarily exegetical. It was experiential, ethical, intuitional. I remember, in my first interview with the saintly Prof. Tholuck, how, in answer to my statement that I was a Unitarian, he exclaimed, "Ah! the Unitarians: they are mystics." So from the beginning they have been. Instead of an elaborate system of theology, carrying with it a scheme of salvation demonstrable to any logical mind and capable of defence against "Jews, Turks, and infidels," as the phrase used to run, the Unitarians found sufficiency in the briefest statement of the nature of God himself,—that infinite Wisdom and Love which Jesus had interpreted and to which human experience naturally responds. Such must always be the first claim of Unitarianism to a place in history,—its thought of God, its conception of the work and place of Jesus Christ, and its expression of an immediate relation between the spirit of the Father and each human soul.

There is, however, another aspect of this New England movement, of which the historians have taken scarcely any notice, but which is quite as exceptional and quite as significant. It is its contribution to philanthropy. That which was primarily a theological departure developed at once a new humanitarianism. The new thought of God carried with it a new care for man. The first generation of New England Unitarians were in an extraordinary and a hitherto unrecognized degree the originators of the modern spirit in American philanthropy. This proposition which I wish to maintain is not so surprising as may at first appear. It is not only natural that a new philanthropy should have begun at this point: it is inevitable. Whenever in the history of religion a new simplicity and reality have been discovered in the relation to God, there a new responsibility has been felt in relation to man. Out of the religious revival has flowed the ethical quickening. So it was, for instance, in the beginnings of Buddhism. The moving ideas of Buddhism were theological and metaphysical, but the first practical teaching of Buddhism was ethical and philanthropic. Still more was this true in the beginnings of Christianity. The message of Jesus primarily concerned religious truth. It was of God's kingdom and its eternal principles that he spoke with a new authority. And yet, in a degree which has only been appreciated within the last few years, Christianity made a transition which was almost a revolution in the spirit of charity, of humanity, of social reform. The classic world abounded, indeed, in prodigality to the poor; but it knew nothing of that intrinsic worth of a human soul which unites the poor with the rich under Christianity. To the early Christians the outcast, the prisoner, the infirm, were all essential parts of the one body in Christ. If one suffered, all suffered with him. The doctrine of the Fatherhood of God carried with it the deeds of the brotherhood of man. From the new faith sprang a new philanthropy. The "Caritas" of the Christians was a different quality from the "Liberalitas" of the Romans. Help for the helpless, hospitals for the sick, almsgiving as a part of worship, respect for woman, fraternity between employers and employed,—these qualities of social life became as distinctly Christian contributions to society, as were the faith in Jesus Christ and in his resurrection. Thus any religious teaching or transition may be fairly tested by its effect on philanthropy. The test is indirect: it is often unanticipated by the leaders of a theological movement; but it is as good a test to-day as it was when the apostle said, "As the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also." Let us offer the Unitarianism of New England to this test. I do not deal with persons or influences of our own time. I speak only of that first group of Unitarians of which Channing was the centre. Other results of that early movement have often been noticed. It has been frequently remarked—and it is undoubtedly the fact—that the great names of American literature are almost completely included in the circle of this influence. But how is it with the history of philanthropy in this country? How did the modern science of charity practically begin? Where were the defective classes, the insane, the blind, the feeble-minded, first cared for as a special charge? By whom among Americans were the elements of modern education, the kindergarten, the training of women, the modern university, first suggested? What is the early history of the now universal movement of temperance reform? Where, among Christian churches, was the national curse of slavery most keenly realized and most unsparingly met? These were the great philanthropic movements of this country during the last fifty years,—the movements of charity, of education, of temperance, and of liberty. What is the historical position of Unitarians in these movements of reform? It would be, of course, preposterous to make exclusive claims. In each of these great movements there have been leaders not of the Unitarian faith, and there have been Unitarian leaders not singularly devoted to these causes. But I suppose it to be open to demonstration that in the years from 1835 to 1850 the part taken by Unitarians in these affairs was altogether unique in its importance. Modern philanthropy in this country is, I suppose, practically to be dated from this epoch and from the influence of a small group of men and women moved by the ideas which were most associated with Channing. The historian of philanthropy in this country, who proposes to describe any one of the phases which I have named, will find himself inevitably forced to deal at the outset with one or another name within this narrow circle; and it is certainly a very curious fact that this relationship to modern philanthropy has never been systematically described even by Unitarians themselves. The outlines and statement of Unitarian history, even when officially put forth, have been almost wholly devoted to its controversy with Orthodoxy, or its relation to primitive Christianity, or its theological attitude and claim; and the humanitarian side of the Unitarian movement has been dealt with, even by the warmest apologist of Unitarianism, in little more than the most cursory way. The only adequate appreciation has proceeded from a manly and thorough scholar, not of the Unitarian communion, who has noticed the single and extraordinary utterances of Channing on these themes. It is certainly a remarkable proof of the rapidity with which the mind of the age has turned from theology to philanthropy that within a dozen years a formal series of lectures on the history of Unitarianism should be published by the denominational board, and that the contribution of Unitarianism to philanthropy should have been left quite unrecognized. Other religfous movements, I repeat, have other titles to a historic place. The New England Congregationalists of the elder branch will forever be distinguished through their magnificent vision of a converted heathen world. The Methodist movement stands for the extraordinary extension of the privilege of worship in the remotest hamlets and darkest places of the land. But the early Unitarian movement, insignificant as it was in many other aspects, had, beyond a doubt, a unique relation to the movements toward a better society which are the most marked characteristics of the present age. "Which sphere of useful action," said Dr. Channing in 1833, "is particularly commended to us Unitarians?" "It seems to me," he answers, "that we understand better than most Christians that it is the object of our religion to establish a fraternal union among all classes of society, to break down our present distinctions, and to direct all the energies of the cultivated and virtuous to the work of elevating the depressed classes to an enlightened piety, to intellectual and moral dignity." "To us, it seems to me, this great work peculiarly belongs. . . . We ought to be by eminence Christian philanthropists."

It is, of course, impossible in a half-hour to verify in detail this view of Unitarianism; and I do not care to present a mere catalogue, either of names or undertakings. The systematic historian of the subject will have a long and varied story to tell. He will review the beginnings of temperance reform in the hands of Unitarians, the organization of the Massachusetts Society for the Suppression of Intemperance in 1813, and the dramatic conflict of John Pierpont, minister of Hollis Street Church. He will describe the epoch made in American education by the work of Horace Mann, whose statue justly stands before the Massachusetts State House, side by side with that of Webster. He will add to this Unitarian contribution to education the beginnings of the kindergarten system on the one hand, and on the other the development of Harvard University under seven successive administrations of Unitarian Presidents, five of whom had been Unitarian ministers. He will recall the beginnings of the movement for international peace at the hands of the personal friend of Channing, Dr. Noah Worcester. He will record how the wars of England have been alleviated by the service of the Unitarian, Florence Nightingale, and how the War of the Rebellion in this country bore its fairest fruit in the beautiful ministry of the Sanitary Commission, directed by the Unitarian, Henry W. Bellows. He will enumerate the benefactions of Peter Cooper, of Ezra Cornell, and of Enoch Pratt. All these and many more incidents in the story of Unitarian philanthropy wait for the competent historian. Finally, he will deal with the crucial test of humanity in that generation, the anti-slavery cause; and he will conclude, as he looks back on that troubled time, that the Unitarian body, divided as it was in judgment as to the means of giving freedom to the slave, stood, after all, quite alone among the Christian churches in its absorbing interest and serious dealings with the question. On the one hand, a very large part of the strength of the anti-slavery agitators, with the exception of Mr. Garrison, was drawn from the Unitarian circle. May and Parker were Unitarian ministers. Sumner was a Unitarian layman. But the conservatives, no less completely than the radicals, recognized the issue, and met it with their consciences. Henry Ware, Jr., was able to say, as truthfully as Theodore Parker, "I am in principle an abolitionist." Strife was bitter among the brethren, and the moderates seemed to the radicals to be recreants to the cause. But it was not because the two parties were widely divided that they came to strife. It was because they were so near together. There was no conflict within the evangelical or ecclesiastical communions, for in no such communion was there any generally quickened sense of the crisis. The issue lay among the Unitarians, because the Unitarians, from the time when Channing uttered his great word on slavery, were awake to this test of their religion. In what other Christian communion could have happened that which is recorded of one Unitarian minister, John Gorham Palfrey, a Southerner, inheriting property in slaves, freeing them at the loss of his heritage, and, when applauded for the act in a Unitarian meeting, simply answering: "How could I have done otherwise? Am I not a Unitarian?" Such are some of the chapters of Unitarian history which will some day be dealt with as they deserve. For to-day, however, I limit myself to a single phase of philanthropy,—the undertakings which, in the common sense of the word, we call charitable, the institutions and methods for relief of the destitute and the defective classes. Limiting myself in this special sense to the work of charity, I simply inquire what made the years from 1830 to 1840 an epoch of philanthropic renaissance. And, first, it is beyond a doubt that the original source of this new humanitarianism lay in the extraordinary influence of William Ellery Channing. I suppose I am one of many to whom the work of Channing has been rather an object of reverence than of special study. Most persons of the present generation think of him, I imagine, as a religious seer whose views have at last become general property, and whose work now chiefly interests the historian of opinion. Quite another impression, however, must be made on any student who goes to him in these days for instruction in philanthropy. It soon appears that his doctrine of the dignity of man was no theological abstraction, but a direct and tremendous impulse to plans and hopes of social redemption. The fact is that Channing anticipates in a most extraordinary way the problems and needs of the present time. He perceives all the perils of the social order: he faces the now fearful problem of the great cities; he prophesies the demands of the laboring classes for a greater share of the rewards of industry. He recognizes the burden which American society has borne, first through slavery and then through drink. His addresses on "The Education of the Laboring Classes" and on "Temperance" are not only profound: they are as modern as if written to-day. In many of his utterances he would be now counted a radical reformer. "It seems to me," he says, in 1833, "that the signs of the time point to a great approaching modification of society, which will be founded on and will express the essential truth that the chief end of the social state is the elevation of all its members as intelligent and moral beings, and under which every man will be expected to contribute to this object according to his ability. The present selfish and dissocial system must give way to Christianity, and I earnestly wish that we may bear our full part in effecting this best of all revolutions." The journals, the letters, and the formal writings of Channing all abound in Business Notices.

A Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat requires immediate attention. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" will invariably give relief. 25c. a box.

Made on strictly scientific principles, the Miller Lamp is at once simple and safe. Its perfected Centredraft makes combustion complete, and there is no offensive smoke or smell.

The invention of Mr. Charles Trench in his lamp-burner, which gives the best results of lamp-light without heating the wick tube, has secured the indorsement of Mr. Atkinson in his work on the Science of Nutrition, as well as an underwriter, whose function it is to reduce danger by fire to the minimum. Mr. Trench has placed his lamp-burners with Jones, McDuffee & Stratton, of Boston, as his sole agents.

A Boon to Embroiderers.—It is hardly more than a year ago that a progressive concern hit upon an ingenious way of putting up its justly celebrated "ASIATIC DYE" Wash Silks in paper holders in such a manner that embroiderers are saved the trouble of unwinding the skein and rewinding it again on cardboard, as was customarily done with the old-fashioned skeins to prevent them from coiling and snarling. The Brainerd & Armstrong Silk Co., New London, Conn., which holds the exclusive right to put up its silk in this manner, has again demonstrated its originality by the recent publication of a "Doyley and Centrepiece Book," which has chapters on Embroidery Stitches, Centrepieces, Doyleys, Ideal Honiton, Luncheon and Tea Cloths, Cut Work, and Table Spreads in Denim. It contains over seventy engraved illustrations of patterns, and full information as to where they can be obtained, and the proper stitches and threads to be used in working each individual part. In a word, the book deals so comprehensively with the subject that every lady who embroiders cannot fail to find it useful.

To California with Raymond & Whitcomb.—Persons expecting to visit the Pacific Coast will be interested in Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb's announcement of their annual series of delightful winter tours to California. Every advantage that trains of superb palace vestibuled sleeping and dining cars can afford will be enjoyed by the members of these parties. The date of departure of the next party from Boston is Tuesday, November 19. There will be numerous opportunities of returning with personally conducted parties; and the tickets are also good, independently, any day on any train. An illustrated circular fully describing these tours will be furnished, free of cost, by Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston. A party will leave Boston for Mexico January 23.

Christmas Music.—An Unusually Fine Array published by the Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.—As usual, the Oliver Ditson Company's new music for Christmas services includes a large number of compositions which are all that the most exacting choir-leader or Sunday-school director could desire. Most of these publications are issued in the Ditson Octavo Editions, so well known for their excellence and cheapness. They include anthems, carols, hymns, services, solos, duets, children's songs, etc.; and some of our best American composers of sacred music are represented.

Among the pieces worthy of special note are the following:—

SONGS: "Hark, the Hosts of Heaven are telling," mezzo-soprano or baritone, W. H. Pontius, 50 cents. "One Quiet Night," published in two keys, for tenor and for alto or baritone, B. Van de Water, 50 cents.

ANTHEMS: "Hark, the Herald Angels sing," quartette or chorus and tenor solo, P. A. Schaecker, 12 cents. "Every Valley shall be exalted," quartette or chorus and tenor and bass solos, H. P. Danks, 10 cents. "Bright Angels! Ye Heralds," quartette or chorus, J. C. Macy, 12 cents. "It is the Blessed Christmas Morn," soprano solo, violin obligato, chorus and organ, J. C. Bartlett, 12 cents.

CAROLS AND HYMNS: "Christmas Bells again are ringing," unison carol, A. F. Loud, 8 cents. "Yule Log Carol," unison, J. W. Treadwell, 5 cents. Five Christmas hymns for children, by P. A. Schaecker, including "Rejoice, rejoice," "Hail! Glorious Morn," "Joy and Gladness," "Once in Royal David's City," "As with Gladness Men of Old." Each, 5 cents; complete, 12 cents.

Another interesting piece is an "Advent Service," for quartette or chorus and solo voices, by P. A. Schaecker, 50 cents.

The Ditson Company's complete catalogue of new and recent Christmas music, together with a selected list of Christmas cantatas, is sent free on request. Every choir-singer and every director of music in Sunday-schools should possess it. OLIVER DITSON COMPANY, 453-463 Washington Street, Boston.

It's easy for a woman to decide what's best by a home test. Sometimes when you intend having friends to dine, and for special reasons—such reasons often exist, you know—you wish every detail to be perfect, drop a postal giving your address to P. O. Box 1909, New York City. They will send you anywhere, everywhere, free of all cost, a trial quantity of Electro-Silicon, that means enough to clean all your silverware. Use it, it will tell a brighter story than we can express in words; and we promise that you will be well repaid for your outlay of one cent.

Electro-Silicon is unlike any other silver polish, and will do what no other silver polish will. Such brilliancy as it produces you cannot find outside of the silver-smith's shop, except where Electro-Silicon is used. Seeing is believing, and simply for the asking you can see it. Isn't it worth asking for?

Washington Excursions.—The Royal Blue Line announces another series of personally conducted seven day tours to Washington, D.C., the first party leaving Boston Wednesday, November 20. The rate of $23 covers every expense of the entire trip. An illustrated itinerary may be obtained by addressing A. J. Simmons, N. E. P. A., 211 Washington Street, Boston.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

In Charlestown, N. H., 1st inst., by Rev. T. D. Howard, Frank L. Adams and Fannie M. Fisk, both of Charlestown.

In Bolton, 25th ult., at the home of John H. Sawyer, the father of the bride, by Rev. W. J. Leonard, assisted by Rev. L. E. Scharf, Charles A. Powers, of Worcester, and Margaret L. Sawyer.

Training of Attendants for the Sick Room

will be resumed by the Massachusetts Emergency and Hygiene Association, with Miss DELIA KNIGHT as Instructor, November 5, Tuesday, 3 P. M., at 9 St. James Avenue, where applications can be made to her daily from 3 to 5 P. M., or apply to Secretary, Mrs. K. G. WELLS, 45 Commonwealth Avenue.

JAMES KAY APPLEBEE

is open to engagements for PREACHING or LECTURING. Address: ALLSTON, MASS.

Rooms To Let.

Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at 336 RUTLAND SQUARE.

Literary Lectures

—FOR—

UNITY CLUBS, WOMEN'S ALLIANCES, Etc.

By Rev. GEO. H. YOUNG

—ON—

Madame de Stael.	Jane Austen.
Elizabeth Frye.	Mary Lamb.
Louisa Alcott.	Charlotte Bronte.
George Eliot.	Jane Welsh Carlyle.
Dorothea Dix.	Margaret Fuller.
E. B. Browning.	Alice and Phoebe Cary.

For circulars and terms address

LAWRENCE, MASS.

Series of attractive lectures.—Lawrence American. Delightful lectures.—Lawrence Eagle.

Large and select audience gathered to enjoy the literary treat offered. Mr. Young is a very interesting speaker, and held the attention of his audience closely. All who listened to this lecture will be anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity offered for the remainder of the course.—Portsmouth Times.

utterances like this. If he had not been historically classified among the theologians, he would now be claimed by the historian of charity, of temperance, and even of social revolution as a prophet of the new time. His journals in 1834 testified to this direction of his interest. "Causes of poverty to be traced," he writes. "Is not the social order wrong?" "Let the poor be my end." And again, in more formal phrase, he writes, "Were I, on visiting a strange country, to see a vast majority of the people maimed, crippled, and bereft of sight, and were I told that social order required this mutilation, I should say, 'Perish this order!'" Such was the fruitful seed scattered over the field of philanthropy by this epoch-making man. No wonder that, in the small circle of thoughtful men and women of whom he was the centre, a renaissance of philanthropy began.

What, I now go on to ask, were the signs of this renaissance in the special field which we call that of charity? What was the relation of these early Unitarians to the helpless and dependent classes, to pauperism and its relief? And, first, let us answer this question in its most general terms. What are to-day the principles of scientific charity? They are, I take it, first, the abolition of out-of-door relief; second, the union of forces applied to charity,—the principle of registration; and, third, personal visitation,—the principle of the friendly visitor. These three principles make, I suppose, the chief articles in the creed of the new charity. Where were these principles first set forth by an American? I answer that forty years before they were generally applied they were thoroughly expounded by a Unitarian minister of Boston in a series of reports which anticipate almost the whole of our present science of charity. This remarkable man, Joseph Tuckerman, was a classmate and intimate friend of Channing; and, after twenty-five years of parish life, he turned to the work of a city missionary among the Boston poor, wisely giving it the title, not of a mission, but of a "ministry-at-large." Six years of this service undermined his health; and, after six more years of lingering invalidism, he died, in 1840. This very brief and inconspicuous undertaking, which was directed and sustained by the newly organized American Unitarian Association, must always remain the starting-point for any history of scientific charity in this country. Dr. Tuckerman's reports dwell on almost every aspect of charity work which has since grown important. He calls attention to the need of improved dwellings for the poor half a century before this modern enterprise was undertaken. He anticipates the congestion of life in our great cities, and calls for more attractive rural homes. He discerns the radical importance of the child-problem, and sets it by itself as a special form of charity. He sees that the secret of judicious charity is the continuous visitation of individuals by individuals. He expressly advises a bureau of registration for the common use of the overseers of the poor and the benevolent societies, and he estimates that such a measure would give to the voluntary societies thirty-three and one-half per cent. additional value for their funds. His most elaborate report, however, is devoted to the general subject of municipal relief; and in it he advocates, with a radicalism which is for his time simply amazing, the total repeal of the "poor-law system" of that period, tests of work for the able-bodied poor, houses of industry worthy of the name for the more incapable, and the reference of all temporary poverty to private relief. Thus his counsel is prophetic of the most radical judgment of the present time, and so far outruns his own age that even his editors in 1874 take pains to state that they only partly share his views as to outdoor relief. I remember a young divinity student who, on reading for the first time Lessing's "Education of the Human Race," remarked that the treatise seemed to him rather behind the age. He was, of course, in a certain sense right; and it was the best of compliments to find that a work which appeared to its own time almost revolutionary should appear to the new generation somewhat commonplace. Something of the same effect is made on the modern reader by the reports of Joseph Tuckerman. They are so wholly modern, so like the familiar talk of our Associated Charity experts to-day, that it is difficult to believe them written sixty-seven years ago. The prophecy of 1826 has become the wisdom of 1893. The times have at last caught up with this unique statement of principles, drawn from the experience of an early Unitarian minister among the Boston poor.

I turn to more specific forms of charitable work. The most obviously successful and the most rapidly extended form of modern charity is that which deals with children. There is a hope in child-saving which no other reformatory work permits, and the science of charities for children is among the best developments of modern philanthropy. Its first principle is anti-institutionalism. A child in a city institution is, speaking generally, injured at the very start of life. "Institution boys," says the last and one of the most sympathetic experts, Mr. Riis, "are generally the least desirable apprentices. They are saved from being toughs only to become automatons." Thus, as Dr. Tuckerman clearly laid down, the elevation of children becomes a specific form of charity. They must not be herded with adults or imprisoned in poorhouses or refuges. Work for them must be personal, domestic, natural. In the home, not in the institution, lies their hope. The second principle, therefore, in such charity is that of deportation. The children of the city must be removed from city life and placed in rural homes. This is not only good sociology, but wise economy. The New York Children's Aid Society has thus domesticated more than one hundred thousand children in the last twenty-five years, at a cost of about $25 each; while it costs about $120 a year to maintain a convicted person in a New York jail. How did such rationally directed charity for children in this country begin? It is very difficult in so extended an enterprise to fix a single point of departure; but this, at least, is certain,—that the Boston Children's Mission, founded in 1849, was the direct fruit of the ministry of Tuckerman, and antedates all other conspicuous undertakings of the same nature. The first president of the Children's Mission, John E. Williams, a Unitarian layman, moved later to New York, and became the first treasurer of the newly created Children's Aid Society of that city. Thus the work of the Children's Mission and the kindred service of the Warren Street Chapel, under the leadership of Charles Barnard, must be reckoned as the most immediate, if not the only American antecedent of the great modern works of child-saving charity.

I turn once more to a second specialized form of charity,—the most affecting, and the most laborious form,—the care of what are known as the defective classes, the blind, the feeble-minded, the insane. In this touching service of the helpless, two names stand quite by themselves in the history of American reforms. Both of these persons were intimate members of the group of Unitarians who had been inspired by Channing, and one of them was a member of Dr. Channing's family circle. Samuel Gridley Howe, the most picturesque figure in modern philanthropy, began the teaching of the blind in 1832. "In him," said his pastor, a man of the same type, James Freeman Clarke, "were united the qualities of Sir Lancelot and of the good Samaritan." For forty-three years Dr. Howe directed this miraculous form of education. The same gallantry which in 1822 burned to rescue the down-trodden Greeks now freed from a still darker slavery the soul of Laura Bridgman. "I would rather," said Horace Mann, in 1841, "have built up the blind asylum than have written Hamlet; and one day every one will think so." In 1848 Dr. Howe added to the task of giving eyes to the blind the still lowlier service of instructing the feeble-minded. It was a work then greeted with derision, and it has been treated with contempt by a governor of Massachusetts in our own day. "The only thing to do with an idiot," said that governor, in opposing the appropriation for the School for Feeble-minded Youth, "is to let him sit in the sun." None the less, this same school, begun by Dr. Howe, and still generously supported by the State, is, on the whole, the most beautiful, as well as the most pathetic, illustration of the Christian law of service which our own time affords. Certainly, if Jesus could come again into this modern world, looking for the triumphs of his spirit in the institutions of men, there are few places on earth where he would discover such un-mixed sacrifice for the weakest members of his one body, or so gladly say once more, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

The other name which makes a similar starting-point in a still more dramatic reform is not only the name of a Unitarian, but, as I have said, of a member of Channing's family. Dorothea Dix, as her biographer says, "has no peer in the annals of Protestantism. To find her parallel, it is necessary to go back to the lives of Saint Theresa of Spain or Santa Chiara of Assisi." At the beginning of the nineteenth century there were but four insane asylums in the United States, and but one of these was the property of a State. Before Miss Dix's death she had by her indefatigable devotion converted twenty States to a rational system; she had received testimonials of gratitude from the American Houses of Congress and from the British Parliament; she had touched the hearts of kings and of the reigning pope; and she lived long enough to see the lot of thousands of her unfortunate fellow-creatures changed from that of fettered animals to that of befriended invalids. Such, in a few words, was the influence of the small group we are considering in the development of charity. These three names—Tuckerman, Howe, and Dix—are, on the whole, the most important names in the departments which they represent; and they are as distinctively representatives of the epoch of Channing as is the literature of Bancroft, Palfrey, or Prescott, or the verse of Longfellow, Lowell, Bryant, or Holmes. Through the one channel, as through the other, flowed the new faith in human nature. The new philanthropy sprang with the new literature from the new belief in the essential dignity of man.

I can go no further within the limits of my time with even this hasty survey of one aspect of my theme, but I cannot part from it without indicating very briefly a few of its most obvious lessons. First, let us be taught by this fragment of history the extraordinary and permanent influence which may be exerted upon a nation like ours by a very small group of people, and even by a single person's word and work. It often seems in these complex days as if individual effort were quite in vain in the midst of the great popular tides and currents of the time; but, in reality, there never was a time when the individual or the small group had so much power for good or evil. Intimacy of communication in modern society, the interworking of its industrial and social life, multiply a thousand-fold the voice and service of the leaders. The great advances in our day in political action, in educational reform, in religious progress, as well as in schemes of philanthropy, are due to very limited groups of thoughtful persons, often so inconspicuous that the masses are quite unaware whence the influence comes by which they are so strongly led. Of such leadership, as yet only half recognized in its effect on modern thought and conduct, is this work of the Unitarians in 1840; and it gives courage and comfort to every intelligent effort for religious or social reform.

Secondly, this history points out with precision the peculiar mission of Unitarianism in the present age. It is an age peculiarly devoted to philanthropy. Never before was it so fully realized that the purpose of Christianity is a practical, regenerating, redemptive work. There is a great reaction from theological discussion and a great renewal of ethical activity. Our churches have taken up sociological studies and schemes. Our theological seminaries are accepting sociology as an essential part of a minister's training. In this humanitarian revival the Unitarians have a hereditary right to lead. They are the heirs of the doctrine of human capacity and of the scientific patience and devotion of Samuel Howe and Dorothea Dix. The times call for a new definition of the work of the Christian minister; and this new opportunity is most naturally offered to the descendants of Tuckerman and Channing.

Lastly, however, in the indications which Unitarian history offers there is one of warning. This emphasis on human pursuits, beautiful as it is, carries with it a distinct danger. The absorbing interest in philanthropy may involve a certain contempt for that which is not immediately practical. Theology begins to look like an outgrown science. The church may be regarded as an organization for social reform.

We are inclined to beat our spears of theological conflict into pruning-hooks of social redemption. Thus the age of works succeeds the ages of faith. Instead of the study of the Hebrew prophets, we have the study of the prophets of socialism. Instead of salvation by Christ, people begin to look for salvation by legislation and hygiene. So strong and so beneficent has grown this practical tendency that it seems almost antiquated to criticise it; and yet, if the history of philanthropic renaissance which we have traced has any lesson to teach, it is the lesson of a motive much deeper than philanthropy itself. Whence, I ask, then, did the new quickening of moral responsibility in early Unitarianism proceed? It proceeded primarily from a more rational thought of God and of his world. The inspiration came, let us remember, not from a worker, but from a preacher. Out of the larger thought flowed the wiser deeds. Back of the works of love lay the ideal truth. Beneath the manifold branches of activity were the roots of stable conviction with which the mind of Channing laid hold of the universal life. It must always be the same. A wise humanitarianism is always the fruit of a rational idealism, and without the root the fruits will quickly wither. This is the chief lesson for Christian churches to learn in their dealings with philanthropy. A time like this is not a time when the churches should turn from their ideal interests of worship, and devote themselves to practical affairs. It is, on the contrary, the very time when the interests of universal thoughts and aspirations should be most thoroughly maintained. The life with God, the sentiment of worship, the conception of humanity as organic and perfectible, the impulse of the ideal life, as manifested in Christ,—these are not extraneous interests, set apart from the practical problems and needs of the time: they are the lofty source from which the whole stream of modern philanthropy derives its freshness and its breadth. Let that source dry, and the stream will shrink. Lower this ideal, and the stream will lose its headway. Divert the churches from their spiritual aims, and the thirst of the time will not be satisfied. What this busy age most needs in its philanthropy is a constant renewal of spiritual courage; and this is a growth which descends from above upon hearts which wait on God. So the Christian Church and each humblest branch of it finds a place for its special service in this practical age. Never before was the water of life so freely and beneficently used for the good of the world. It is being turned into every corner of the social world, as men dig their canals and trenches in some thirsty land until it is transformed by the streams of water from a desert into a garden. And yet, the more this great and wholesome movement of social irrigation goes on, the more essential it becomes that in the high places of experience this same water of life shall be abundantly collected and securely stored. So the Christian Church, high up on the mountains of the ideal, fulfils its essential and preliminary work. The thirsty fields wait for the stream of service which descends from those heights of prayer; and the stream comes down to them, singing as it flows, "I am come that they might have life, and might have it more abundantly."

WOULD YOU HAVE THE HANDSOMEST

GLOVES?

THEN WEAR ONLY THE

GENUINE DUCHESS,

Which come in all the popular styles, dressed and undressed Kid, button and Foster lace, long and short wrists,

And cost no more than other makes.

CALL AND INSPECT, OR SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

All Gloves fitted when desired, and every pair warranted.

CHANDLER & CO.,

SOLE AGENTS,

WINTER ST., BOSTON.

Agency Dr. Jaeger Sanitary Woollen System.

MODERN APPLICATIONS OF LIBERAL RELIGIOUS PRINCIPLES TO SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

BY REV. ANNA GARLIN SPENCER.

Social problems are of two general classes,—those pertaining to charity and those pertaining to reform. "Charity" is our name for that social office by which the laggard, wayward, and weak members of society are helped or carried along in the march of life by the advanced, the virtuous, and the strong. "Reform" is our name for that social office by which, from time to time, the specific institutions of human relationship—that is, law, government, industry, the church, the school, and the home—are changed in obedience to a developing moral standard.

Charity is the gift from him who has to him who has not,—the effort to provide external uplift to all lacking in personal initiative. Reform is the effort to remove the social condition of progress which creates or increases the need for such external uplift. Charity is the attempt to render evil circumstances of human existence tolerable; to prevent, both in the individual and the social organism, the natural consequences of defective inheritance, training, and character. Reform is the attempt to remove evil circumstances by right adjustment of human relations, by liberating the weak from unjust social pressure, and by such general and external education as shall ultimately, it is hoped, prevent defective inheritance, training, and character. These two social offices blend and interact, of course; but all philanthropic movements can be classified more or less exactly under these heads. For example, several years ago one of our Southern cities was ravaged by fever. We saw then a beautiful exhibition of charity. Men and women who could have fled to safe places stayed with the plague-stricken, nursed the sick, buried the dead, comforted the mourning with a self-forgetting tenderness that turned the horror into a sacrament of human heroism. Afterward, however, when we counted the cost of the epidemic, not only to the original victims and their care-takers, but to the whole country in its varied social and economic interests, the spirit of reform determined that future fever plagues must be prevented; and the medical commissions and sanitary boards were set the task of discovering and removing the causes of disease. If we add to the first response of benevolence made so generously to the call of the afflicted, and to the general movement for sanitary reform, local movements to teach and enforce the hygienic laws announced by the experts, we shall have an example of the three stages of effort in all cases where charity seeks to ameliorate and reform to cure the evils of life. First, the help of brotherly love to the suffering one; next, the investigation that teaches why he suffers and how to prevent such suffering; then the preventive action enforced by law and applied by education.

The relation of religion in general to philanthropic work of all sorts is that of motive power and director of method. The love that prompts to social service is born at religion's altar of devotion. The channels through which it flows are shaped in large part by religion's philosophy of human destiny and duty. In the first influence, the Christian Church is one, from the first impulse given by the great heart of Jesus to the last and humblest response of consecration to others' service. In the second influence, the Christian Church has broken its commandments of method into fragments, as many in number as are its creeds. Our personal characters, as respects our scale of moral values and our balance of achieved excellences, are not more surely determined by our religious beliefs than are the direction, limits, and methods of our charitable and reformatory work. The distinctive quality of our liberal faith is its sensitive response to the modern philosophy of divine unity and human growth. That philosophy sees everywhere immutable law governing human betterment or degeneration, and hence leads us to look for natural causes for human ills (both in the individual and in the race), and to rely upon natural rather than supernatural, evolutionary rather than revolutionary, educative and flexible rather than spasmodic and arbitrary methods for the amelioration and cure of those ills. This has given to our own more than to any religious movement a profound impulse toward learning the laws of the divine purpose in human growth, in order that we may learn how to co-operate with them in all ways by which human love becomes a providence to human weakness. This impulse, translated in terms of practical philanthropy, tends toward a union of charity and reform in a co-ordinated social service of tenderness and wisdom never before seen or even imagined. The two principles of amelioration and cure for social ills and personal defects have been held to be antagonistic. To-day the world at large so esteems them. Still, in the rude birthplaces of infant reforms, which in their giant youth are to rock the world in throes of moral conflict, you will hear the name of charity hissed in scorn. Still, in ancient centres of loving help to individuals in need, you will find the spirit and special aims of social reform alike feared and shunned, and some of the noblest prophets of a newer and better institutional order among mankind misunderstood and opposed. Yet is it true that, in all highest places of ethical direction, mercy and truth are already met together, tenderest love and austere wisdom have kissed each other. The powers that make for relief and the powers that make for prevention of human misery are even now wedded fast beyond divorce. The most "dismal sciences" of economic order, the most mechanical measures of social reform, have already been flooded with a warm tide of most scrupulous consideration for the single life: the most lavish charity has begun to fibre itself upon social science, and learned to add moral discipline to its list of precious gifts. The exact point of jointure where these two elements meet for a higher social regeneration is the precise field of effort for that philanthropy which is stimulated and directed by a rational and spiritual religion.

The problem of problems in charity is how to make the abnormal and incompetent classes comfortable, and yet neither retard nature's training of the individual life by hard but indispensable experience into the virtues of an independent, moral creature, nor induce race degeneration. The problem of problems in reform is how to generate and concentrate sufficient moral power to effect, in fit time and place, each needed institutional change in law, government, industry, the church, the school, and the home, and yet not disturb moral balance nor lessen the stock of general moral devotion needed for regular and personal character-building. The first problem is well understood by workers of the liberal faith in religion; and they have helped more than those of any other church affiliation in solving it, as you have just heard in the splendid showing by Mr. Peabody.

The second problem has not been so well mastered by Unitarian thought and effort. Their religious optimism and their social fastidiousness, the breadth of their philosophy and the calm balance of their ethical ideals, have united to make Unitarians as a body shy of mixing in the moral strifes of the world. They have seen so clearly that personal character is the aim and test of all social movements that they have not been so quick to see also, that, until the average life is freed from oppressive and unjust conditions, it cannot respond to the noblest appeals and influences of the church and the school; and that such liberation of the personal life from bondage has always been accomplished by separate steps, on hotly contested fields of moral conflict. They have believed so devoutly in the Eternal that makes for righteousness, they have felt so safe for themselves and for others in this universe, that they have not always seen God on that field where he is most invisible, yet most sublimely present,—the field "where ancient good" made by "Time uncouth" is warred against by some manager-cradled champion of a new revelation of truth and justice. They have sympathized too much with Emerson in his occasional mood of the witty philosopher, viewing life merely as a spectacle, who sees a "faint touch of the burlesque always lingering about the reformer." They have not sympathized enough with Emerson in his more constant mood of the moral teacher, when he declares that, "seen in their natural connection, all attempts of the people for the better are sublime," and "that our part is plainly not to block improvement or to sit till we are stone, but to conspire with the new works of new days."

It is true, however, that the partial solving of the deepest problem of charity has already led the most philosophic of observers toward a better appreciation of the deepest problem of reform. The application of the laws of social science in the administration of charity shows to a candid mind the need of mending customs, laws, and most external conditions surrounding the single life, if all single lives are to be made whole.

Let us consider together some of the ways in which thoughtful help of individuals and earnest study of the causes of their need have already led us into the arena of special reforms. It is estimated that our charities in America cost us annually about one hundred millions in dollars, besides the enormous and unreckoned wealth of private, volunteer service by uncounted workers. By diminishing the death-rate, charity has by the same ratio increased the proportion of human defectives whom charity must care for; and, by demanding a more and more tender and generous treatment for all in need, it has still further increased the load which the normal and competent must carry. We care for the aged poor, for dependent children, for paupers, the insane, idiotic, and feeble-minded, the epileptic and blind and deaf-mute, the partially defective in mind, body, and moral nature, together with those temporarily disabled physically or by unemployment for self-support. We care for all these by means of this vast and varied social office we name "charity." The burden of it does not rest alone or chiefly upon the rich: the middle class feel it most, and the struggling poor, only slightly above the need of material aid themselves, stagger under its weight. Thus the increase of charity is marked, both in extent relative to size of the community (by saving alive so many who would die under harder conditions) and in quantity and quality of aid to each needy individual. And this increase threatened at one time, along with other social tendencies, to topple society over by its weight. The element of reform has already entered into charity, and demands more and more imperiously, as an aim, the cure of chronic pauperism and the vast lessening of severe poverty. In studying how to carry out that aim, we have come upon most significant proof of the interrelation of scientific charity and institutional reform. C. D. Kellogg, an authority in charity organization (that is to say, an authority on the application of the principles of social science to relief-giving), tells us that two-thirds of the destitution now relieved by material aid "could be wiped out by a more perfect adjustment of the supply and demand for labor, and by a more vigorous and enlightened police administration." We see more fully the force of this estimate of Mr. Kellogg's when we study more carefully the "causes of poverty" as tabulated in the carefully kept records of charity organization societies. That "enforced idleness" which is due to industrial changes and financial crises leads to very marked decrease of mental and moral power in the wage-earner, and thus tends toward chronic poverty. Hence charity necessarily given to the "unemployed" and their families takes us at once into the field of economic reform. Again, "sickness" is reckoned on all tables of relief-giving agencies as a steady and large producing cause of poverty, about one-fourth of all applications for aid, and a much larger proportion of first applications, arising from that condition. And Dr. Dugdale declares not only that "pauperism in general is an indication of physical weakness of some kind," but also that "hereditary pauperism rests chiefly upon disease." Now we know that disease is engendered by insanitary conditions of houses and streets, by poisoned water, poor drainage, tenement-crowding, and by all bad external conditions of the home, as truly as by insufficient and poorly cooked food, impure air, ignorance, or carelessness within the home. Hence reform in the administration of charity is seen to require not only vastly multiplied agencies for the instruction of the stupid in better ways of living, but also strict government inspection and legal control of all the public conditions which make for health or disease in the community; and this carries us into the field of municipal reform. Moreover, "accidents" affecting the wage-earners of families, and resulting in either death or crippled conditions, form a large part of the physical disability of the very poor. And, when we learn that the railroads of the United States alone kill in one year 2,554 bread-winners, and injure, more or less seriously, 28,268; and that many mines and manufactories have bloody records of similar extent; and that the conditions of many trades are so unhealthful that the workman has an average of from ten to fifteen years only in which to keep his physical power to labor,—when we learn all this, and more than can be here recounted, we see the deep connection between charity and labor reform. For, be it remembered, many of the worst conditions which beget disease and invite accident in labor can be prevented by means already known. It needs only vigorous and legally applied public sentiment to reduce such evils to their minimum. The employment of children, also, and of the mothers of young children, has marked effect in producing personal and social degeneration. Besides this, the employment of children is the most serious of economic disturbances, because decreasing the wage of adult workers through illegitimate competition. All this ties the giving of temporary relief to one family brought to distress, through the causes named, to those great world-movements of social reform that are now profoundly stirring modern thought.

Look, also, at the more distinctly moral elements of social problems, as scientific charity reveals them. Idiocy, feeble-mindedness, and abnormal moral condition in the individual are now easily traced to vicious life in the ancestry. Intemperance and sexual vice are the great producing causes of mental and moral incompetency; and that incompetency, in turn, is the most potent cause of crime. And thus the special moral reforms of temperance and social purity, as truly as the economic reforms, are found linked to charitable effort. To prevent spreading this degeneracy of mind and will, we are learning to apply to the criminal manifesting acute moral disorder graded systems of "indeterminate sentence," extended legal control, and strict tutelage toward ends of personal reformation. More than this, we are learning to establish permanent isolation and wise custodial care for the more chronic cases of human failure,—mental and moral types which, if left to freely reproduce after their kind, will overburden society and seriously retard the progress of the race. Still more than this: many are learning that far-reaching, radical, and specialized movements toward the prevention of the two vices most productive of this degeneracy of mind and will are absolutely necessary to social welfare.

The problems specially involved in the care of dependent and wayward children turn attention toward another distinct moral reform. One-fourth of all dependent children—those who, thrust out of their natural homes, must be fathered and mothered by society at large—are such because of the parents' fault,—fault so flagrant as to be easily traced. And wayward children, when sentenced to reform schools under the age of twelve years, are very many of them the victims solely of the same parental incompetency. This fact leads to the dismal and puzzling maze of domestic wrongs,

The Fashionable Cloak House

Springer * Brothers,

500 WASHINGTON ST.

Stylish Garments. Elegant Furs.

The Place above all others to purchase Cloaks and Furs.

the frequent desertion of wife and young children by the husband and father, the frequent divorces and more frequent temporary separation of parents which throw the children out upon the world. These evils and the blacker problems revealed by the inner history of prostitution among young girls, take us into the very heart of the world-movement toward equality of rights and opportunities for both sexes. This movement, working industrially, has already (in large areas of civilized life) procured for women the power and self-protection of self-support as recognized wage-earners; working educationally in the same area, has opened to women the wealth of mankind's storehouse of knowledge; working legally, has increasingly changed the position of woman from that of dependent and ward to that of a responsible individual, mistress of her own person and estate; working politically, is on its way to round the circle of equality by giving women that governmental franchise which is the symbol of independent social responsibility.

The heart of this movement (alas! so little understood even now by some of the leaders in our liberal faith) is the freeing of the mothers of the race from conditions which destroy the home and thus blight the life of childhood. Conditions of cruelty, neglect, and outrage upon personal dignity through enforced bondage to unholy passions. These conditions arise from false ideals of womanliness, which, by inducing woman's subordination and dependence, inevitably tend to vulgarize marriage into a commercial bargain, and thus make short and easy the step to illegal sex relations. The pit of woman's supremest degradation is dug by white hands of those who, themselves escaping the worst effect of these false ideals, yet support their decaying strength, and crucify the prophecy of a higher domestic order, "not knowing what they do." It is the pit of woman's degradation from which emanate the worst evils that helpless childhood suffers, and that society vainly seeks to cure. And the deeper depth of every problem in charity centres in neglected childhood. The wisest and most foolish social care for dependent children, the best or worst governed reformatory for wayward youth, are therefore (together with the effectual treatment of divorce and prostitution) vitally and indissolubly linked with that greatest institutional reform of the century just closing,—the liberation from bondage of the moral and intellectual initiative of women.

Two institutional reforms will make the next century memorable for mighty moral battlefields. One is peculiarly the work of Americans for America. It is the reform in the political administration of social interests. The other is a world struggle, in which our land will bear but a part,—the struggle to translate democracy in terms of the industrial order. For the first, the leading forces of our liberal faith are prepared and already in command. It is now proved that generals and captains nourished at the altars of Unitarian churches will in America lead to victory the hosts of municipal reform and purification of governmental order. This is a social service peculiarly fitted to the historic genius of Unitarian faith, because it is an application of individual wisdom and conscience to the realization in social order of advanced but fully accepted moral standards. For the greater movement of industrial reform I believe men and women of the rational and liberal faith will also prove peculiarly fitted, not so much by their historic genius as by their own newer missionary impulses to more unselfish consecration. Of the methods and ultimate detail of that greatest reform movement of the coming century we cannot yet know. The industrial order which is to be reformed is still so newly formed that the highest expert guidance is yet confused and confusing. Hence the minister of religion must be cautious and humble to the last degree in attempts to affix the sanction of duty to any proposed economic reform. But one thing the ministry of the liberal faith can do now, and that it ought: it can unite with the ministry of other households of faith, and step out into the very midst of the market-place, where selfish scramblers push the weak and ignorant into the mire, and where childhood's birthright of education and happiness is bartered for gain; and there it can plant its standard of human brotherhood, and write upon it for all to read,

"And a man shall be more precious than gold,—yea, than much fine gold."

All of these reforms enumerated have their weakness of direction and method, as well as their strength of interior purpose. The modern specialization of function gives a new force to the old one-sidedness of the special reformer. His one-sidedness is proved by history to have sublime use in the economy of human growth. Did he not shout his one note of social duty too loudly, the world would never get the pitch for its new marching-songs of moral progress. What the special reformer needs for his own deeper wisdom, what the world needs as balancing corrective for his extravagant demand, is not coldly critical condemnation of his narrowness by those who feel no stir of response to his appeal. That but isolates him the more, and makes the conflict he inaugurates the sharper and more exclusive. What he needs and what society needs in order to get the most and best out of his partial but essential service is that a great chorus of sympathetic but independent and well-rounded workers for righteousness shall take up his single note of appeal, and deepen its shrill call to harmonious setting in the great oratorio of humanity's ethical passion. Who is the natural leader and director of that chorus of sympathetic yet balancing response to the special reformer? The minister of the liberal and rational and spiritual religion we celebrate to-day, and dare to call our own. He is pledged to a philosophy of life and growth which gives that nice sense of proportion in moral values which can alone secure the true synthesis of social reform. He is pledged to a full understanding of religion's law,—the law that the kingdom of heaven is within; the law that from better men and women alone grow better economics and states. Therefore, he can best apply the ultimate test to every so-called remedy for social ills.

What then? Shall the church become an ethical workshop merely, and the minister of religion only its chiefest supervisor? Ah, no! Then were there no atmosphere wherein to set in true interrelation the wheels of the reformer's machinery and the fine handiwork of the wise dispenser of personal help. Nay, more: although the Church, if she is to live as an institution, must from now on be prompt to undertake any personal or social service, from free baths to free concerts, which the world needs and no other social force supplies,—be prompt to do it, as proving her human sympathy,—yet is she under bonds to take her hands from every such form of external service so soon as it has grown strong, specialized, and mature enough to become a civic interest, lest the much doing of things clip the wings of her upsoaring ideal. Truly says the great Mazzini, defining the order of moral progression: "Every epoch of human history reveals one fragment of the ideal. A philosophy prepares the way for the discovery, a religion then sanctifies the new idea by making it a duty, a social science then translates it slowly into facts, and, last of all, an art symbolizes it."

To build here and now the kingdom of God is the aim of lovers and workers of the true church life. Just there is our place in the world's service of practical righteousness, just there at the point where the new discovered truths of the few sages are pressing for entrance into the common thought and life so sorely needing them, just there where the high sanctions of religion are needed to make the new wine of the prophet's vision the cup of daily communion for all humanity. For this service the church must keep at flood-tide its faith in the present perfection of God. For this it must make men glad and strong by conscious communion with that Perfection, while it helps mankind's feeblest and poorest effort toward the better humanity. For this it must keep unclouded its trust in the final outcome of all earth's struggle, while sensitively responsive to every effort to lessen every ill which shadows human existence. At our altar of the Ideal, built

"Lofty as is the love of God,
And ample as the wants of man," no most audacious hope for better life in the single soul is to-day a stranger. To it no struggling leader of any force of social service should be unwelcome. As the mediæval knight received at the hands of the church his accolade of youthful consecration, and to it returned, when scarred with battle and aged by daring feats, to lay his gifts at her feet, so now! The church of the broadest truth, of the deepest rooted righteousness, of the most daring and tender upreach toward the Divine,—this church (and no other can) should be the spiritual home of the knights of the new crusades. At her altar they should get rest, as they bathe their fevered energies in her clear testimony to the "central peace subsisting at the heart of endless agitation." At her altar they should gain strength, as at her own command they wrestle fearlessly with those inclusive problems of all for each and each for all which embrace their narrower field of effort. At her altar they should gain humility, as they listen to her never-ceasing and never-changing command, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness in thine own soul, and all these things of social betterment shall be added unto you." At her altar they should gain sweetness and the beauty of wholeness, as they learn from religion's universal tongue to interpret all partial service in the language of universal love.

To such ministry of religion are we called. Of such may we be worthy.

Discussion.

REV. J. H. CROOKER.—I believe most profoundly in a deeper and wider religious organization, but we must remember that no amount of organization can ever serve as a substitute for deep personal religious conviction. For nothing whatever can do the work of religion but religion. I believe in a warmer social administration of the Church; and my belief in this direction is even strengthened when I go, as I sometimes do, to a New England church that impresses me like an ecclesiastical refrigerator. But no amount of attention to social matters can do that work which can come alone from a man of lofty thought, of profound spirituality, of large experience and tender devotion to the unseen sanctities and divine realities of the religious spirit. I believe most earnestly in translating religion broadly, comprehensively, into all of these philanthropic agencies and methods.

If our piety does not bear fruit, it is not a saving piety. But, unless the gracious showers of spirituality descend upon the soil and water it, there will be no stream of power in the channels of our faith to turn this philanthropic machinery. Every one to-day is interested in these things; but it is not for us to substitute even sociology for theology, but to annex social science to the field of religious thought as a new chapter added to the revelation of the great God, to that unbound word which he is unfolding before us.

It is entirely proper to take all facts into the pulpit. There is a religious significance in almost all facts, however commonplace. But every fact taken into the pulpit must be treated while hot with religious conviction, and moulded into a thing of beauty that shall be given wings to lift the soul to some higher estate of living. There are a great many things which the Church need not undertake to do, but the Church must furnish motive power for all the departments of our human life. And so, putting it crudely in the form of an illustration that will come home to us all, I think of the church as a great power-house, where all facts and all discoveries and all revelations may be used as fuel to generate motive power. However they may be used, if they are not used to generate power, they are misused, they are lost, and the opportunity is squandered.

But this motive power is generated, not that it may stay there in the power-house to operate the machinery under some ecclesiastical roof, but it must run out on all these trolley wires,—these mystic arterial channels that go through the length and breadth of society, moving individuals on, helping them to make the up-grade pull to some noble goal, bearing the freight of human lives.

So it has been my custom,—if you allow a personal allusion,—in dealing especially with young people in some large ways for fifteen years, to speak freely and frequently on the social questions. The people need interest and instruction and enlightenment and enthusiasm along all these lines of our complex and troublesome social life. But we must always remember that this dealing with social problems must be from the point of view of clearer conviction, that we may kindle an authoritative and creative enthusiasm. We must always remember that we are dealing with these things as teachers of religion, as artists of the ideal.

We hear of the ideal Church; but the ideal Church is as yet but the Church of the ideal. If it fails to be the Church of the ideal in the things that come home to us as sons and daughters of the living God, if it fails to set the solitary in families, if it fails to wipe away tears and uproot the bitterness that makes tears flow, all its machinery will be naught, all its social philosophy will be lost. As Sunday after Sunday I look into the faces of my congregation, I say to myself, The great thing that I can do for this people this morning is not simply to give instruction: I must instruct them; but the great thing is to kindle upon the altars of their hearts the flame of devotion, to open the windows that they may see the beauty of the Lord and feel his presence, to bring them more emotional, sympathetic, and religious life that will tide them over the hard places of life and give them courage and hope. These are the ideal forces that are the strength and the safeguard of our civilization.

REV. PAUL FROTHINGHAM.—I was interested in the distinction which Mrs. Spencer made between charity and reform. Charity simply aims to bind up the wounds of poverty, to pour on them the oil of sympathy and the wine of material help. But reform seeks to find out the causes of those wounds, and do away with them. I believe that this distinction between charity and reform has introduced into the Church a deep and difficult problem for it to solve. I believe it is opening a new line of approach, a new direction in which ministers are to work. All concede that it is a road full of difficulties, full of trial; and it would be the greatest satisfaction to me, as I doubt not it would be to the other ministers here, if we could have a word of advice, of encouragement, and of direction from the authority on these matters who is with us this afternoon (Col. Carroll D. Wright).

Let me show you what I mean, and let me put it in the most practical shape.

Mrs. Spencer quoted some figures to show that two-thirds of the money expended in relieving poverty might be made unnecessary if only a better balance might be secured between the supply and demand of labor. She went on to say that some of the great causes of poverty to-day are enforced idleness, low wages, the employment of women and children. The very instant that the Church leaves the simple fact of relieving that poverty and directing its energies to those causes, it comes into the very centre and pith of all the difficulties of the labor problem. If it continues to take the side of the poor, and to say, We must help them, we must do what we can for them, we must take their side, then it finds itself face to face with the danger of

GLENWOOD

RANGES AND

HEATERS

MAKE HOUSEKEEPING EASY.

TWO GOLD MEDALS.

Made by WEIR STOVE CO., Taunton, Mass.

antagonizing the rich. If it says, We must do what we can to do away with these causes, then at once the corporations and capitalists say, You are opposing us, and the daily practical problem of the minister is to know how to act and where and how far to move.

A word has been said about the question of labor and the attitude we can take toward that great conflict, and there are those who tell us that the problem of labor is to-day simply another opportunity for the Church to throw itself into a righteous cause. And there are those that tell us that the Church is backward and weak and cowardly, because it does not go down on the side of the poor to aid them. If the justice were all on one side, it would be simple; but I cannot see that it is. And so I come back to the old, ever-present difficulty of the Christian minister to-day to help in reform, and to keep himself and his church above these two warring classes, and to say, with freedom and energy, to each of them, Beware of selfishness, beware of covetousness! and to hold up before them the ideal of brotherhood, of sympathy, and of humanity. That is the ideal, but it is certainly difficult.

In listening to Dr. Peabody's paper, I was struck by one thing. His paper was a record of individual activity. It was a record of single laymen and ministers who had gone out ahead of their brothers, and had done what they could for humanity. But it is the weakness of our body to-day, as it has been in the past, that in all these things it has been a record of individuals; and the one thing I think we need, the one thing that we hope we can have, is something organized, solidified, on these questions. Take the record of Methodism in the past: the one thing that has made it prosperous is its unity of action, as is seen in its work among the miners and laborers of England. What has made Quakerism grand? Because it stood against war as a body, against miserable methods in prison discipline, because it studied as a unit the great problems of the age; and that is what we are needing to-day.

We talk about organizing the young people in religious work. I believe what we want is to organize our ministers to oppose the municipal and industrial evils of our age. And we younger ministers, who are coming upon the stage with enthusiasm in our hearts, want to feel that there is some organization of wisdom, of caution, which shall not only point to us the way, but shall be able to give us that moral support which shall send us out into society to do the work of the ministry of religion, and to do thereby the work of the ministry of humanity.

HON. CARROLL D. WRIGHT.—I think the very strongest feature of the whole movement for reform to-day lies in the fact that there is no solution. It is my custom, when solutions are up for discussion, to move an adjournment simply because it is not in the power of the human mind, with all the experience of the ages behind it, and with all the culture of the world, to intimate even a solution for cosmos. And the labor question, which is the crucial one in the papers we have heard, is the question of the eternal, everlasting struggle of mankind upward; and what is there to solve except to keep that struggle up? It is my duty in the official pulpit which I occupy to furnish the facts from which the gentlemen who occupy other pulpits can draw and in their peculiar capacity furnish the ethical side of the facts. Those facts receive greater vitality, and have more force when they are electrified by the spirit and the movement of religion, and a religion which embraces the whole welfare of humanity. In reaching out through the discussion of these facts for the spiritualizing influences which are coming faster and faster and stronger and stronger through the work of the pulpits, we are finding that, instead of a solution, we are getting deeper and deeper in the complications which come of a higher intelligence. The solution and the encouragement are that we are stepping ever and ever from bad conditions into better ones, and into an intelligence which enables us to recognize the fact that we are stepping into better ones. That is the solution day by day as we go on.

I have sometimes said that, if I could solve the labor problem as it exists, I would gladly lay down my life instantly. You would be glad to do the same thing, but it would not solve the problem of the everlasting struggle of human nature into a higher and a better and a holier atmosphere. So, while the proposed solutions that flood the world are interesting, and all have their force and their power in contributing something toward understanding the prevailing condition, they cannot be accepted as full solutions because in the final analysis the great fact is evident that there is no limitation to human development.

REV. ALEXANDER KENT.—I never could understand why the Unitarian denomination, with such a magnificent inheritance as it has from Channing, who projected the lines on which true reform must be carried out, should have kept silent on all the great topics which he considered in such a masterful way. It was not the theology of Channing that led his works to go all over the world: it was their great human interest, the annunciation of those great principles which he put before the world as the outgrowth of his theology. I believe that the solution of these problems lies in the direction of the lines which he projects. The great fundamental principles which the Unitarian denomination stands for to-day—love to God and love to man—are the principles that point the way to the solution of every question that can possibly come up. The particular method by which we shall apply the principle at any particular time to any particular problem will give rise to differences of opinion; but that these principles are eternal, and that we must find some way of applying them, goes without saying, and to me it seems that the great work of the Christian ministry is to make these principles so clear that men cannot sit in the pews who are carrying on business in direct violation of these principles. I am happy to believe, with Col. Wright, that these problems are the result of the struggle of men from lower to higher. What we want to do is to find out what is our duty, what is the particular thing that devolves upon us, by which we can best help those about us.

Adjourned.

OUR JAPAN MISSION.

BY REV. WILLIAM I. LAWRENCE.

Our mission in Japan is the most important single enterprise under the care of the American Unitarian Association. If it be all that those who have worked in the mission declare it to be, it presents a unique opportunity for the spread of our word and work. If, on the other hand, that mission is a mistake, then its very costliness makes it important that we consider it carefully, so that we may cut off so serious a drain upon our limited resources.

My connection with the mission extended from 1891 to 1894. During those years the Theological School was founded, the scope of the magazine was enlarged, and its name changed from the Unitarian to Shukyo,—meaning "religion,"—several tracts and two important books were published, and the new building was erected. Short, therefore, as was my stay, it fell upon those years in which the work assumed its present form. I beg that, in my advocacy of the mission, these facts may be borne in mind.

I am here to say, with what earnestness I may, that I believe it to be our duty, as Unitarians, to give to that mission a steady support. I ask you to consider, with me, some reasons for that opinion.

1. First, it ought to be maintained because to do otherwise is to invite denominational disgrace. If by this it were meant that we must, even at so great a cost, avoid criticisms aimed at ourselves as individuals, the reason given would not be worthy of consideration. It is not ourselves, however, but our principles that are on trial. Our Japan Mission has a prominence in the religious world which we may not appreciate. Any failure of that work would be heralded almost all over the world as conclusive evidence of the impotency of liberal Christianity. As we value the truths for which we stand, let us beware of throwing so serious an obstacle in our own path.

2. Second, the mission deserves our support because of the wisdom shown in its management. As a single illustration of the wisdom with which its financial affairs are conducted, let it be noted that out of the total cost of the mission building, which was a little over 14,000 yen, the sum of 4,000 yen was saved out of current expenses by an economy so rigid that few would have been willing to practise it.

While this economy was being exercised, the work was, nevertheless, being steadily enlarged. A management which at once enlarges a work and reduces the cost is one which should inspire confidence. Turning from matters of economy to a consideration of the amount and kind of work being done, a few facts culled from Mr. MacCauley's last report will be of interest. There we find that the mission had issued and circulated 71,000 copies of the monthly magazine. They had translated, published, and distributed 130,000 tracts, including the writings of Channing, Parker, Emerson, Bellows, Gannett, Hawkes, MacCauley, and Savage. James Freeman Clarke's "Steps of Belief" and J. T. Bixby's "Crisis in Morals" were translated and published. An edition of Kanamore's "Present and Future of Christianity in Japan" was bought and circulated. In the Post-office Mission they received 2,500 letters in 1894, counting only those containing inquiries concerning our faith, from the thinking people of the country, Buddhists and Christians. The mission maintains a school second to none in the respect which it commands among the people of Japan. It is the only school in that country in which theology is studied purely as a science,—a fact which wins it the admiration of the most intelligent people.

In the department of church extension the mission is not able to report great results. Upon this point more than a passing word is necessary, not by way of apology, but in order to point out more clearly the policy of the mission. From the first your representatives in Japan have wished to see churches established, but they have carefully refrained from taking the initiative. This course has been pursued partly because the mission has had neither the money to establish and maintain such churches nor the men who could be intrusted with so important work. Reading circles, however, have been formed in many cities and towns which are visited from time to time by our representatives from Tokyo, and which are valuable centres for the propagation of our work.

But, even if the money and the men to establish churches were at command, it still remains true that, among a people so widely different from us as are the Japanese, any institution which we could devise must be so foreign to their ideas and their habits of life and worship as to give little promise of usefulness or permanence. One mistake which some of the Christian bodies have made in their foreign work is that they have tried to establish on Oriental soil an Occidental institution. The wisdom shown by our representatives is illustrated by the fact that the religious world to-day is greatly disturbed by misunderstandings between missionaries and the mission churches. An important committee of Congregationalists has recently gone to Japan, hoping to avert a threatened disaster in the missions of the American Board, the difficulty with the native churches having arisen out of differences of opinions both as to theology and the management of the churches,—differences which have their origin in the widely varying attitudes of Oriental and Occidental minds. Wisely avoiding the disastrous drain upon limited resources, avoiding with equal care the inevitable misunderstandings which would follow upon a policy of forming churches among people whose ideas and methods are so different from ours, your representatives have labored for other, for larger, and, I believe, for more important ends.

Let it not be forgotten that our work in Japan marked a new departure in missions. The old method was based on the hostility of religions, ours on the sympathy of religions. The old proceeded by the method of extermination, ours by the method of conference and the preservation of what is best. The old had for its outcome the undoing of a great part of the divine Providence among men: ours has for its aim the conservation of all that is holiest in human thought, and looks forward to the development of the universal religion. A work so simple, so sublime, ought to kindle our enthusiasm and command our unwavering loyalty.

3. I have said that we ought to support our mission because to do otherwise would be to deter the advance of liberal religion, and because the mission shows itself wise in its policy in things small and large. I now say, in the third place, that it ought to be maintained because of the urgent need that exists there,—a need which we are peculiarly able to meet. Why, it is sometimes asked, do we go to Japan? Is there not enough to do in our own country to employ all our limited resources? Yes, there is; and not only so: all those resources of men and of money could be employed profitably in any one of the geographical sections of our country. But the only question which we ought to ask is, Where, in whatever State, section, or country, can we use such resources as we have to the greatest advantage?

A year ago last May the superintendent of the mission, in an address delivered at the Second Church, Boston, gave a most complete and masterful statement of the situation of religion in Japan. He laid emphasis upon the fact that, in the emergence of that country from its former isolation to its present position in the world, the Japanese people have parted forever with the central idea of their ethical system; namely, the divinity of the imperial family. One needs to be somewhat familiar with the history of Japan and with the Shinto faith to appreciate how fully all ideas of ethical conduct centred in that one belief. Losing that, Japan seemed to have been suddenly cut adrift, and to have no longer a complete and commanding system of morality. Distressing as is the thought of a nation lacking an adequate religion or system of morality, this is but the beginning of the story. Since Mr. MacCauley's address was given, a great change has taken place in the position of Japan among the nations of the Eastern world. Then a little country patronized by the great powers, now recognized as one of the great powers, and able to cope single-handed with nations whose voices have struck terror throughout the world, Japan occupies a position widely different from that which it held even a year ago. More than ever is it apparent that that country holds the key to the East-

A CABINET SIDEBORD.

This is something more than a Sideboard. It is in reality a great piece of dining-room cabinet work,—what the English would call a Cabinet Sideboard. Its capacity is fully double that of any ordinary sideboard.

It is very effective, and it does not require a large room to make it seem in correct taste. The top overhangs nearly two feet, and the cloistered effect of the pillars around the upper shelf is skilfully planned. There are two large French plate mirrors in the top.

Beneath the great Board are 5 Drawers, 2 Plate Closets, and a spacious Cellarette, having an opening nearly two feet square. An entire chapter might be written on the symbolic carving, the panel work, the fluted pillars, etc., etc.

But think now for one moment of the chance which we offer you to secure such pieces of cabinet work as this at the price of an ordinary Sideboard. This Cabinet Sideboard would cost, if built to order, over twice what we ask for it ready made.

PAINÉ FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

ern situation. In the dramatic scenes of the last year Japan has demonstrated in a way which must convince the most conservative Oriental that, in the struggle for existence going on between nations, only those methods and ideas which are characteristic of Occidental civilization have any hope of permanence. Japan is to-day the representative of Western civilization to the myriad peoples of the East,—an armed teacher, whose voice is clothed with authority. How, then, is she fitted for this great responsibility? While we glory with the Japanese people in their rapid advancement, we must remember that they are not exempt from the laws of human life, and that rapidity of growth may be at the cost of solidity. A nation is not born in a day,—no, nor even in thirty years,—so that, while Japan may, as a military power, even as a centre of speculative thought, take a prominent place among the nations of the world, it may be at the sacrifice of institutions and traditions which for centuries have been the stay of their moral and religious life. Japan adopts our mechanical improvements, our arms, our philosophy, especially that of a materialistic tendency; but we believe that the permanence of the best achievements, that the highest welfare of the people, rest not upon railways, telegraphs, iron-clads, nor even upon speculative philosophy, but upon principles of religion and morality. The rapid advancement of Japan to her present place of authority simply increases the opportunity there presented and the duty that rests upon us of carrying to them such teachings as we believe to be the result of the world's wisest thinking and deepest experiences.

Three systems of religious thought claim to-day the attention of the people of Japan,—Shinto, Buddhism, and Christianity. Shinto, which is the native cult, has been declared by imperial decree to be no longer regarded as a religion, but as a State ceremonial; while Buddhism, which thirty years ago was the established religion of the country, is to-day neglected, dishonored, and often disgraced. Moreover, while we recognize the value of the two great underlying principles of Shinto,—filial piety and loyalty,—and acknowledge the sublimity of much that is taught in the name of Buddhism, neither of these systems appears able to command the moral obedience of the thinking people of Japan or to serve as a guiding power in the working out of their destiny. Shall we say, then, that Christianity is the religion that can do for them what they need? Yes, if by Christianity we mean its purest and highest interpretation, and if that religion can be taken to them in such wise as to insure the utmost freedom of thought. The Japanese are a race of free thinkers; and the idea that creeds or councils, or even practical considerations, should restrict the utmost liberty of thought and speech is wholly foreign to them. Hence, when Christianity reaches them handicapped by creeds and by traditions, it is not strange that they either reject it wholly or adopt it with such modifications as give the missionaries much concern. After thirty-five years of the most devoted labor and the most lavish use of men and of money, the utmost that can be claimed for Christianity in Japan to-day is that, including Catholics, both Roman and Greek, the Christians number one hundred thousand in a total population of forty millions, or one-fourth of one per cent. of the whole. And among these are not only many whose Christianity is merely nominal, but many who decline to accept anything but the underlying principles of that faith, and who scorn almost the whole of evangelical theology. Thus, in the last report of the most successful mission in Japan, it is stated that the "foremost writers and thinkers" among their churches "seem well-nigh reckless at times in their destructive criticism. Not merely do missionaries and foreign boards, present methods of work and existing creeds, come in for sweeping condemnation, but the Bible and the Church are attacked with alarming freedom. Dissatisfied with the Christianity developed and taught in the West, and feeling that there must be some meeting ground for the best of the East and the West, some writers have tried to find it in a curious mingling of Ritschlian Christianity, Confucian ethics, and Oriental mysticism."

Among a people so inclined, and yet needing, with pathetic urgency, the principles of pure religion, our Unitarianism goes, bearing the simple gospel of freedom, fellowship, and character. We not only acknowledge with frankness, but accept with gratitude, all that is true and uplifting in the faiths already there. We hold up to them the pure theism and the deep-rooted optimism of Christianity. We accept, and even proclaim, as the latest revelation of God, the most advanced teachings of science and philosophy, and show, by example and by precept, that it is possible to be a thoroughgoing rationalist and at the same time to live a religious life.

To such an appeal the Japanese people are not deaf. In their own way they are reaching out for a satisfactory religion and a system of ethics that will speak with the voice of authority. If, through our representatives, the Unitarian body simply holds a place in that country, and testifies to the reality of a rational faith; if we do no more than to remain visibly present, as living witnesses of the great truth that religious thinking, feeling, and living are perfectly compatible with the utmost freedom of thought,—it may be that, in the providence of God, we shall be among the most potent factors in saving religion in that country from final rejection. Beside such an ideal all results capable of being tabulated in a missionary report shrink into insignificance. By as much as we value those principles which have made our hearts sing for joy,—nay, by as much as we realize the indispensable importance of religion itself as a factor in the well-being and development of man,—let us be loyal to this as to a God-given trust, and do for this people, and through them to the vast millions of Orientals, such a service as few in the history of the world have been called upon to perform for their fellow-men.

Thursday Night Meeting.

THE OUTLOOK.

The Thursday evening meeting was opened by Rev. Rush R. Shippen of Washington, the presiding officer. Mr. Shippen began by expressing his satisfaction that the Conference had come to Washington. He had tried his best for several years to bring it about. At last he had succeeded. Saratoga is a good place. It has the advantage of great hotels, where fifteen hundred people can be under the same roof; but in thirty years the Conference has never been published to the world as it has been this week. Washington has not only great city papers, but also it is the centre of a corps of correspondents of the great metropolitan papers of New York, Chicago, and San Francisco. When you see the papers of the cities, you will say you have not been reported before as you have been this week. We wish to thank the city press and also the correspondents of these metropolitan papers in the other large cities for their handsome treatment of the Conference. Prof. Fiske had spoken the night before on the wonderful development of liberal thought in Massachusetts, but in the city of Washington there is a wonderful progress of liberal thought in the same way. If we had a hall double the size of this, we should have filled it.

The word to-night is "The Outlook." We have been in looking too long. Unitarians had paid much attention to self-culture. Fifty years ago the Unitarian denomination was saying, Sinner, save your own soul, and let the rest of the world take care of itself. Self-culture, self-examination, self-salvation, all the other self which begin and end in selfishness, belong to the kingdom of the devil. We are beginning to feel now that, if we lend a hand and do our part in saving the world, God will take care of us in this world and the next.

Mr. Shippen then gave an outline of the history of the development of the Unitarian church in Washington and its growth in the last twenty years. The church had been built by the inspiration of the Conference; and, if the Conference had never done anything else, that work alone would have justified its existence. When he first came to Washington as pastor, a Methodist lady said to him: "When your church was built, there were two boys playing on the sidewalk. I said to one of them, 'What church is this?' He said he did not know. The other spoke up and said, 'It is the church of all sorts.'" [Laughter.] Well, I am happy if it is so. It is representative of the American people: they are of all sorts.

Father Taylor, the devout Methodist, had a Unitarian son-in-law, Judge Russell; and he said of him, "If he is not a saint, he is a lovable sinner." So he had not found a more lovely set of sinners and saints than in All Souls' Church in Washington.

Passing to speak of the growth of liberal thought in the community, Mr. Shippen referred to the Roman Catholic Church. "I find some people attacking that church," he said, "talking of the iniquities and persecutions of three or four hundred years ago, in which Protestants and Catholics are both mixed up together. But go up to the new Catholic University growing in magnificent proportions on the hill, and we find Bishop Keane, a broad man of liberal thought, who in the Unitarian Club at Boston uttered a word about human nature which is akin to that of Channing. Go into the reception-room. There are three portraits. One is of Leo XIII. On the right is a cardinal, on the left is George Washington. I ask you if that portrait of George Washington beside the pope is not a proclamation to every young student of that university that manhood counts higher than allegiance to Rome. Two men that have pews in All Souls' Church—one a most accomplished scholar and scientist, Prof. Ward, and the other the president of the board of trustees of the church, Col. Carroll D. Wright—are lecturers in Washington University."

Turning to Presbyterianism, Mr. Shippen said that the most popular preacher in the city, who had just retired, was largely popular because he preached a doctrine which was close to that preached in All Souls' pulpit. After hearing a Thanksgiving sermon, one of his people said, "It is magnificent"; but one of my people answered, "It is fresh and new to you, but it is what we have been hearing all our lives." The speaker thought that this change to liberal thought in Washington was indicative of what is going on throughout the land. He then introduced Hon. Horace G. Wadlin of Massachusetts.

ADDRESS OF REV. S. R. CALTHROP.

In the late war a certain major and his color-sergeant were the bravest of the brave in their regiment. They were always at the front, always leading. But, after a gallant attack which failed, they both lay on the ground close together, each with a leg shot off. The major kept on bemoaning his fate, until at last the color-sergeant burst out: "Why, major, you have been my model soldier! I had resolved to imitate you in everything, but now I must say you ought to copy me. I have not said a word; and yet I, too, have lost a leg." "Ah," said the major, "but your leg did not cost three hundred dollars!" It was his wooden leg that was shot away, and he had got to buy another. I tell you this, dear friends, for the consolation of those of you who are reluctantly quitting your old ideas. It is only the wooden leg that has been shot off, or, rather, it is something wooden in your creed. It is only the scaffolding that has been knocked away, and the splendid temple behind it is now revealed.

Your doctrine of incarnation is true if it is inclusive, if you see God incarnated in man. Your doctrine of atonement is true if you see in it a universal law,—that the strong should bear the infirmities of the weak, and, if need be, suffer in their stead. Your doctrine of the Bible was true as far as it went. You saw that God inspired certain Hebrew souls, and he did. That will teach you to see now that other holy souls spake divine words when moved by the Holy Ghost. Your Jesus remains, and will lead the ages yet,—the man of men, our beloved and tender and loving brother. "The Son of God?" Yes, that remains true forever; for we all are sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty, and he is the glorious instance of what you and I in God's long eternity may become. Above all, your devout thought of God remains. All your trust will be found complete in him. He is at the bottom of your best thought. He is the consolation of all your sorrow, and the cherisher and promoter of all your joy. He is the force inside of man: his holy Spirit is the life-power that is impelling man onward. The Spirit of God is God not far away, up yonder, but right here, working inside of men. I never saw God minus man do anything in the human world, did you? I have seen God in man, God plus man, God and man together, do a great deal. He is the force in the thinker that brings out pure mathematics, that gives true physics, sound physiology, good engineering, high statesmanship, splendid business faculty. "O God! by these things men live, and in these is the life of thy Spirit." So everything truly human is divine. God is a man's integrity, a woman's tenderness, a child's trustfulness, a teacher's inspiration, a scholar's reverence and receptivity. He is Browning's noblest verse, Emerson's deepest insight. Give me any noble thing that any man, woman, or child has done, and I will show you God. God is the eternal element in man. He is some great Cause that rouses man's enthusiasm, for which men shall be content and joyous to die. He is some great new Principle that unites man's thoughts. He is inside the artist's plastic fingers, inside his creative brain. He is the invisible music that Beethoven hears. God compels you and me to goodness, as the poet compels us to thought by singing creation's unfathomable song in our ears. His commands are the finger-posts pointing to us the direction where lie our best and highest hopes.

Dear sceptic, I love you very much, also, and understand you a little. You criticise the ways of God: they are not just enough, not wise enough, not loving enough. You do not yet know that your criticism is the presence of God in you, God finding fault with past definitions of God. If your thoughts, my dear sceptic, were to climb up into heaven, you would find God there. If you could penetrate into the deepest things below, God was there before you. If you dream of an impossible and ideal goodness, God is the wings of your soul that bid you rise. Is life mean, low, and contemptible (that is, the life you see)? That, my dear sceptic, is the voice of God inside you. If your criticism is just, you are part and parcel of that august judgment upon past methods of thinking, acting, and living which is the mind of God getting inside the mind of man. God puts mathematics into the atheistic mathematician's brain, making him do good mathematical work. I worship a God who cares nothing for himself or his own glory. I worship a God who cares lovingly for man, who is urging social improvement upon man, agitating men's minds with the state of the lowly and the feeble and the forlorn. Nature is unmoral, is it? I am nature, and I am not unmoral. [Laughter and applause.] The mistake of some scientific men, even of Tyndall sometimes, is in saying that nature and man are two things. No: they are one thing. I am, or ought to be, the flower of nature. I am nature's spokesman and lord. I tell that hill to come down, and down it comes. I tunnel that mountain, and the tunnel abides. I bid the waters

Timely Warning.

The great success of the chocolate preparations of the house of Walter Baker & Co. (established in 1780) has led to the placing on the market many misleading and unscrupulous imitations of their name, labels, and wrappers. Walter Baker & Co. are the oldest and largest manufacturers of pure and high-grade Cocoas and Chocolates on this continent. No chemicals are used in their manufactures.

Consumers should ask for, and be sure that they get, the genuine Walter Baker & Co.'s goods.

WALTER BAKER & CO., Limited,
DORCHESTER, MASS.

spring out of the stony rock with my rod of power, and out the water comes.

And so, dear friends, I bid you welcome to God's new and beautiful time. The tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them. O believer! your faith is not large enough. You have not asked of God gifts enough.

"Thou coming to a King, Large petitions with thee bring."

I ask of God lives innumerable. I demand an account for yonder horse in the street whipped to death by some brutal carter. I insist that its redeemer as well as mine shall live. It is not too much for faith to ask that not one atom in God's galaxy shall be destroyed or lose its identity. It is not too much for faith to ask "That not one life shall be destroyed,

Or cast as rubbish to the void,
When God hath made the pile complete."

And God answers that prayer abundantly.

This is the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which is committed to our trust. It is our business to sow it broadcast over the world, and to bid lonely hearts take courage and sorrowing hearts rejoice. God is above us, all around us, and within us; and in his might we shall conquer all the hosts of sin and death. God is the hater of all disease, the lover of all health, the suggester of all nobleness, and the Father of all souls. The Father! That one word is enough.

ADDRESS OF HON. CARROLL D. WRIGHT.

References to the army seem to come to the minds of the speakers, and I want to tell you in my opening remarks of a little incident showing the flash of the spirit of God through one of the most lawless soldiers I ever knew. This man was a bummer in every sense of the word. As a soldier, he was a complete fraud at one time. He was tall and spare. It was almost impossible ever to get him on a detail of duty. He was ill, as a rule. [Laughter.] But one day, when the regiment was going into battle, this man, of no great intellectual power, of no particular strength of moral spirit in him, was placed next the color-guard in a post of honor. As the waves of battle swayed back and forth, and men went down and the color-sergeant was shot, and the next man to the color-sergeant raised the flag, to be shot down immediately, and the third and the fourth and the fifth man fell, and all the colors of the whole division were down, and there was not a single rallying-point on which to assemble the charge, this man, that we had considered as a mean, contemptible soldier of no spirit, seized the staff and raised the stars and stripes in the centre of the brigade, and made a rallying-point for the whole division, and carried the flag fearlessly through the fight; and it made of this man ever after and now a man of grandeur, a man of character, a man of moral force. [Applause.] There was in him at that moment something of the spirit of Christ-like sacrifice that enters into men at moments in their lives, that raised him to the supreme height of his whole existence. He saw something of a spirit that he had never realized before,—the spirit of duty, the spirit of patriotism, the spirit of sacrifice; and he has told me repeatedly, as a successful business man, that that moment in his life turned the point with him. There was something of reality to it: there was a factor of immortality before him. There was the everlasting reality that he himself had something God-like in him in that instant. This experience was repeated and repeated over and over again on the battlefields of the Civil War, and has been repeated on every battlefield of every war. There was something in that that typifies the whole essence of faith,—that faith which develops the individual character in man until he sees that there is only one life for him to pursue, and that is the life of duty to the higher Power.

A good deacon in my town (I will not describe him too conspicuously) said to me one day, "Wright, you are a Unitarian?" I said, "Yes, I am." "Well, what makes you a Unitarian? If I was a Unitarian, I would do everything that is bad. I would drink and steal and lie, and do all sorts of things, because I should know very well that it was not going to harm me." There was but one answer to make to the good deacon, and that was, "My friend, so long as you are a neighbor of mine, stick to your old doctrine. [Laughter and applause.] You are not big enough nor good enough to be a Unitarian." "Well," he said, "what do you mean by that?" I said I mean by this that it is the hardest theological doctrine in the world to live up to [applause]; that a man who would be a good Unitarian must take the responsibility of his own acts upon his own shoulders; that he must develop a character which will carry him through this world and into the next, and that, if he doesn't develop that character here, he will not find it there. "By your belief, as you have just confessed it to me, you can get rid of the results of your sinful acts by the processes of your belief. But a Unitarian can never get rid of the results of his sinful acts: he must live them out through eternity, if need be, until he is a perfect man." [Applause.]

I am orthodox enough, Mr. President, to believe that, if a man does not live a pure, clean, sweet life here, he will have to live some kind of a life somewhere else until his life does become clean and pure and sweet. [Applause.]

So the Unitarian faith, instead of being an easy one,—one which would allow a man to do as my friend the deacon said he would do,—holds him to the line, and points to the chips he makes in hewing to it.

You remember the story of good old Father Ballou of Universalist renown. It is a good story, and often told, and similar to my experience with the good deacon. A young theological student in the town where Father Ballou was to preach one Sunday said, if he could get hold of him, he believed he could get out of him all that nonsense of universal salvation. And so he waited upon him, and said, "I believe you are Father Ballou?" "Yes, I am sometimes called that by my true and affectionate friends." "Well, Father Ballou, if I believed as you do, I would do all sorts of evil things,"—the same story that my deacon friend told me. Father Ballou said, "My friend, you look to me like a young man that would." [Laughter and applause.] The spirit of Jesus Christ had never got inside of this man's being: it was not in his mind nor in his soul. He had not learned to develop his own individual character and to fight the evils of this world. It is in learning that, in doing that, and in living up to that article of faith that makes the Unitarian denomination what it is,—small, to be sure, but powerful. It cannot convert the whole sixty-five or seventy millions of people in this country, and never will; but it has shaken off the shackles of some of the old doctrines, and has led men and women everywhere to know that there is something better than the old-fashioned traditions of the hell of which we learned. We never hear of that now in the old sense, or but rarely. Unitarian propagandism has carried thought and feeling to the whole community. The Unitarian Church stands as strong as a rock on the basis of what Dr. Fiske calls the everlasting reality of religion, and upon that other reality which to my mind is the great point in all religious faith,—not the belief in immortality, but the knowledge of it as a fact in our everyday life. If I were to urge anything upon the clergy in the matter of their preaching, it would be to insist upon immortality as the very essence and fact of this life, not as the result of a belief in something to come. If everybody realized that there is immortality commencing now, and that they were laying the foundations for it, not through the processes of some belief or some intellectual gymnastics, but through the reality of positive fact and experience, then I believe there would come, as I believe there is coming, that great revival of religion of which Mr. Wadlin spoke. That revival of religion is coming not only to the pulpit, but through the emotions of the people in their struggle to see the sunlight, in their struggle to know some great truth on which they can rest. Every man must pass through some Gethsemane, must find in his or her life some suffering, must bear some cross, endure some trial, in order to fashion the individual character of soul and mind which makes the perfect man at last. Our God is the God of perfection, not made up of attributes and elements, not a God of justice, who must, in order to be just, realize injustice, but a God who is a perfect being; and the work of the masses of this world, as they are toiling to higher standards, leads to this idea of God, leads to the idea of perfection.

A frequent illustration in my line of work comes through mechanics. God does not take into his economy the value of the individual life. A little misplacement of the switch, a little turn of a little piece of steel, and a hundred lives go back to their Giver. Does the world lose? Are the lives lost? No. But the world is taught the necessity of perfection in all things; for, with perfection, the hundred lives would have lived on. That is the great idea of God that comes to us through the industrial laws, through mechanics, through science,—the idea of perfection, the highest ideal we can have of the Godhead. Unitarians do not fear science, they do not fear discovery: they do not fear anything that comes of research, because the result of their discovery or research is only another view of the face of the ideal which we call God. And the outlook for Unitarianism is, with persistency of purpose, to insist with all its power upon perfecting the individual character, taking for the grandest type that of Jesus, who led the people of the world around him always to the ideal of perfection, always to the idea that there was something to live for within themselves.

I am not a deep student of Scripture; but, as I read the gospel contained in the New Testament, it seems always to be aimed in the one direction of bringing in the kingdom of God on earth. With the kingdom of God on earth the kingdom of God hereafter need not exercise the minds of men. Phillips Brooks, in that masterly course of lectures which he gave to the divinity students of Yale University, said, substantially, to the young men, "Do not, I beg of you, when you get into the active work of your ministry, preach much about Christ; but I beg of you, with all the spirit and power of which I am possessed, to preach Christ. Not so much about him, but preach him and the lessons which his life gives to us." A grand injunction, by which he meant to be understood that they were to take into their lives in all their conduct and in all their preaching the very spirit of the great Master of all preaching.

Can the Unitarian denomination claim, then, to have an outlook? To my mind it has the brightest, the most cheerful outlook; for its spirit—the spirit of building the individual character—is the spirit of to-day, and it is moving the masses in their struggle upward. It is that spirit which makes them restless at times, discontented with the fact that they are not moving on as they wish. Contentment with one's lot is not happiness: often contentment with one's lot is degradation. But contentment with the idea that a man is moving on makes him the man that you want him to be, and helps him to perfect his own character; and out of that perfection of individual character which is the basis of religion there comes a community of saving power, a community that recognizes the nation as something more than a number of people met together for the purpose of government. This perfection brings to man the recognition that the nation, as well as the man, was born of God, and that in it is the power of the Supreme Ruler working to make the world what it should be,—the abiding-place of the sons and daughters of God.

This is the outlook for Unitarianism. There is something ennobling and stimulating in this outlook. We need only to press forward and meet the foe of ignorance every day, and do something in that part of constructive evolution which means that every man shall give to the world the very best of his own social service; and the reward that shall come to him will be the best reward that social service can receive. This, to my mind, is practical Unitarianism, and the outlook that comes with a struggle with poverty and with every adverse condition that interferes with the happiness of man. Whoever retards that struggle by any idleness on the part of himself, by any lack of attention, or by withholding any social service that he can give, is an enemy of humanity; and he who aids it, be his aid ever so insignificant, is a friend of humanity.

ADDRESS OF HON. HORACE G. WADLIN.

The subject of this meeting is itself evidence that we are entering upon a broader and fuller religious life. The Outlook! It has long been a reproach, not always deserved, that Unitarians have confined themselves mainly to the inlook; and yet I think that this, if true, is not altogether a reproach. For no individual, and certainly no church, can move onward and outward, until first inspired by the inner vision. The life which is within must inspire us ere we can fitly minister to others; and the divine Spirit, when first consciously felt in the soul, carries one out of self, opens wider vistas, and is the source of a broader religious life. An outlook, then, becomes not only possible, but inevitable.

To-day we are feeling the inspiration of that Spirit. The grand meetings of this Conference, marred by no inharmonious word, the enthusiasm, the deep and fervent interest manifested by audiences limited only by the capacity of this hall coming together in this city, which has wide attractions outside,—these testify that, no matter what may have been the fact in the past, we are to-day to apply a warlike figure to a movement which is as far as possible removed from warlike purpose,—an army moving with united ranks in the van of religious progress under a banner whose folds fly back as we march forward.

And we march not to conquest, not to dispossess any from that which is sincerely held. To him who is secure within the limits of his present faith we offer no disturbing element. But to him who feels the stirring of something higher, to whom old beliefs are no longer quite conclusive, who seeks a wider vision and a larger hope,—to him we come with words of cheer. We march not to conquest; but, having come to ourselves, we seek to occupy the inheritance which the Lord giveth us.

It has been said that Unitarians have no common bond of union. There is an old story which some of you have heard, but which I venture to give wider currency, that aptly illustrates that assumption. I assure you that the story is true. It happened that a Unitarian clergyman—a friend of mine—went to spend the summer in one of those remote parishes where the con-

The MAGEE Boston Heater

FOR WARM AIR ONLY, and the MAGEE COMBINATION HEATER here shown (for warm air and Hot Water), each received THE HIGHEST AWARD at the World's Fair, Chicago.

They are honestly, carefully and intelligently made for USE, not merely to sell.

No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost above any others on the market.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The name Magee carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use.

DESCRIPTIVE CIRCULARS FREE.

For Sale by Leading Dealers Everywhere.

MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY, Hot Water Combination. 32, 34, 36 & 38 Union St., Boston. 242 Water Street, New York. 86 Lake Street, Chicago.

gealed tenets of a primitive faith have not yet felt the warmth of the wider spiritual life. And there came to him a native of the hamlet, who desired to supply his household with milk. He said to my friend: "I hear you are a clergyman. May I ask of what denomination?" "Most certainly," was the reply. "I am a Unitarian clergyman." "Well," said the native, with that uplifting eyebrow which indicates the critical temper, "I am a Unitarian milkman." "What is that?" asked my friend a little curiously; for the designation did not seem particularly obvious. "Why," responded the native, "I furnish sweet milk, skimmed milk, buttermilk,—anything to suit the customer." [Laughter.]

Well, there possibly might be worse things than that; for was it not Saint Paul who was all things to all men under the spur of a noble purpose? But, if he meant it as a reproach, if he meant to imply that Unitarians have no common bond of unity, that implication is, I believe, no longer true. For now upon the folds of the banner under which we march is inscribed a legend sufficiently broad and yet sufficiently definite,—as definite, I believe, as any concrete, concise, religious statement ought to be,—"The churches accept the religion of Jesus." The religion of Jesus! Is not that sufficiently definite? Not what men say about it, not what they have said, but the thing itself! This it is that unites us. And this, I take it, is the one fixed fact at the heart of a changing world. This never changes. Your ideas of it and my ideas of it, our feeble attempts to express it, change; but the religion of Jesus, profoundly true before he taught it, to-day unchangeably true,—this it is that we seek for, stand for, and abide by, so far as we apprehend it to-day, receiving thankfully the higher vision which in God's providence will come to us on the morrow. This alone, as your resolutions yesterday most fitly stated, is a sufficient bond of Christian unity.

I take it that we have come to this position not altogether of our own will, but because we are moved upon by that which is the underlying spirit of this age. It is God working through us, in this our day, that inspires us. I know that men say this is a material age, and it is. Never have men so wrought upon material things for comfort and prosperity and wealth. We see the evidences of material progress on every hand,—in the palaces of trade, along our busy streets, in the ever-extending systems of transportation, in the expansion of industry; but the movement does not stop there. Some men think it does, and they have written us down as decadent. Do not believe it. There are decadents in every age; but this is the age of progress, progress to other and higher things, such progress as the world has never seen. This material activity is only the outward manifestation of the movement by which God is drawing men together into fraternal relations, abolishing frontiers and boundaries, so that in the fulness of time there may be realized that brotherhood in unity and that supreme Fatherhood which is the cornerstone of our religious faith. All this movement toward the higher education, not merely of the intellect, but of the spirit, bounded by no race, confined to no sect,—for, as President Hall so truly said, education is the grandest, most all-inclusive word of this age,—all this effort for the help of the poor in hospitals and in asylums, for a higher and better treatment of the criminal, toward purifying systems of government,—what are all these but the signs of progress which indeed accompanies and rests upon, but is not limited to, the material development of the age? It is the divine Spirit that inspires it all. It is that which moves us toward higher ground. It is that only which can support us in any true religious progress. It is not, then, a dead Christ for which we stand, but for a living, vital, spiritual principle, which indeed came to fruition, if you will, in Jesus, but is to-day in the world, appealing to your soul and mine as fully and completely as it did in that far-off time. That is the outlook before us.

And now one supreme thing we need. I do not place the need of money first, although any one who has taken part, as I have, in the meetings of your directory, who has heard the appeals that come to us from all over the land, must appreciate our lack of funds to push our work; but there is another need which is more important. We need,—and you will permit me to use an old phrase, and will not misunderstand me,—we need a revival of religion. We need a new outpouring of the Holy Spirit that shall touch us personally, and bring us to a conscious recognition of what it means to be members of a Church like ours. We need to get outside the limits of tradition, outside our duty to ourselves and to our own immediate parish, and recognize that we are now part of an onward, progressive, active, Christian Church. We need that. And, when we have that, as we are beginning to have it, the question of funds will take care of itself.

I listened recently to an address by my good friend, Mr. Dole, in which he said truly that it perhaps argued a certain conceit for the members of a small body like ours, comprising a few hundred churches, each with a small membership, to claim to stand for a forward religious movement which should have for its object the conversion of sixty-five millions of people. That is true from one point of view; and yet we ought not to forget that every movement toward religious progress has been supported by the small, sincere company of believers. The standard is with the advance-guard. They carry the banner over the outworks, and plant it within the stronghold of the enemy. It was the three hundred that won honor at Balaklava. And we ought not to forget that the religion of Jesus found expression in the beginning, not through the mouth of the rich and powerful, but through one of low estate, who never wrote one line of doctrine, who simply lived his religion in the sight of men, and died,—actually dropped out of the pages of secular history. And that little company of followers, who gathered in the upper chamber, flung themselves alone and unaided against the mighty Roman power; and it crumbled at their touch. That should be encouraging. Call it what you will,—legend or history or miracle,—it had its beginning there; and its influence has moved onward till our day. And so I have not the slightest doubt of ultimate success. We may not, indeed, see it; but the work which we have at heart is going to be done. God wills it, and he makes no mistake. And whether it succeeds or not is not the question for us. It is our duty, united as we now are, marching together as we are, to gird ourselves anew, with the deepest personal consecration, that we may advance, so far as we may, the cause that lies just at our door, and leave the future to God.

ADDRESS OF REV. M. J. SAVAGE.

Since I became a Unitarian, I have heard a great deal of discussion concerning the question as to why Unitarians are apparently a small and feeble folk, why they do not grow more rapidly, why a gospel that seems so simple and so grand does not take possession of the country. Something has been said this evening as to the relative size of the vanguard of an army. One way by which we can get to be with the majority in this country is to stop growing. Disraeli once said that, when you can find an opinion which is already popular, you will find one which is about to pass away. If humanity grows, it means that it is led onward by an ideal,—an ideal that is higher and better than has yet been incarnated in actual life or in the existing institutions of society. When the main body of humanity gets up to the position occupied by the vanguard, there is always another vanguard, led on by a still higher ideal, away in front. I am content, not in pride, but in consecration, in devotion, in earnest sacrifice, if need be, if I may be one of that small number which is pursuing the ideal that by and by is to catch the eyes and lure forward the movement of the great body of humanity.

I care little as to how large we are. The principal thing I care for is what we are and what we are trying to do and become.

Let me speak somewhat out of my own experience as to the things that stand in the way of our rapid denominational growth. As I look over the world at other churches, at the general condition of society, I note that one thing that keeps people by the thousands in the old churches is the force of inertia, of tradition, of habit. There are thousands on thousands of people who, if they should wake up and do a little thinking, would come to us; but they drift by the simple force of habit and inheritance. The great majority of people—and this is true of Unitarians also, I am afraid—simply inherit their religion, as they do their politics or the color of their hair. Nine-tenths of the men I meet are Republicans or Democrats because their fathers were. Chauncey Depew said four or five years ago that he did not believe there were four hundred men in New York who did any political thinking. I suppose the number of men who do religious thinking on their own account is very small. So the majority of people drift.

Again there are large numbers of people who are in the other churches because it is a matter of personal self-interest. Let our cause once be popular and fashionable, and people will crowd and flock to us, to use the old Scripture words, "like doves to their windows."

Let me give you an illustration. I have a letter which, if published and the authorship given, would create a sensation. It is from an ex-governor of one of our States. He says that he is practically a Unitarian, but the reason he does not attend Unitarian service and support it is because it would kill him politically. He adds that he wishes me to know that fact, for it unburdens his conscience; and he believes there are many others similarly situated. He closes by saying, "I ought to call this the confession of a hypocrite."

I know places in this country where, when a new family moves in, they are waited upon by people of other churches, and are told that it will be for their interest in business to have nothing to do with Unitarians. I had a letter from the South-west, rejoicing in the principles of Unitarianism, and stating that the writer would like to help establish a Unitarian church in that place, but it would be fatal to all his business prospects to be known to cherish Unitarian ideas.

This condition of things is true of large parts of the country.

Then thousands are held where they are by their feelings and friendships. I have been told by many persons that they were really Unitarian, but it would break the heart of father or mother or intimate friend to have it known. A lady in this city, hearing one of the addresses since this Conference began, told a friend of mine that she agreed perfectly with what had been said. She is an Episcopalian, and, when asked why she did not leave the Episcopalian Church, replied that she was bound to it by social ties, and could not leave it. There are thousands of people in this country who are in the old churches because of social relations. It has been a matter of tradition with them, and they do not find it easy to break away. In other words, the conviction of what they ought to do is not strong enough to set them free from these other ties.

Then I have found a large number in my own experience who are held in the old faith by the force of fear. Five or six years ago I was talking with one of the most intelligent women I ever met. She had attended a Congregational church in Boston all her life. She said she would give the world if she dared to believe as I do, but she had been trained from a child to believe that there is a certain kind of God in heaven ruling this universe; and she said, "If he is that kind of a God, I am afraid of him." I had an old man come to Boston from the western part of Massachusetts on purpose to talk over this matter with me, and it was one of the most pitiful cases I ever knew. He said: "I was trained in the old Calvinism of Edwards, and I suppose it has become part of the fibre of my brain. When I was a young man, I fought against it, and thought I had outgrown it; but now it is sweeping over me again, and I am palsied with fear. I am afraid that that old doctrine may be true; and, if it is, I do not dare to die so long as I am defying it." He came to plead with me, if possible, to help him break his chains. I have had hundreds of cases like this; and I believe, if you could get at the secret thoughts of thousands of people, you would find they would be glad to break away from the old ideas if they dared.

I know what that means myself. I was trained in the old ideas; and I remember the first time I read a pamphlet in favor of universal salvation, and how my heart leaped to it. It was written by Dr. Belows. It seemed to me I would give the world to believe it; but I prayed against it, and I wept as I prayed, lest it was a temptation of the devil. I feared not only for myself, but lest I might endanger the souls of others.

There are, then, many things that prevent the rapid growth of Unitarian ideas. Some think because our gospel is so simple people ought to leap to the acceptance of it. But simplicity in art, simplicity in literature, simplicity in music, simplicity in dress, is the result of the highest culture. It is not simplicity which common people, who have not thought much, care about.

But there is one thing which stands more than anything else in the way of organizing Unitarian churches, and that is the real growth of Unitarianism. On the way from Boston to Washington I have been reading a book written by Rev. George A. Gordon of the Old South Church. I spoke of it to a friend in Philadelphia, and he exclaimed: "Liberalism in the Old South Church! When I was a boy in Boston, we used to make matches by picking up sticks on the street, and poking them into the keyhole of the Old South Church to get the brimstone on them." [Laughter.] In this intensely interesting book there is not a single shred of the old faith left except a belief in the supernatural character of Jesus. The book is frankly Universalist in regard to the next world. The writer says that the scheme of Orthodoxy which has been held and taught leads necessarily and logically to atheism; and, if the Christian Church is going to be saved as a force in

FOR WEDDING PRESENTS. SATSUMA AND CLOISONNÉ.

We have now in an importation of genuine Cloisonné and Satsuma by steamship "Gaelic," from Yokohama, via San Francisco, including superb specimens found by one of our buyers there this season.

Cloisonné pieces, like Bronzes, are among the imperishable treasures; and visitors will find an extensive exhibit to choose from.

By ship "Sachem," from Hong Kong, we are landing an importation (116 packages) of the genuine Old Blue Canton Chinaware, including Dinner Sets, which may be had in sets or separate pieces, as desired.

The Medallion Canton China in full services or separate pieces, also the Old Blue Nankin China.

Also large Palm Pots, Cuspadores, Vases, Vestibule Seats, Umbrella Holders, etc.

Superb specimens of Cut Glassware, China, and Lamps adapted to wedding and complimentary gifts to be seen in the Art Pottery Rooms, the Glass Department, and the Lamp Gallery. Never before was our stock larger, more valuable, and comprehensive than now.

Jones, McDuffee & Stratton,
CHINA, GLASS, and LAMPS,
120 FRANKLIN.

the nineteenth century, it has got to get rid of all that. Most of the people who attend that old church would feel no sort of necessity of going to hear Mr. Van Ness in the same square, or to Dr. Hale's, to get liberalism. They get all they want at home. It is a popular boast, "Our minister is so liberal that we don't need to go anywhere else to get Unitarian ideas." This is true so often that it stands in the way of organizing Unitarian churches. People get their liberalism without the necessity of paying for it by independence and courage.

But, as we look forward, this obstacle is to be regarded as one of the most hopeful successes. The old churches look like fortresses that we need to capture; but, when you get inside, you find they are manned by those who are really our friends. When I look at conditions like this, I sometimes think of the iceberg on its journey from Greenland to the equator. When it first breaks off from the glacier, it is blue, solid, hard as rock. But it begins to float and drift, the sun shines upon it, the airs play around it, the waves beat against its side, and by and by it gets away to the south into warmer seas and more tropical airs; and, though it looks just as solid, just as blue, just as hard, as when it first started on its journey, if you examine it carefully, it is only a shell of its former self. It is honey-combed through and through; and by and by the time comes when something strikes against it, and it topples over and disappears forever.

I believe that these solid-looking orthodoxies that are around us on every hand are being played upon by the spirit of the age, by the forces that surround them, and, though they look as solid and defiant as ever, that we shall seek for them some morning, and the sunny waves of the blue sea will be rolling over where they were, and the blue sky will be overhead, and we shall look in vain for them on the wide ocean of human life.

What is in our favor? We ought to be ashamed to be in the slightest degree discouraged or troubled, for everything is in our favor. The stars in their courses are fighting for us. All the recognized science of the world is in our favor, all the recognized historical criticism, the history of the origin and growth of religions, all scholarly Scriptural criticism,—all these things are in our favor. The growth of civilization, the increasing tenderness of the human heart that refuses to bear any longer the burden of the old cruel creeds,—all these things are in our favor. It does not make any difference how long we have to wait. I feel as certain of the victory of our ideas as Galileo felt of the victory of the Copernican system when he caught sight for the first time of the moons of Jupiter. When he first saw those moons, the Ptolemaic system ruled all Europe. It was entrenched in every university. The pope supported it, everybody believed it. But the minute that Galileo saw the moons of Jupiter, that moment the Ptolemaic system was dead. It was merely a matter of growth, of time for the people to find out the facts. God's great facts were inconsistent with the Ptolemaic system,—facts which had been discovered by a few lonely scholars. So all the great truths of the world are in our favor. It does not make any difference if the old beliefs in their outward form last another thousand years. The future of humanity,—I will not say belongs to Unitarianism, for that name may be changed, though I hope not, for it is a magnificent name,—but the future of humanity is bound up with the ideas which we represent.

In order that we may help on this victory,—a victory which enslaves nobody, but only sets free,—what are we to do?

We must get over the easy-going optimism which believes the world will go just right, whether we do anything about it or not. We must come into possession ourselves of great, earnest convictions. How many of you have a conviction? I have met a great many people who supposed they had them, but, when I investigated, I found that they had inherited opinions, beliefs, traditions, prejudices; but, even with a microscope, you could not discover a conviction about them. A conviction means something of which you have become convinced. It implies study, thought, pondering on problems, making up your mind which way the work of God would lead you, and which way you ought to go. We are not worth a straw in the kingdom of God until we are informed and animated by the spirit, and moved by conviction. I would rather have six Unitarians armed with convictions than a mob of them who had only prejudices and inherited notions. Some Unitarians seem to think that they are like men who belong to a club when they unite with a religious society. They think they have paid for their pews, and will drop in when they feel like it. I have attended within twenty-one years the funerals of hundreds of Unitarians of this kind, who paid no attention to religious services during their life, but felt they must be buried by a Unitarian minister; and there is nothing in which I take more satisfaction than in burying such people. I wish I could attend the funerals of all of them at one time. Unitarianism would be the stronger for it. I don't know how you feel about it; but, if I could get along all my life without a church and without a minister, I would "play a lone hand" all through. I would never ask a man whom I had never helped when I was alive to say a few words over my body. I would take my chances without them. The only kind of Unitarians worth our having are those who are Unitarians every day in the week; who on stormy Sundays, as well as fair ones, are to be found wherever there is anything to be done; who, wherever there is a cause to be pleaded for or a battle to be fought, are to be counted on. They are the only kind of Unitarians that give strength to the cause. The man who says to me, patronizingly, that he thought he would drop into my church, I do not care to see there. I want people who believe that this church comes nearer to representing the truth of God than any other that the sun shines on, and who are willing to help fight for the principles for which this church stands.

We have at last succeeded in organizing a church to which Mr. Lincoln, were he living, would be glad to come. The story is told in Carpenter's "Six Months at the White House" that, in discussing these matters, Mr. Lincoln one day said, "If the time ever comes when there is a church organized on the simple basis of the ten commandments, love to God, and love to man, I shall be glad to join that church." Here it is! After thirty years of struggle the Unitarian Church has at last come to the consciousness that what it has been about all the time was trying to define itself as the Church of love to God and love to man. Let us, then, proclaim all over this country that here at last is organized Mr. Lincoln's religion,—a religion grand enough to appeal to the mightiest leadership that this country has ever developed, grand enough to bow in reverence the most magnificent head that has ever been raised among the American people. This is the religion for which we stand, and to which we are to consecrate ourselves.

Study the history of the early Church, and you will note that three or four or a dozen men and women who were touched by the enthusiasm of the new life, who believed in God and were filled by the new spirit, got together in an upper chamber or in a private house, no matter where, and determined that they would help each other live this life, and spread the holy contagion through the community. They were a church, but they did not have any meeting-house. The trouble with us is that we are haunted by a fatal, pestilential heresy that we have got to have a meeting-house before we can have a church. Did you ever notice God's method in the natural world? He does not create a shell, and then try to coax a shell-fish to get into it. He creates a centre of life; and, as it grows, it secretes its own shell. If people would go about it, we might have five hundred new churches, centres of religious life, religious inspiration, religious enthusiasm, religious power, within the next year. It is the people who make a church, not the building they meet in. The church is an organization of people ready to work together in the love of God. I believe Unitarianism will never be much of a power until it shall take hold of the brain and the hearts and the consciences of men and women who have come together in their little circles to say, Let us work together for the coming of the kingdom of God. When they do that, when you get the life, God will take care of the business of creating the shell.

Let us not, then, keep still while we speculate as to what the outlook is or ought to be. Let us go to work and take possession of the outlook, and make it a forward movement for the life of God among men.

The Sunday School.

New editions are just out of "Noble Lives and Noble Deeds," Toy's "History of the Religion of Israel," and Dole's "Questions for Bible Study, No. 4: The Bible Men and Women."

The usual Channing Hall "Talk" will be held next Saturday, November 9, at 25 Beacon Street, at 2.30 P.M., conducted by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. The subject treated will be Lesson IX., "The Pharisee and the Publican." All cordially invited.

Bound copies of Every Other Sunday, Vol. X., are now ready. Price 75 cents a volume. These collected numbers for the last year form a large resource of stories, anecdotes, and reading material for the young, of high order. Nothing better could be put into the hands of children for their amusement and edification. Orders can be sent to the Unitarian Sunday School Society, 25 Beacon Street.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

BOSTON.—Ministers' Monday Club: November 11, 10.30 A.M. Rev. George T. Hosmer will preside. Rev. William R. Alger will give the essay on "The Historic Development of the Practice and the Theory of Prayer." The public invited.

South Congregational Church: The "Class in Good Citizenship," organized two years ago, will resume its meetings on Sunday next, November 10. Names will then be taken for the class of persons who wish to attend regularly. It is hardly desirable for any person to attend who cannot be present at least as often as two meetings out of three. The work for the first month will be upon the subject, "The State and its Dependents." The conversation on successive Sundays will be conducted by Col. Stone of the Bureau of Charities, by Dr. Woodbury, and by Mr. F. G. Pettigrove. For succeeding months the subjects proposed are: December, "The Citizen before the Courts"; January, "The Citizen and the Legislature"; February, "The Relief of the Poor by Private Organizations."

ATLANTA, GA.—"Unitarian Women's Day" at the Atlanta Exposition is finally and definitely set for the 18th of November in the afternoon. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe preached to an overflowing church on the morning of Sunday, November 3, at the Church of Our Father; and in the evening Mrs. Emily A. Field addressed also a full church on the subject "The Work of our Women in the Churches."

BROOKLINE, MASS.—Rev. George W. Cutter of Newport, R.I., will preach in the First Parish Church next Sunday, November 10.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.—The first of a series of three "Forward Movement" meetings was held in Brooklyn on Sunday evening, November 3, at the Aurora Grata Cathedral. It proved to be a genuine Unitarian revival. Fully twelve hundred persons, occupying all the seats and every available foot of standing room, were present; and several hundred more were turned away from the door, unable to find room within. As was hoped and expected, fully three-fourths of the audience were strangers to the Unitarian churches of the city. Their interest in the programme from the beginning to the end was evident. The service opened with excellent choir singing and an invocation by Rev. D. W. Morehouse, secretary of the Middle States Conference, under whose auspices the meetings are being held. The Scripture reading was by Rev. Charles H. Porter, Jr., the prayer by Rev. Stephen H. Camp. The speakers of the evening were Rev. Samuel A. Eliot of the First Church, Brooklyn, Rev. John W. Chadwick of the Second Church, Brooklyn, and Rev. Minot J. Savage of Boston. Each spoke for about twenty minutes, and never more earnestly and convincingly. The full programme of this and the succeeding meetings is given below. By an admirable arrangement the sermons at the morning services of the three Brooklyn Unitarian churches on the days of the meetings are to be preached on the same subject, so that, no matter which of the churches is attended, the same line of thought will be presented. Even the stanchest Unitarian present at the first meeting was stirred and aroused by the eloquence of the speakers, as they set forth anew, in ringing terms, the great affirmations of the liberal faith. A revival of this sort cannot fail to do good to those within the fold as well as to those still unchurched. Programme of "Forward Movement" meetings: Sunday, November 3, morning,—subject, "Unitarianism: A Constructive Faith." Preachers: First Church, at 11 A.M., Rev. Minot J. Savage of Boston; Second Church, at 11 A.M., Rev. John W. Chadwick; Third Church, at 10.30 A.M., Rev. Stephen H. Camp. Evening: public meeting in Aurora Grata Cathedral, Bedford Avenue and Madison Street, at 7.45 P.M. Subject, "The Forward Movement in Religion that is needed to-day": (1) "It must be away from the Old Dogmatic Systems," Rev. Samuel A. Eliot; (2) "It must be along Lines that are Consistent with Modern Knowledge," Rev. John W. Chadwick; (3) "We affirm that Unitarianism is such a Movement," Rev. Minot J. Savage of Boston, Mass. Sunday, November 10, morning,—subject, "Unitarianism: A Proclamation of Intellectual Honesty." Preachers: First Church, at 11 A.M., Rev. Samuel A. Eliot; Second Church, at 11 A.M., Rev. Samuel M. Crothers of Cambridge; Third Church, at 10.30 A.M., Rev. Stephen H. Camp. Evening: public meeting in Aurora Grata Cathedral, Bedford Avenue and Madison Street, at 7.45 P.M. Subject, "The Religious Situation To-day: What Influences have brought it about?" (1) "The Higher Criticism," Rev. Edward Hale of Orange, N.J.; (2) "The Liberalizing Influences of Modern Literature and the Scientific Spirit," Rev. Merle St. C. Wright of New York; (3) "The Broadening Influences of the Modern Humanitarian Spirit," Rev. Samuel M. Crothers of Cambridge, Mass. Sunday, November 17, morning,—subject, "Unitarianism and Christian Unity." Preachers, the ministers of the churches. Evening: public meeting in Aurora Grata Cathedral, Bedford Avenue and Madison Street, at 7.45 P.M. Subject, "Unitarianism, the Religion of Jesus as summed up in Love to God and Love to Man": (1) "The Teachings of Jesus and the Unitarian Gospel: Their Identical Character," Rev. Stephen H. Camp; (2) "Their Undogmatic and Practical Character, and their Application to the State," Mr. George W. Stone of Boston, Mass.; (3) "This is the True Religion for all Mankind and for all Time," Rev. Robert Collyer of New York.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—Rev. John W. Chadwick of Brooklyn will preach in the First Church November 10.

CHARLESTOWN, N.H.—The following is the inscription on a tablet placed in the Unitarian church last week: "In loving

CHRISTMAS CANTATAS FOR CHILDREN

"Tables Turned; or, A Christmas for Santa Claus."

By Misses Emerson and Brown. Santa Claus gets tired of his Christmas duties, so all the children in the world give him a Christmas of his own. Full of humor, pretty dialogue, and charming music. There is a beautiful tableau of the Christmas star. Eleven characters and choruses.

30 Cents, Postpaid.

"The Revolt of the Toys."

By H. W. Hart. A certain small boy has broken and abused his toys so badly that with Santa Claus's permission they rise in revolt on Christmas Eve and prepare to take vengeance, from which the small boy has a narrow and exciting escape. The cantata is unusually clever and laughable throughout, and the music is very pretty. Ten characters and chorus.

20 Cents, Postpaid.

"Jingle Bells."

By Mr. and Mrs. Lewis. Mrs. Santa Claus and the children insist on accompanying Santa Claus on his famous Christmas Eve journey, and have some very mirthful experiences, which end in a distribution of presents to the audience. Ten characters. Beautiful songs and choruses.

30 Cents, Postpaid.

"Good Tidings; or, The Sailor-boys' Christmas."

By Rosabel. The belated ship, "Jane," arrives home on Christmas Eve; and a Christmas festival is held in honor of the sailor-boys. Each sailor gives a description of Christmas in some foreign land, and there is much entertaining dialogue and many pretty songs. Nine characters and chorus.

25 Cents, Postpaid.

If you are interested in Cantatas of any sort, grave or gay, short or long, for young people or grown-ups, send for our Complete Catalogue of Cantatas and Operettas. Free on request. Any Cantata published in America or abroad can be procured of us at shortest notice and lowest cost.

Liberal discounts on all Cantatas by the dozen and to Schools and Sunday-schools.

Oliver Ditson Company

453-463 Washington St., Boston
C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

memory of Eliza Wetherbe Gage, born Aug. 25, A.D. 1829, died Nov. 28, A.D. 1894. Generous in affectionate sympathy, a sincere and devout worshipper, the welfare of this church lay near her heart. She lived the faith she loved, a persuasive witness of its beauty and gladness. Her presence was a benediction: her memory is precious."

GOUVERNEUR, N. Y.—The Liberal Religious Society organized last May has arranged for free platform meetings November 6 and 7, in order to promote a better comprehension of Unitarian principles. In these Rev. S. R. Calthrop, Rev. D. W. Morehouse, Rev. Thomas R. Slicer, and Rev. W. M. Brundage will speak about the religious situation to-day, the duty of liberals in religion, and the distinctive Unitarian affirmations.

HYDE PARK, MASS.—A harvest festival was held in the First Unitarian Church last Sunday evening under the auspices of the Sunday-school. A large congregation was in attendance. There was special music by the choir, and an offertory by Violinist Arnetz. The children gave recitations, and Miss Kate Brown addressed the little folk. The pastor spoke in place of Mr. Horton, who was detained by illness. The church was very prettily decorated with autumn leaves, fruits, and vegetables.

NEEDHAM, MASS.—The First Parish gave a reception on Friday evening, November 1, to Rev. and Mrs. P. S. Thacher, who had just returned from their wedding trip to Washington. The chapel and parlor were prettily decorated with palms, vines, and white chrysanthemums. A beautiful clock and several pieces of silver were the gift of the parishioners. A large company was present, including Rev. S. W. Bush, the former pastor, and the pastors of the Congregational and Baptist churches.

NEW YORK.—On Friday, November 1, the first regular meeting of the New York League of Unitarian Women was held at the Church of the Messiah. The subject, the speakers, and the beautiful weather combined brought together a large audience. The programme announced the meeting as "Unitarian Day." The three speakers were Mrs. Hannah Priestly Catlin of Eastport, Me., Mrs. Goodwin of Alabama, and Rev. Mary A. Safford of Sioux City, Ia. Mrs. Goodwin told in an exceedingly interesting way how she came out of Orthodoxy, and of her conversion to Unitarianism through the Post-office Mission. Miss Safford preached a short sermon on growth through conflict, and Mrs. Catlin spoke on how Unitarian women can do efficient missionary work. The usual lunch and social hour followed at the close of the meeting.

PEPPERELL, MASS.—On October 30 the old church in Pepperell was bright within to match the glorious autumn sunshine outside. The occasion was the ordination of Miss Emeline Harrington, lately of Meadville, to be minister of the Unitarian church. Mr. Shaw of Ashby and Mr. Young of Groton assisted in the opening and closing services. Mr. Dole of Jamaica Plain began his sermon on "The Presence of God" with the beautiful words recently published in the Christian Register from Mr. Mozoomdar in India: "The everlasting snows are overhead. In front of me the deep, dark forests are around, and enshrined in my heart the adorable Spirit of God, to meditate upon whose glory is the privilege and joy of my existence." Prof. A. W. Jackson, Miss Harrington's teacher at Meadville, made the very earnest ordaining prayer. Mr. George G. Tarbell gave the hearty word of welcome in behalf of the parish. The two newly ordained classmates of the new minister, Mr. and Mrs. Boynton of Roslindale, followed with friendly words of charge and fellowship; and Mr. White of Ware told the people how good he knew that they were, and what constant church-goers he expected the men in particular to become. The exercises were all the more hearty and unconventional in that none of the parts were read. The presence of the venerable Dr. Babbidge, whose long usefulness was referred to more than once, was a marked feature of the occasion. A large choir of young people led the music. After the services were over, the ladies of the parish—a loyal and generous company—fed the hungry in the parish rooms. All looks auspicious for the new ministry.

TRENTON, N. Y.—This historic church (the oldest Unitarian church in the State of New York) still keeps the fires of a liberal gospel burning on its altars. An effort is being made to raise the amount necessary for a parish house. A neat two-story wooden building is very much needed, with parlors, kitchen, and boys' club-room on the first floor, and a suitable hall for lectures and entertainments on the second. Such a building would cost two thousand dollars. Of this amount about eleven hundred has been contributed by friends of the church. The pastor, Rev. Edward Foster Temple, would be glad to receive good-will offerings from other friends of the Trenton church, to whom our wants have not yet been made known. Isolated Unitarians, too, who have no home church to support, could do good by sending a mite to this worthy project. The Trenton church is the only liberal Christian church between Utica and Canton, and it is capable of influencing a vast territory. Rev. Mr. Temple will gladly acknowledge gifts, however small.

WEST DEDHAM.—Rev. Obed Eldridge has been obliged to give up all work for a while. Rev. George Hill of Norwood will supply his pulpit for the present.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of the Children's Mission, June to November, 1895, for current expenses:—

Sunday-school, South Congregational Society, Boston.....	$35.00
Sunday-school, Unitarian Society, South Hingham, $7.80; Golden Rule Circle of King's Daughters, Easter offering, $5.00..	12.80
Sunday-school, Unitarian Society, Hartford, Conn.....	6.50
Sunday-school, Unitarian Society, Dublin, N.H.....	2.30
Sunday-school, First Parish, Cambridge, in mite-boxes.....	21.84
Sunday-school, First Church, Wayland.....	2.17
Sunday-school, Unitarian Society, Petersham	6.50
Sunday-school, First Parish, Concord, Mass.	43.31
Sunday-school, East Church, Salem, Miss A. E. Lovejoy's class, $3.03; Miss A. L. Lovejoy's class, $1.50.....	4.53
Sunday-school, First Congregational Society, W. Bridgewater.....	4.75
Sunday-school, First Congregational Parish, Milton, from mite-boxes.....	17.00
Sunday-school, First Parish, Beverly.....	50.00
Sunday-school, Unitarian Society, West Newton, in mite-boxes, $64.96; Easter offering, $23.60.....	88.56
From a sale held by Misses Martha Hinman and Ethel Richardson at Roslindale.....	5.00
A Friend.....	1.00
Mrs. Eliot Stoddard.....	10.00
Mrs. Eliot Hubbard.....	25.00
Mrs. A. L. Hollingsworth.....	25.00
Mrs. J. W. Winckley, for life membership.....	20.00
Proceeds of an entertainment given by children in Kingston.....	3.00
Sunday school, A. S. Church, Roxbury.....	47.43
Howard Sunday-school.....	16.00
	$447 69

H. PICKERING, Treasurer.

Mr. C. W. Jones, 215 Federal Street, will act as Treasurer of the Children's Mission during the absence of Mr. H. Pickering.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of the American Unitarian Association:—

Aug. 6. Miss R. Butler, Stockbridge.....	$100.00
6. Society in Billerica.....	126.75
6. Mrs. Mary A. Fitch, Erie, Penn.....	5.00
9. Society in Oklahoma City, O. T.....	5.00
16. E. W. Emery, Waterbury, Conn.....	1.00
Sept. 5. Mrs. Mary T. Porter, Apalachicola, Fla.....	5.00
7. S. H. Howe, Marlboro.....	100.00
7. Nora Church, Brown County, Minn.....	12.50
10. Miss Mary Grew, Philadelphia, Penn.....	10.00
10. Society in Lawrence, on account.....	10.00
16. Oakes A. Ames, North Easton.....	500.00
16. Society in Barnstable.....	37.02
25. Third Congregational Society, Hingham.....	106.05
26. Frederick Grinnell, New Bedford.....	50.00
27. Ladies' Aid Society, Camden, N.J.....	26.25
30. Third Congregational Society, Hingham, additional.....	2.00
Oct. 1. Friend in Aurora, N.Y.....	50.00
2. Sophie A. Titcomb, Rockland, Me.....	1.00
3. Bequest of the late Miss Sophie J. Snow, of Brunswick, Me.....	5,000.00
5. British and Foreign Unitarian Association, for Japan Mission (£50).....	243.00
5. Ladies' Aid Society, Canton City, Col.....	5.00
14. Unitarian Ladies' Guild, Greenwood, W.I.....	2.50
15. Helen Condon, Branchester, N.H.....	10.00
16. Anonymous gift, to be invested and called the Whitney Fund.....	25,000.00
17. Miss F. H. Curtis, Jamaica Plain.....	5.00
19. Miss Olive Bagley, Detroit, Mich.....	30.00
22. Society in Wilmington, Del.....	100.00
23. Society in Madison, Wis.....	50.00
24. Mrs. William Gore, Freeport, Me., on account of life membership.....	10.00
25. Mrs. Frances A. Hackley, Tarrytown, N.Y.....	5,000.00
29. Grace Chapel Society, Marshfield.....	20.00
29. Society in Belmont, on account.....	60.00

INDIAN SCHOOL, ETC.

Aug. 6. Mrs. Mary A. Fitch, Erie, Penn., for Tuskegee Normal Institute.....	5.00
Oct. 4. Friends in Littleton.....	15.00
10. Women's National Alliance.....	51.00
31. Friends in Littleton, additional.....	1.00

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

Spiritual Life.

There is generally no such thing as duty to the people who do it. They simply take life as it comes, meeting, not shrinking its demands, whether pleasant or unpleasant; and that is pretty much all there is to it.—Gail Hamilton.

I do believe the common man's task is the hardest. The hero has the hero's aspiration that lifts him to his labor. All great duties are easier than the little ones, though they cost far more blood and agony.—Phillips Brooks.

Some say that the age of chivalry is past. The age of chivalry is never past as long as there is a wrong left unredressed on earth, and a man left to say, "I will redress that wrong or spend my life in the attempt." Charles Kingsley.

Duty is the command of our highest nature or highest self, bidding us, in scorn of transient consequences, acting as if we belonged not to ourselves, but to a universal system or order, to render unconditional obedience to the highest law or highest measure of values that we are conscious of. W. L. Sheldon.

We are never more discontented with others than when we are discontented with ourselves. The consciousness of wrongdoing makes us irritable; and our heart in its cunning quarrels with what is outside it, in order that it may deafen the clamor within.—Amiel.

The real measure of the religious spirit in a man is not, as so many mediaeval teachers believed, absorption in devotions and continual consciousness of sin: it is rather the keenness and completeness of one's consciousness of the presence of God in all things, and of the revelation of God through all things.—The Outlook.

Literature.

THE STORY OF THE OTHER WISE MAN. By Henry Van Dyke. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers.—This is a beautiful Eastern story, full of elevated thought and word pictures. It breathes the spirit of the desert, and is alive with vivid descriptions of events and scenery. The whole turns on the following outline. Artaban, of the ancient priesthood of the Magi, awaits the arising of Sosuch, the victorious one as prophesied in the Avesta. He had computed the time for the appearance of the star; and, turning his wealth into a sapphire, a ruby, and a pearl to offer to the king at his coming, he starts out to join the three Magians at Babylon, who wait for him ten days. As he is about to enter the city at the appointed time, he delays to aid a wounded man, and arrives too late. He gives his sapphire for a camel train, and crosses the desert on his way to Bethlehem, where he learns of his brethren's departure and the flight of the Holy Family into Egypt. Failing to find the Christ even after thirty-three years of wandering, he enters Jerusalem on the day of the crucifixion, and dies during the earthquake. The death scene at the close is full of pathos. As the young girl bent over him, there came a voice from the twilight, very small and still, like music sounding from a distance, in which the notes are clear, but the words are lost. At last a calm radiance of wonder and joy lighted the pale face of Artaban, like the first ray of dawn on a snowy mountain-peak. One long, last breath of relief exhaled gently from the lips. His journey was ended. His treasures were accepted. The "other wise man" had found the King. This volume, with its type and paper, fine thought, beautiful illustrations, and artistic taste, delights the eye.

A SINGULAR LIFE. By Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—This is one of many stories written in our time to show, as Browning says, "how very hard it is to be a Christian." But Miss Phelps's hero is not the socialist or semi-socialist of the ordinary novel written for the establishment of this thesis. He does not attempt to make the world over or to turn it upside down. He is simply a young man who is so progressive in his Orthodoxy that he is refused ordination after he has received a call. Whereupon he sets up a little Bethel of his own in a big fishing town where the saloons are many, and tries to save men from the immediate fiery hell of strong drink. He gets on well with the fishermen; but the saloon-keepers do not like his influence upon their trade, and at last they compass his destruction. The story is exceedingly pathetic, and one to fill many a clerical Sybarite with burning shame. That here and there it has the hectic flush which is generally a marked characteristic of Miss Phelps's work goes almost without saying. There is an old theological professor buried in his studies of Hoti and the enclitic De, and that sort of thing, who is immensely interesting, and relieves the strain of the intenser parts. It is very good and sweet to meet Miss Phelps again on her own ground, after such monstrous aberrations from it as "The Master Magician" and "Come Forth." Even if one should feel obliged to question the reality of certain particulars, the spirit of the book is absolutely good, it being that of one who went about in Palestine doing good a great many years ago.

BROWNING'S COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS. Cambridge Edition. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—The publishers have presented us in this one-volume edition of Browning's poems with a remarkable piece of book-making, which shows that unusual care must have been taken in its preparation from the beginning. The thought of crowding all the poems into a single volume seemed presumptuous, when it was first announced; and probably no one was prepared for a result so satisfactory as has been achieved. The book is no makeshift, adapted to poor students who could not afford the more expensive editions, but a convenience and pleasure even for him to whom Browning, like Emerson, became long ago one of the necessities of life, not a luxury. This octavo shows that a volume of over a thousand pages may be sewed in such a manner as to open easily and be held in the hand conveniently. The covers fall back naturally, the thin paper is opaque, the type is clear. So much may be said for the form. For the rest the volume is equipped with Mr. Scudder's biographical introduction, with helpful notes all the better for their brevity; and there is included not only the prose essay on Shelley, but various poetical fragments to be found in no other edition. In looking it over, we have happened on only one or two errors of proof-reading; and it is safe to say that the text is given with unusual accuracy.

AMERICAN CHARITIES. By Amos G. Warner, Ph.D. New York and Boston: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co. $1.75.—This study of philanthropy and economics is

The Mistress of a Small House

BY RUTH ASHMORE

Successfully keeping house with one maid: how a wife can do it. A practical article in the November

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

10 Cents on all News-stands

The Curtis Publishing Company
Philadelphia

written out of wide knowledge and extended practical experience. It is one of the "Library of Economics and Politics Series," edited by Richard T. Ely, and might profitably be put into the hands of every student and worker in these lines of social progress. The book is divided into four parts. The first of these is introductory and theoretical, studying the philanthropy and economics of the past, the causes of poverty and degeneration, and charity as a factor in human selection; later, studies the dependent classes in detail, analyzing the various methods of relief, and showing by many instances and carefully prepared tables what influences tend toward the permanent help of the unfortunate. His tone is always cheery and sane, even when discussing the most discouraging problems, and in this respect it is a needed encouragement to the growing army of workers for social reform. Besides that, its suggestions are eminently practical, so that altogether it is most valuable as a manual on this pressing important subject. Nothing better has appeared for use in the class-room or for definite study.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF NUMBER, AND ITS APPLICATIONS TO METHODS OF TEACHING ARITHMETIC. By James A. McLellan, A.M., LL.D., and John Dewey, Ph.D. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—This volume is one of the excellent "International Education Series" which have been marked throughout by a high order of learning and execution. Dr. W. T. Harris, the editor of the series, contributes a characteristic preface. The authors have presented in a thorough manner the psychological aspect of number. They are particularly opposed to the "fixed unit" method, the shortcomings of which are suggested by the editor as not leading toward the highest mathematics, but away from it. In the whole study of arithmetic, and indeed in every other branch of education in recent years, the teacher has had as much to learn as the pupil. In the multiplication of subjects in modern school life, where the demands are constantly made upon the time and strength of children, one solution of the difficulty is in better methods of teaching. In this volume arithmetic is presented in relation to the mental laws by which it is to be grasped. With the principles of this book thoroughly absorbed, the teacher is no longer a mechanic, and the pupil no longer a machine.

THE HERONS. By Helen Shipton. New York and London: Macmillan & Co.—This is a love-story pure and simple, but the love it celebrates is that of one brother for another. It is another rendering of the Prodigal Son, only in this parable the prodigal is the elder brother, and the younger anticipates the father's good will to him,—indeed, brings the father round, in which respect it agrees better with our traditional theology than does our New Testament parable. In short, it is the story of what a good brother can do in a discordant family. It should be said that there is also a love-story of the common sort interwoven with the other, but it is quite subordinate to the principal affair. In the closing chapter there is the sound of music and dancing: the smell of roasting veal pervades the happy air. However uncongenial such a conclusion may be to Mr. Howells, the book is a good book, and is particularly well suited to the older scholars in a Sunday-school and to young people generally, the more so as it was not written specially for these.

THE KANTER GIRLS. By Mary L. B. Branch. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.—Little girls who are fond of fairy stories will find much to interest them in the adventures of Prue and Janet, as related here and illustrated by Helen Maitland Armstrong. These sisters lived in one of those queer, delightful worlds known only in imaginative fiction, where anything may happen at any time, and the only thing one is sure about is that there will be no monotony in the happenings. They had all sorts of wonderful experiences with dryads, kobolds, and the like; while invisible rings helped them out of difficulties, obedient boats bore them down rivers flowing obligingly in either direction, and other strange things occurred which only the book itself can adequately explain. While it is not one of the best of fairy stories, yet it is fairly good.

AT WAR WITH PONTIAC. By Kirk Munroe. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. This story of frontier adventure will need no further recommendation to boys than its title and the author's name. In many respects it is really one of the best of his recent books; and the dread with which the ordinary reader (that is, anybody but a boy) approaches a story of Indian warfare is in this case almost needless, for Mr. Munroe has touched as lightly as possible on the inevitable horrors, and the adventures are quite legitimate with this subject. The totem of the bear, which is tattooed on the arm of the young hero, is the mysterious sign which saves him more than once from death. An element of comedy is supplied by one of his companions, who insists on travelling with his patent bath-tub, which plays an important part in the drama of danger and escape.

A MAN AND HIS WOMANKIND. By Nora Vynné. New York: Henry Holt & Co.—This little tale, in its tidy buckram suit and clear, beautiful print, has a real lesson for the reader, who will find it rather entertaining as well. It is pleasant to find a mother-in-law who is not the butt of senseless jests. The "man" in the case is not worthy of much respect till the last pages are reached, when he springs into one's respect at a bound. The "woman-kind" have many of the failings of woman-kind in general, but are lovable in spite of them all; though one does not quite like to have the heroine smoke cigarettes, even if she is a journalist.

AT TUXTER'S. By G. B. Burgin. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.—This is a bright and entertaining story, which moves along at a rapid pace, and introduces characters and scenes that are decidedly original. It describes life among poor people, though some of them attain wealth and honor before the close of the book. The first part, which narrates the adventures of two little waifs adopted separately into the same family, shows in some respects better work than the latter part, which is more ambitious and more sensational.

Literary Notes.

Mr. Edward Robins, Jr., author of "Echoes of the Playhouse," one of the noteworthy books of the season, is a nephew of Charles G. Leland ("Hans Breitmann") and a brother of Elizabeth Robins Pennell.

"Corruption," the new novel by Percy White, author of "Mr. Bailey-Martin," is said to offer a very striking and internal view of political and social life in London. It is to be published shortly by D. Appleton & Co.

The Arena for next year will contain papers each month from representative thinkers among our leading women on vital and fundamental issues which affect present-day life. The subject of women's enfranchisement will also be exhaustively discussed in a series of brilliant papers.

In view of the present interest in the Armenian atrocities and the effect of European intervention with the Turks, a special interest attaches to the stirring romance, "Djambek, the Georgian," translated from the German of A. G. von Suttner, and published by D. Appleton & Co. This is a tale of modern Turkey.

The publishers of Littell's Living Age announce a reduction in the price of that unique eclectic from eight dollars to six dollars a year, the change to take effect with the first of the new year. New subscribers, however, remitting before the first of January, will receive the intervening numbers of 1895 free. The Living Age is now nearing the close of its fifty-second year. It has ever been the faithful mirror of the times, and has received the commendations of the highest literary authorities.

Messrs. D. C. Heath & Co., Boston, are to publish this month a book called "Principles of International Law," which will embody the latest results of discussion and research, and present the subject in a fresh and readable form. Its author is Dr. Thomas J. Lawrence, who acted as Professor of International Law in the University of Chicago from its opening in 1892 till the close of 1893. Before that time he had lectured on the subject in the University of Cambridge, and his qualifications as a teacher are well known on both sides of the Atlantic.

Ginn & Co. announce the publication of a high school Botany by J. Y. Bergen, Jr. It embodies the main features of a course which has been gradually developed in their class-room work by the botany teachers of the Boston English High School. Structure and function are taught side by side. Much attention is given to observations and experiments by the pupil; but the work is all of such character that it can be done at the school desk or at home. The student's own observations are made to lead up to general statements and discussions of the structure, functions, life-history, and classification of plants.

Readers of "The House Beautiful," the bright and tender little book by Mr. Gannett, will be interested in the announcement of the work in a new form. New plates have been made, arranged for wide margins, making a book of sixty pages; and the volume is neatly bound in cloth with appropriate stamping. The thin editions, in paper, may still be had, the fifteen-cent style in plain, white cover, if preferred to the light, antique blue. The price of the cloth edition is fifty cents. Of the three styles ten thousand copies have thus far been printed. The publisher is James H. West, 174 High Street, Boston.

Books Received.

From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. In the Young World. By Edith M. Thomas. Price $1.50. This Goodly Frame, the Earth. Stray Impressions of Scenes, Incidents, and Persons in a Journey touching Japan, China, Egypt, Palestine, and Greece. By Francis Tiffany. From James H. West, Boston. The House Beautiful. By William C. Gannett. Price 50 cents. From Roberts Brothers, Boston. Margaret and her Friends, or Ten Conversations with Margaret Fuller. Reported by Caroline W. Healey. Price $1.50. The Helen Jackson Year Book. Selections by Harriet T. Perry. Price $1.50. From Estes & Lauriat, Boston. Victor Hugo's Letters to his Wife and Others. Translated by Nathan Haskell Dole. Price $1.50. From the Library Bureau, Boston. List of Books for Girls and Women and their Clubs. Edited by Augusta H. Leopoldt and George Hles. Price 50 cents in paper; $1.00 in cloth. From Ginn & Co., Boston. The Letter of James the Just. By M. Woolsey Stryker, LL.D. Money and Banking. Illustrated by American History. By Horace White. From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. Fact and Fancy. Humorous Poems. By Cupid Jones. Sesame and Lilies. By John Ruskin. Little Journeys to the Homes of Good Men and Great. By Elbert Hubbard. Tales of a Traveller. By Washington Irving. 2 vols. Buckthorne edition. From Macmillan & Co., New York. Stories from Virgil. By Rev. Alfred J. Church, M.A. Price 50 cents. Roman Days. Life in the Days of Cicero. Sketches drawn from his Letters and Speeches. By Rev. Alfred J. Church, M.A. Price 50 cents. The Stickit Minister. By S. R. Crockett. Price 50 cents. In the Smoke of War. A Story of Civil Strife. By Walter Raymond. Price $1.25. Considerations on Painting. Lectures given in the year 1893 at the Metropolitan Museum of New York. By John La Farge. Price $1.25. Casa Braccio. By F. Marion Crawford. 2 vols. Price $2.00. From Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York and London. Private Tinker, and Other Stories. By John Strange Winter. With frontispiece by W. A. McCullough. Price 50 cents. Stolen Souls. By William Le Queux. Illustrated by Louise L. Heustis. Price $1.00. Anne of Argyle, or Cavalier and Covenant. By George Eyre-Todd. Price $1.00. Rhymes and Roses. By Samuel Minturn Peck. Dead Man's Court. By Maurice H. Hervey. Illustrated by Frank M. Gregory. A White Baby. By James Welsh. Frontispiece by William A. McCullough. A Comedy in Spasms. By Iota. Illustrated by Izora C. Chandler. From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Echoes from the Sabine Farm. By Eugene and W. Roswell Martin Field. Price $2.00. The Unity of the Book of Genesis. By William Henry Green, D.D., LL.D. Price $3.00. Reflections and Comments. 1865-95. By Edwin Lawrence Godkin. Price $2.00. From E. P. Dutton & Co., New York. Farrar Year Book. Selections from the Writings of the Rev. F. W. Farrar, D.D. By W. M. L. Jay. Price $1.25. The Witness of Denial. By Vida D. Scudder, A.M. From the Century Company, New York. The Second Jungle Book. By Rudyard Kipling. From D. Appleton & Co., New York. The Chronicles of Count Antonio. By Anthony Hope. From Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York. Practical Christian Sociology. By Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, Ph.D. With an introduction by Joseph Cook, LL.D. Price $1.50. From the Open Court Publishing Company, Chicago. The Prophets of Israel. By Carl Heinrich Cornhill. Translated by Sutton F. Corkran. Price $1.00.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. Consider the Lilies. Sacred Song. By A. F. Loud. I cannot Tell. Sacred Song for Contralto. By U. G. Burnap. My own Dear Home. For Soprano or Tenor. Words by Susan F. Henry. Music by Charles F. Scott. The Trolley Mall Gallop. By T. H. Rollinson. A New Year's Frolic. For the Pianoforte. By Fred. L. Morey. To the Lord our God. Tenor in E minor. By Alfred R. Gaul. They shall Hunger no more. Soprano and Contralto Duet. By Alfred R. Gaul. Come, ye Blessed. Contralto in G. By Alfred R. Gaul. My Soul is Athirst for God. Tenor in E. By Alfred R. Gaul. Oh taste, and see that the Lord is Good. Sacred Song. Alto in B-flat. Music by J. E. Trowbridge.

Just Published.

The Postulates of Revelation and of Ethics.

BY THOMAS HILL, D.D., LL.D.

Contents:

PART I, POSTULATES OF REVELATION.—I. The Unseen Real; II. The Reality of Knowledge; III. The Infinite Knowable; IV. Final Causes; V. The Universe a Work of Art; VI. Power and Possibility; VII. Logic and Love; VIII. Beauty; IX. The Testimony of Conscience; X. The Infinite in Man; XI. Relativity and Reality; XII. The Universe a Revelation; XIII. Authority and Inspiration; XIV. Summary of Natural Sources of Religious Knowledge. PART II, POSTULATES OF ETHICS.—I. The Field of Ethics; II. The Validity of Moral Perceptions; III. The Nature of Ethical Relations; IV. The Innocence and Sinfulness of Error; V. Love and Duty; VI. Determinism and Utility; VII. Duties Relative to Self; VIII. The Connection of Ethics with Religion; IX. Non-religious Morals and Moralists; X. Learning by Doing.

394 pages, with portrait, price $1.50.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

WANTED 5000 MORE BOOK AGENTS men and women, for the fastest selling book of the times DARKNESS & DAYLIGHT in NEW YORK With 250 full illustrations from flash-light photographs. Introduction By Rev. Lyman Abbott. A Christian woman's thrilling story of years of rescue work "In His Name," alive with intense interest, touching pathos, humor and story. Most splendidly illustrated. 86th thousand in press. Bishops, Ministers, etc., say "God speed it." Eminent women endorse it. It sells at sight, and pays Agents from $50. to $100. a month. We Pay Freight to all points, Give Credit, Extra Terms, Premium Copies, and Free Quitt. Write for terms and specimen engravings to HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Conn.

Popular Works.

Baltimore American.—There is a tranquil, strengthening, uplifting power in these little books that makes one cherish for them, when they have been enjoyed and laid aside, the warm, grateful sentiment with which we treasure dear friends.

"As Natural as Life."

Studies of the Inner Kingdom. By Charles G. Ames, Minister of the Church of the Disciples, Boston. 109 pages. "One of the most satisfying treatises we have ever read. The little volume is a spiritual poem, expressed in a human form called prose; but the beauty of its truth has root in the Infinite. It will prove a keen delight to the appreciative thinker."—Boston Ideas.

In Love with Love.

Four Life-Studies. By James H. West, author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," "Poems," etc. 109 pages. "There is something singularly fresh and strong in Mr. West's way of putting things. Any one of these studies read at night would sweeten a man's slumber, and waken him in the morning to some better sense of his great opportunity."—John W. Chadwick, in the Christian Register.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as related to the Inward Life. By Marion D. Shutter, D.D., author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. 111 pages. "One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful."—Philadelphia To-day.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, each 50 cents. Special gift edition, full gilt, each $1.00.

 For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid by JAMES H. WEST, Publisher, 174 High Street, - - - Boston.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS.

The Bible: Its Origin, Growth, and Character. pp. 300. G. P. Putnam's Sons, publishers. Price $1.50. The Liberal Ministry as a Calling. I. For Young Men. II. For Young Women. pp. 96. Geo. H. Ellis, publisher. Price 50 cents. One Upward Look Each Day. Poems of Faith and Hope. (Compilation.) Morocco, 75 cents; cloth, 50 cents; paper, 30 cents. Special edition in morocco, containing marriage certificate, 75 cents. What do Unitarians Believe? pp. 16. Ninetieth Thousand. Price, 10 cents a dozen; 75 cents a hundred. Unitarianism: Its History, Present Condition, and Prospects. pp. 16. Twenty-fifth Thousand. Price, 10 cents a dozen; 75 cents a hundred. Is the Bible Infallible? pp. 40. Tenth Thousand. Price, 5 cents a copy; $2.00 a hundred.

Mr. Sunderland's College Town Pulpit is necessarily suspended during his year abroad, but is to be resumed on his return. The next number may be expected in September, 1896. Back numbers (sermons for 1894-95) can be furnished to order. Subjects: 1. "The Soul's Cry for God"; 2. "Jesus as Humanity's Ideal"; 3. "Sectarianism: Its Causes and Cure"; 4. "The True Cross of Christ"; 5. "Was Jesus God? How did he come to be worshipped?"; 6. "Loyalty to Conviction"; 7. "Is Life a Blessing?"; 8. "Mr. Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible"; 9. "A Religion for a Republic"; 10. "The Surest Way of doing Good." Price per sermon, 5 cents.

 Any of the above publications may be obtained from the publishers, or by sending orders to Miss J. S. GREGG, Ann Arbor, Mich.

Lectures and Sermons

BY WILLIAM J. POTTER

With a Biographical Sketch

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Channing Auxiliary Calendar

FOR 1896.

RHYMES AND CHIMES.

The Poetry of Steeples, The Bell in the Belfry.

Beautifully printed in brown on Japanese paper. Boxed. Price $1.00, including postage. Address

CHANNING PUBLISHING COMMITTEE, 1300 Taylor Street, San Francisco.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.

THE SECRET KISS.

BY REBECCA PALFREY UTTER.

[From the German of Chamisso.]

That night we kissed, O maiden,
In the darkness still and deep,
The stars alone beheld us:
Sure they would our secret keep!

But one, from its place down gliding,
Fell into the restless sea;
And there, to a gossiping wavelet,
He whispered of me and thee.

The wave to the oar repeats it,
And the oar has told it to one
Who sang it in song to his sweetheart
Or ever the day was done.

And now the whole world knows it.
Alas for a chance like this!
They loudly sing in chorus
The song of our secret kiss.

For the Christian Register.

GUY FAWKES AND THE FIFTH OF NOVEMBER.

BY FRED MYRON COLBY.

If any of our readers had been in England on the morning of November 5, very likely they would be awakened by a chorus of voices singing some doggerel lines like the following:—

"Remember, remember,
The 5th of November:
Gunpowder, treason, and plot!
We know no reason
Why gunpowder treason
Should ever be forgot.
Hullo, boys! Hurrah!"

If they should look out into the streets, they would see a crowd of boys marching about, carrying an effigy dressed in rags; and, if they should follow this troop of merry-makers, they would arrive at the square, or common, where they would see a stake stuck in the ground, surrounded by straw and fagots. After a while this combustible material is lighted, and the image placed in the flames and burned, the people chanting all the while the above doggerel, or other words quite as appropriate.

In some of the English country towns the municipal authorities assist in this bonfire; and the festivities of the day are concluded by a great feast, at which patriotic speeches are made. Even in this country there used to be the same kind of a celebration; and in the times of Myles Standish and Gov. Winthrop the boys of Boston and Plymouth had their effigies of straw and their bonfires, and repeated the doggerel verses as they did in Old England.

As you may have a little curiosity to know what the effigy means, we will begin with that. It represents Guy Fawkes, or Vaux, who was one of the conspirators, engaged in the famous "Gunpowder Plot." This was a plan devised by the Catholics of England to destroy King James I. and the Parliament, so that they might have rule themselves. At least, this is the story usually told. But others think it was more a personal plot on the part of a few men to gratify their pique or disappointment than any real conspiracy with a political or moral significance. This is supported by the facts that James I. was himself a Catholic, and that nothing was ever proved against the two Jesuits who were arrested as being accessory to the plot.

Still, it must be remembered that all those who were engaged in the plot were ardent Romanists. Catesby and Percy, two gentlemen of fortune and ancient name, were the leaders. It is pretty hard to tell just what they meant to have done, had they succeeded in their atrocious plan, though the rising that was gotten up in Warwickshire by Percy was in the name of the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of the very king they intended to murder.

Guy Fawkes, whose sinister name is inseparably associated with the plot of which he was the most prominent partisan, was a soldier and adventurer, a man of the most desperate character. There is not much doubt about this. He is represented as a dark, Spanish-looking fellow, with a black beard and ferocious eyes. In some prints he is pictured as dressed in a padded doublet and baggy hose, big Spanish boots, flaring at the top, a wide-brimmed Flemish hat, with a large black feather in it, and armed with a blunderbuss, rapier, and a pair of pistols, which give him quite the look of a buccaneer of the Spanish main.

Fawkes was in Flanders; but, when Catesby sent for him, he came to England, and the plot at once took definite shape. Percy went to London with Fawkes as his servant, and hired a house close to the Parliament building, from the cellar of which they calculated to work a mine to the vaults under the two houses. Upon working four or five months upon this, they ascertained that the vaults were for rent; and Percy at once leased them for a storage-room, as he explained. Thirty-six barrels of gunpowder were conveyed into this apartment by the indefatigable Fawkes, from time to time; and the whole was covered over with wood and rubbish.

All was ready, when Parliament suddenly prorogued until Nov. 5, 1605. Of course there was nothing to do but wait, though the conspirators were very uneasy lest their plot should be found out. There were now about fifty of them who were engaged in the nefarious business, and the only wonder is that it was kept secret by so many.

They went on with their preparations, however, hiring a ship and keeping it ready on the Thames, in order that Fawkes might embark after he had fired with a slow match the train that was to explode the powder. They also arranged to have a hunting party at Dunchurch, in Warwickshire, on the fatal day, so that Catesby, Percy, Digby, Gresham, and all the leaders could ride through the country, and rouse the Catholics after the Parliament had been blown into the air.

The autumn days of 1605 rolled swiftly on; and the last of October had come, when nobles and commoners were going up to London for the session of Parliament, and Fawkes and some of the other conspirators went up, too, so as to be ready for their part in the dire business. There was to be no mistake this time, if they could help it. And, indeed, it was by the narrowest chance in the world that it came to be discovered.

One of the members, Lord Mounteagle, received a letter from an unknown personage (probably a friend who was among the conspirators), warning him against being present at the meeting of Parliament, and making all sorts of mysterious threats. So singular a missive aroused the lord's suspicions; and he carried it to Lord Salisbury, the Secretary of State, who read it to the king. What they made out of it was this,—that somebody had a project to blow up Parliament, which was pretty good guessing, upon the whole.

So a search was ordered to be instituted; and on the afternoon of November 4, only the day before the terrible deed was to be done, a party of soldiers entered the cellar. There they found Fawkes skulking about. When interrogated as to what he was there for, and what was stored there, he answered, boldly enough, that he was Mr. Percy's servant, and that he was watching his master's winter supply of fuel.

"A right sufficient quantity, I should say, too," said the commander of the soldiers, and went away without further investigation.

But they had seen enough to be pretty certain that something was wrong; and a warrant was accordingly issued for the arrest of Fawkes, or, as he called himself, Johnson. It was served by Sir Thomas Knevet that night.

The clock had just struck twelve, ushering in the 5th of November, when Fawkes, who had remained in the lone, darksome cellar, on going to the door, was seized by two soldiers with halberds in their hands. He was dressed with his boots and spurs on, ready to ride to the ship. In his pockets were a watch, slow matches, tinder, and touchwood; and behind the door was a dark lantern, with a lighted candle in it. And there, too, were the thirty-six barrels of gunpowder, which they pulled out from under the wood and timber. Evidence was too strong as to what Guy Fawkes meant to do for him to either lie or equivocate.

He was conducted directly to the king's bed-chamber; and James, who was a born coward, trembling all over and standing at a distance, asked Fawkes how he could have the heart to wish to kill so many innocent people. "Because desperate diseases require desperate remedies," answered that man of iron, who was as cool as though he had been lord mayor and King James himself the criminal.

And that was all they could get out of him; for he positively refused to name his accomplices, or give any knowledge beyond that of which the government was already possessed. He was carried to the Tower, where all State criminals were imprisoned. In January he had his trial, and on the 1st of February he and the other conspirators were executed for their wicked designs.

Most of those engaged in the plot were discovered by their own acts. The hunting party that had assembled on that bright autumn day broke up suddenly when they heard of the discovery of the plot, which was reported by a private messenger on the same day. But affairs had gone too far for them to disperse quietly to their homes like peaceable citizens. Besides, Catesby and Percy were as determined as ever to raise an insurrection against King James. Nobody, however, responded to their call. Even Catholics drove them indignantly from their doors, and, at last, being hotly pursued by the sheriff of Worcestershire, the large number of the conspirators took refuge in a strong manor house, where, in the assault that followed, several were killed, including Catesby and Percy. The others surrendered to the king's mercy, which was strict and stern justice this time. And this was the way the "Gunpowder Plot" ended, and this is the reason that the 5th of November has been kept ever since as a holiday by the boys of England.

KASSY'S BOOMERANG.

Strangers always said of Kassy Westbrook, "What a charming child!"

The remark was well deserved. She was exceedingly pretty and dainty and sweet-tempered. She was always unselfish and courteous, and ready to run her feet off in the service of her elder brothers and sister.

But the members of her family would one and all shrug their shoulders when Kassy's perfections were the theme. "Oh, yes," they would answer readily, "Kassy is a dear; but if you had to live with her!" What was the matter? Simply an absolutely untrustworthy memory for everything she was told to do. "Her outrageous and abominable forgetfulness," to quote Max, "was no end of a nuisance."

Rarely a day passed but she plunged somebody into trouble, and oftentimes no end of mortification, by regularly forgetting every message, errand, or letter she was intrusted with.

"I don't like to forget," she said, miserably, when she had forgotten a message given her on the street, thereby spoiling sister Rose's afternoon, disappointing two friends, and losing them all the flower-show. "I never mean to, and then I always go and do it."

"Go and don't do it, you mean," returned Wilfred. "Don't you ever remember, by mere chance?"

"There's no Edmund Sparkler about Kass," said Max.

"She never even 'stumbles into sense'; that is, memory."

"The trouble is, my dear," said papa, "that you do not pay attention. And attention, you know, is putting your mind on a point with a view to remembering it."

"I do put my mind on the point," returned Kassy. "I put it on so hard that the point sticks through; and then, of course, I can't remember."

"If Kassy ever gets a good, hard rap herself, as a consequence," said Wilfred, "perhaps she'll realize that it's not exactly pleasant to have one's plans for the day upset and business letters unposted. Somehow, she herself always escapes scot-free. I wish her forgetfulness was a boomerang arrangement."

Wilfred was still sore from the episode of an undelivered note at the house of a young lady, which seeming neglect had involved him in the appearance of much discourtesy.

"What's a boomerang?" questioned Kassy, with interest.

"A boomerang, my dear," answered her brother, "is a curved stick, which, on being thrown, travels for a distance in a horizontal line, and then most unexpectedly turns and comes whizzing back, more probably than not whacking the head of the thrower."

"Oh," said Kassy, "I'd willingly take a little whack, if it would help me to remember."

"You'll get a big one, some of these fine days," remarked Max, strolling off.

As fate would have it, Kassy's boomerang was nearer than she knew. She attended a private school, held at the residence of the principal. One Wednesday morning the maid brought to the recitation-room a note for Mrs. Westbrook, with "By favor of Kassy," written on it.

Kassy put it in her pocket. It might as well have gone into a coal mine, as far as its delivery was concerned; for she did not think of it again.

It chanced that she did not wear that particular dress again till the next Wednesday. In the course of the morning, putting her hand into her pocket, she brought up the note.

"Where did this come from?" she thought, bewildered. "Did somebody give it to me coming to school?" She could not recall it, but thought it must be so. With unusual wisdom she pinned it on her waist in plain sight, whence mamma rescued it later.

Her mother read the week-old note without suspicion, merely remarking to Rose that Mrs. Rallston wished Dr. Westbrook and herself to dine with them, very informally, that evening, to meet an unexpected guest, Mrs. Lynn, the well-known lecturer, who was giving her a flying visit.

Then, as Kassy left the room, she added:

"Mrs. Rallston says that she is going to have a little matinée company for Emily on Saturday, to see the 'Old Homestead,' and invites Kassy. She has been wild to see it, and I shall let her go. It is to be a surprise to the children, and they are only to know they are invited to luncheon."

The invitation was duly delivered to Kassy in its abbreviated form. A lunch with Emily Rallston always meant the height of bliss to her companions, for Mrs. Rallston was as perfect a hostess to her little daughter's guests as to her own. Therefore, Kassy was in wild spirits at the idea. Emily had a governess, so the children did not meet her at school.

That night Dr. and Mrs. Westbrook went to dine with Mrs. Rallston, as invited. They were often sent for in this informal way; for, though the Rallstons did not attend Dr. Westbrook's church, they had always been warm friends.

To the surprise of the family, it was only half-past eight when papa and mamma walked in upon their family circle.

Mrs. Westbrook had a very queer look on her face.

"No, no one is ill," she said, in answer to the chorus of inquiries. "Kassy, when was this note given you?"

"This morning, I think. Wasn't it this morning I brought it home?"

"It was certainly this morning you brought it home. Please think when it was given you."

"Honestly, mamma, I don't remember how it came in my pocket. I suppose some one gave it to me on my way to school, but I forget when. What's the matter, mamma?"

A Good Almanac

is one of the best books to have in the house for reference.

The Sunlight Almanac

for 1896 contains 480 pages, bound in crimson leatherette and stamped in gold (worth 50c.)

Given Free to users of Sunlight Soap

How to obtain them.

Commencing Nov., 1895, and until all are given out, purchasers of Sunlight Soap will receive one FREE from their grocer.

Contents.

A Complete Almanac, Tables, Directions for Home Management, Language of Flowers, Gardening, Games and Amusements, Dress-making and Fashions, Recipes, Dreams and their significance (page 330).

Sunlight Soap

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

"Wait a moment. Do you think somebody could have left it at school for you?"

"I can't remember,—yes, I do, too. But that's long ago, and"—Kassy stopped, suddenly crimson.

"Exactly. It was long ago. How long do you think?"

"Ever so long," faltered Kassy, more and more disturbed.

"Last week!"

"I—guess—it—was," said Kassy, very low.

"Then there was no dinner to-night?" cried Rose.

"Not at Mrs. Rallston's," answered Mrs. Westbrook. "Kassy, listen to what you have done. Mrs. Lynn, whom I was most anxious to meet, was with Mrs. Rallston for a day or two only, coming unexpectedly. So Mrs. Rallston hastily wrote a note, asking papa and myself, as you know, to dine there 'to-night,' dating the note simply 'Wednesday.' She added a few lines about which I will tell you presently. She had the note left with you, thinking that was the quickest way of reaching me. That is the way it got into your pocket."

Kassy was silent and scarlet. She remembered now the maid's coming into the class-room,—how long ago?

"That was Wednesday,—a week ago," went on mamma, relentlessly. "I suppose that you forgot it when you came home. How did you chance to remember it at last?"

"I found it in my pocket," answered Kassy, very miserable indeed.

"Why didn't you find it before?"

"I don't know,—yes, I do. I tore the ruffle; and Sarah did not mend it for ever so long, so I couldn't wear it till yesterday."

"That explains it. Last Wednesday—a week ago to-day—was the dinner. Only Mr. and Mrs. Campbell, besides ourselves, were invited. As we sent no word to the contrary, they expected us, and waited dinner an hour. Mrs. Lynn left the next day."

"To-night papa and I encountered Mr. and Mrs. Rallston at their door on their way out. Our mutual surprise was great; but, as they were invited out themselves, and the carriage was waiting, they could only stop a moment to explain."

"And the coincidence of the days of the week," put in Rose, "prevented your noticing it."

"Yes, of course. They had thought it strange we sent no word; but, knowing I had not been well, they thought it an oversight on my part. They regretted exceedingly their own engagement to-night; but, as it was, there was nothing to do but come away. So we went to the Brunswick for dinner."

Kassy lifted a very wretched face to her mother's, but she had not a word to say.

"So much, my dear, for the annoyance and disappointment you have caused us and others. Now for your side."

Kassy's distress visibly increased. What else was coming?

"Mrs. Rallston," pursued her mother, inexorably, "made up a little matinée party for Emily, last Saturday, to see the 'Old Homestead.' You know you were invited to lunch, and the theatre was a surprise. Well, the party came off last Saturday, and the children had a most delightful time. Mrs. Rallston made a charming affair of it. After the matinée the children were all taken to Delmonico's to dine, as a bit of grown-up pleasure. The note you forgot to deliver contained, you know, the invitation for you."

"O mamma!" as much utter misery as one word could hold went into that one.

The rector disapproved of the theatre for children, and Kassy had never been but once or twice in all her fourteen years. To see the "Old Homestead," as all her friends had done, was her dream of bliss. This, added to all the rest that she had missed, made her feel like the Peri at the gate of Paradise.

She succumbed to the pressure of the situation.

"O mamma," she sobbed, "it's too dreadful for anything. I can't bear it! To think I"—sob—"might"—sob—"have gone"—sob—sob—sob.

"This is a boomerang, and no mistake," said Wilfred, mischievously, though he really pitied his little sister. "Come, Kassy, take your whacking like a man. You'll know now how it is yourself."

"Make him stop, mamma," sobbed wretched Kassy. "I don't want to hear about boomerangs and things. I'm always sorry when I forget your things."

"Yes," assented teasing Wilfred, "it's easy to bear another man's misfortune like a Christian. I'm awfully sorry for you, youngster; and, if you'll promise not to forget the next time that I ask you to leave a note at Miss May's"—

But Kassy put her fingers into her ears, and retreated into the library, whither papa had long ago retired, in silent disgust.

Mamma followed her, and gathered her, still sobbing, into her arms, after a serious talk.

"Truly, mamma, I never did realize it before," she said; for she was an honest little soul. "But you see if I catch any more boomerangs, or throw any to hit other people!"

And, to do her justice, her improvement was wonderfully rapid. Six months later, on her birthday, teasing Wilfred presented her with a curious curved stick of hard wood, about twenty inches long, three inches wide, and half an inch thick.

"A boomerang, my dear," he announced. "Tie it up with dear little ribbons, as girls always do, and use it as memorabilia. You're getting to be as reliable as a district messenger boy. We can give you an errand now with forty-nine chances out of a hundred that it will be done."—Elizabeth Timlow, in the Churchman.

A TRUE STORY.

Little Mary had had a volume of Hans Andersen's fairy stories given her at Christmas. The story she liked best was "The Princess and the Pea"; for, like all little girls, little Mary had a natural desire to be a princess.

When she went to bed at night with her doll, little Mary would think to herself, "Oh, how beautiful to be a real princess of such very fine blood as to feel a little bit of a pea under twenty mattresses!"

One morning a comforting idea came to little Mary. "Who knows," she said to herself, "with all my very many great grandfathers and grandmothers, but p'raps I am related to some king or queen way back?"

Thereupon she went to her mother's pantry, and took a bean from the jar,—as large a one as she could find,—and, going to her room, put it carefully under the hair mattress. That night she went to bed happy, with joyful hopes.

In the morning little Mary's elder sister found her with her head buried in her pillow, crying. "Oh," little Mary sobbed, "I did think I might have just a little speck of royal blood in my veins, but I couldn't feel even that big bean under just one mattress!"

Nothing would comfort little Mary until her mamma explained to her that even princesses were not happy unless they had good hearts; and she could have, if she tried, just as good and royal a heart as any princess under the sun.—Little Men and Women.

THE FOUR APPLE-TREES.

Many years ago there was a man who wanted to have a beautiful orchard. So he sent for some young trees, knowing that he should not have to wait so long for his orchard if he planted trees which had already had a good start in growing. Unfortunately, however, the trees arrived just at the time when the man was obliged to leave home for several days. He was afraid that they would not live unless they were planted very soon, and yet he could not stay to attend to them. Just then a man came along who wanted work.

"Do you know how to set out fruit trees?" asked the owner.

"Yes, indeed," said the other man.

"Then you may stay, and set out these young apple-trees. I am going to have an orchard, and I have marked the places for the trees with stones."

By and by the owner of the trees came back, and went to look at his orchard. He had been gone two days. "How is this?" he asked. "Only four trees set out?"

"This is all I had time for," answered the other man. "I dug great holes, so that the roots might be spread out to the farthest tip. I hauled rich earth from the woods, so that the trees might have the best of food. I set the trees straight, and filled the holes with care. This took all the time, but these four trees are well planted."

"That is too slow a way for me," said the owner. "I can plant the whole orchard in one day."

So he went to work, and planted the trees in his own way. He did not dig holes large enough or deep enough, and therefore many of the little root mouths were broken off when he set the trees in the holes. He did not take pains to get soft, rich earth to fill the holes, and so the trees could not have as good food as they needed. The poor little trees lived for a while; but they were never very strong, never bore very good apples, and at last were cut down. Finally, all that was left of the orchard were the four trees which had been planted with such faithfulness and care. These four trees are now older than an old man, and have long been bearing delicious great apples.—From "In the Child's World."

MUTUAL SURPRISES.

Acts of mutual kindness change strangers to friends, and are among the most pleasant of remembrances. Madame de Lamartine, in describing a journey with her children through Switzerland, gives the following graceful incident:—

The progress of our little party was rather noisy, so that a stranger might have thought that a troop of banditti had taken possession of the mountains. And so seemed to think some poor little shepherds guarding their goats and sheep at the edge of the wood; for they had fled in terror, and hid themselves in the heather.

Presently we came on a fire lighted between two big stones in the middle of the path, and by the side of this rustic hearth was a pair of wooden shoes. Evidently, the owner had been too frightened to stop and put them on.

I proposed, to the delight of the children, that we should give the fugitives a pleasant surprise, putting into each sabot a half-franc piece and some sugar-plums which the children had saved from dessert.

As we went on, we talked of the fright of the poor little shepherds, and of how delighted they would be when they had gathered courage to come back. They would be sure to tell their mothers at night that the "good people" who are said to haunt the mountain had given them these treasures, and so it proved.

The children, finding their sabots full of money and sugar-plums, gave all the credit to the fairies. But their parents were not so easily taken in, and, with the tact and refinement so often found among the peasantry, determined to show how much they appreciated our kindness by giving us a surprise in return.

The following morning, when our servant opened the door, he found on the step four little red baskets filled with walnuts, cream cheeses, and little pats of butter made into the shape of sabots.

The bearer of these little presents had run away, so as to give us back mystery for mystery.—Youth's Companion.

LARGE SPIDERS.

Spiders are met with in the forests of Java whose webs are so strong that it requires a knife to cut through them. A spider of enormous size, which has taken up her residence in a cathedral at Munich, regales herself with a large supply of lamp oil. A Texas spider weaves a balloon four feet long and two feet wide, which she fastens to a tree by a single thread, then marches on board with her half-dozen little ones, cuts the thread, and away goes the airship to some far distant point on the prairie.

Premature

* Old Age

is deplorably prevalent in this nineteenth century. Thousands die annually— young in years, but as completely worn out as though the full allotment of their time had passed over their heads. The man who feels that he is "breaking down," experiences loss of strength, sleep, and appetite, should at once take that greatest of concentrated food preparations. It is not a medicine, but a builder-up of brain, nerve, and flesh tissue. By its strength-giving properties, and its action as an invigorator of each of the great life-maintaining organs of the body, it stops the decline, and gives to the prematurely broken-down sufferer a new lease of life, wherein poor health is an unnecessary adjunct if its use is continued.

Bovinine

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

Henry F. Miller

Piano-fortes.

Henry F. Miller & Sons Piano Co.
88 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

A WINTER IN CALIFORNIA.

Parties will leave Boston in Elegant Trains of Palace Vestibuled Sleeping and Dining Cars, Tuesdays, November 19 and December 10, for Los Angeles, San Diego, etc., by way of Chicago, Kansas City, and Santa Fe. The tickets cover every expense of travel both ways, and give the holder entire freedom on the Pacific Coast. They may be used returning on Any Regular Train until July, 1896, or with Parties under personal escort, with a Choice of Three Different Routes.

Tours to Atlanta Nov. 5, 11, 13, 19, 25, and 27; and Dec. 3, 9, 11, and 17.

Additional California Tours, Jan. 7, Feb. 11, and March 3, via Chicago, Kansas City, and Santa Fe, and Jan. 23, Feb. 13, and March 5, via New Orleans.

Tours to Mexico January 23 and February 13.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines; also Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular trip desired.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,
296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

"A HANDFUL OF DIRT MAY BE A HOUSEFUL OF SHAME." CLEAN HOUSE WITH

SAPOLIO

For the Christian Register.
MOTTO TO SONG XXXI.*

BY HENRIETTA R. ELIOT.

Sometimes there stirs within a young child's soul
A dim forecasting—hardly yet a thought—
Of his place in the Universal Whole.
Oh, foster it! Let it not pass for naught.
Meet every question. Help him still to see
And trust the inner 'neath the outward show.

Teach him that things apart in space may be United in his thought. Help him to know
That to the heart attend all things may speak.
So shall he, listening, learn to understand;
And all the overhanging mists shall break,
And joyfully he'll live as God has planned.

GOOD ROADS.

When travellers go to Italy, they are struck with amazement with the remains of ancient roadways, which, they tell us, are evidently far superior to the roads which we in modern times construct. Those who are interesting themselves in the history of the Peruvians find precisely the same thing to admire. The remains show that their roads, even in these days of engineering, we should think almost impossible to build; and it is believed that some of these first-class roads extended for many hundreds of miles. Even sheet asphalt, or bituminous cement of some kind, was used for surfacing.—Exchange.

A FORTUNATE FIND.

Some frescos by Correggio hitherto unknown have been discovered in the old fortress of Mantua by M. Charles Yriarte of the Académie des Beaux-Arts. They are medallions painted in the cupola of the study of Gabriela d' Este, Duchess of Mantua. The study was inaccessible for nearly two hundred years, as the Austrians, who held Mantua from 1706 to 1866, would allow no one to enter the fortress; and, when it came into the possession of Italy, the town archives were piled up in the room. M. Yriarte, knowing that Correggio had worked in Mantua, obtained permission of the Italian government to make a thorough search, and succeeded in discovering the paintings. They are perfect, and in the artist's best style.—Exchange.

Spirit of the Press.

The Boston Herald, in an editorial on "A Ministry without Tobacco," says:—

The Methodists have improved upon the usual forms of ordination by compelling their candidates for the ministry to promise to abstain from the use of tobacco after they are ordained. No one who smokes or chews tobacco can hope ever to be a Methodist minister. While to many this regulation may seem more nice than wise, it is undoubtedly a drawback to the usefulness of many clergymen that they indulge too much in the use of tobacco. When they are engaged in their special duties, it is not helpful if they carry the strong scent of tobacco into the sick-room; and it was not exactly pleasant to have it said of a distinguished bishop that he could not travel on his visitations without resorting to the smoking-car for his habitual smoke. The Methodists may seem to many to be too careful; but, if they err at all, they err on the safe side.

Education.

Boston University has bought the empty Mount Vernon Congregational Church, its former tenants having quarters in a fine stone house up on the Back Bay. The university purposes to locate its School of Law in the old church.

A specially interesting exhibition at the Mechanics' Fair, Boston, which occupies one of the upper balconies, is made by the Boston public schools, illustrating the teaching of sewing and other manual work. A class of boys from the new school of Mechanic Arts can here be seen actually at work. These exhibits are attracting the attention of educators all over New England. The display of sewing is even finer than that which brought the Boston schools so much honor in Chicago.

Dr. William T. Harris, United States Commissioner of Education, has just made a notable address to the students of Atlanta University, warmly commending the work of higher education for the Negroes, as carried on in that institution. Without depreciating the importance of elementary and industrial training for the masses of the Negro race, he held that nothing is more "practical" than getting an insight into the civilization with which we are in contact and of which we form a part. As our civilization is largely derived from the Greeks and Romans, and as the Negroes of America are to share it with the Anglo-Saxons, it is very important that the bright minds among them should get acquainted with it, as others have done, through the study of Latin and Greek. This is the more necessary, since, with the advance of civilization and the development of machinery, the proportion of manual laborers in every community is steadily diminishing, while the proportion of directors of labor and of other brain workers is correspondingly increasing.

Temperance.

"If it were not for drunkenness, there would be no crime in Ireland at all. As it is, there is no crime which does not arise out of that evil," says Archbishop Croke of that country.

The Christian Endeavor Union of Cleveland has placed drinking-fountains in different parts of the city, on all of which are inscribed the words: "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again, but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst."

Mr. Gladstone has written a letter to the Temperance Congress, in which he says: "While profoundly sensible of the immense importance of the liquor question, I cannot pretend that I have mastered its difficulties. I see it clearly in certain of its aspects, but as a whole it baffles me. I have no doubt that the local option principle is sound; but they must be of sanguine temperament who believe that it is sufficient to dispose of the entire question. The method of the sale of liquor for public account, which exists in parts of Scandinavia, presents great advantages, and, if adopted here, ought to be adopted in its best form. The plan of free trade with strict police supervision and adequate taxation was, unfortunately, refused a fair trial in Great Britain. Of the scheme of mere limitation by reducing the number of licenses I have a poor opinion."

Here and There.

A new kind of cloth is being manufactured at Lyons from the down of poultry. It is light and warm.

The thoughtful everywhere agree to frown upon very early marriages. And, when it is realized that in a recent year 39,457 girls who were under age were married in England, and 12,257 lads, there would certainly seem to be some cause for apprehension and for the discouragement of the practice.—Exchange.

In Cuba the cucojo, the famous firefly of the tropics, the one that affords the most brilliant light of any land animal, is confined in paper lanterns for going about the country at night or for indoor lighting. Thirty-eight of them yield one-candle power. Sometimes they attach one of the insects to each foot for travelling in the dark. They also use them as ornaments for the hair and dress.

A fruit-dealer at Leeds advertises for a young assistant,—"one that does not wear shoes with more than three lace-holes in each side." It is very likely that the advertiser has calculated how much time will be saved by the absence of superfluous lace-holes. This reminds one of Carlyle's saying: "The race of life has become intense: the runners are treading upon each other's heels. Woe be to him who stops to tie his shoe-strings!"—Indian Messenger.

Toads and frogs have sometimes been taught to stay in a house to catch flies and other insects. They will take a corner of the kitchen for their own, and come out at regular times for their meals. The lightning-like rapidity with which they run out their long tongues and take in the unfortunate fly that ventures within range is very interesting—to all but the fly. However, the victim's misery is quickly over, which is not the case when it is caught in the long agony of fly-paper.—The Secretary.

It is hardly worth while to carry your silverware up stairs every night to protect it from thieves when you are destroying it down stairs every day by using worthless silver polish. USE which saves your silverware and preserves its brilliancy.
SILVER ELECTRO-SILICON POLISH
Sample free. Box, postpaid, 15c.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York

DIE

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

Two large pies are made from each package of None Such Mince Meat. For sale by all Grocers. Be sure you get the None Such—avoid imitations.

MERRELL-SOULE CO., Syracuse, N. Y.

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

IMPORTANT WORKS BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE

The Peak in Darien: With Some Other Inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and Body. An Octave of Essays. 266 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"Vigorous in thought and style. We have read the volume through from preface to 'the end,' and enjoyed it."—Watchman.

Darwinism in Morals, and Other Essays. 422 pages. Cloth, $2.00.

Some of the chapters: Darwinism in Morals; Hereditary Piety; The Religion of Childhood; Prehistoric Religion; The Religions of the World; The Religions of the East; The Religion and Literature of India; Unconscious Cerebration; Dreams; The Evolution of Morals and Religion.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"The profoundest, wisest, purest, noblest book in principle, aim, and tone yet written upon the true position of woman in society."

The Scientific Spirit of the Age, and Other Pleas and Discussions. 243 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Religious Duty. 311 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A Faithless World. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

Now ready:—

1. The Public Service of Religion.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmonds. $1.50 per hundred.
10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
16. SCIENTIFIC THEORY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.

141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

1. HERBERT SPENCER: His life and personal characteristics; his views on education; his religious opinions. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
2. CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN: His ancestry, life, and personal characteristics. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
3. SOLAR AND PLANETARY EVOLUTION: How suns and worlds come into being. By GARETT F. SERVISS.
4. EVOLUTION OF THE EARTH: The story of geology; how the world grew. By DR. LEWIS G. JAMES.
5. EVOLUTION OF VEGETAL LIFE: How does life begin? By WILLIAM POTTS.
6. EVOLUTION OF ANIMAL LIFE: The evidences from geology, geographical distribution, and comparative zoölogy. By ROSSITER W. RAYMOND, Ph.D.
7. THE DESCENT OF MAN: Man and the brute creation; his ancestral line; duration of human life on the planet. By E. D. COPE, Ph.D.
8. EVOLUTION OF MIND: The mind and the nervous system; the nature of mind. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE SEA-BIRDS' FOE.

When the wild waves, at the retreating tide,
Round some low promontory leap and wrangle,
And 'mid the rocks you see the fowler hide
Where sea-birds stoop for food in oozy tangle;
When, hidden in the hollow of his boat,
The practised marksman in his boat lies rocking,
And, wheeling round with curious eye, you note
The hapless sea-birds to destruction flocking;
When on hard rock or crimsoned wave they fall,
And at the slayer's feet in heaps are lying,
And now for food their unfledged nestlings call
In vain, on yon bare cliff by thousands dying,—
By whom is nerved the sanguinary hand
Which spreads a cloud of woe o'er cliff and water,
And drives these living sunbeams from our strand?
By thy fair sister, wife, or gentle daughter!
Who, to set off the glory of her hair,
For her brave father demands the sea-birds' glory,
Nor will one feather from her tresses spare
To put an end to all this tragic story.
She is the sea-birds' foe! She gives the word
Their snowy plumes to plunder, not to cherish.
That she may buy, the murderous guns are heard;
That she may dress, the lovely sea-birds perish!
—Rev. Richard Wilton, M.A.

WOMAN IN BURMAH.

The number of the Journal of the Maha Budhi Society, issued in Calcutta, lately received in Europe, brings, we are informed, the following from Mr. H. Fielding in regard to the Burmanese woman.
No country in the world has accorded to its women such absolute freedom, such complete control over their life and property, as Burmah. In regard to law, religion, and morals, woman stands on an equal footing with man. Boys and girls inherit in equality of rights. Woman manages her own property; and, if she marries, it belongs solely to herself. The husband has no authority therein, and no legal power over her. From childhood up she is unfettered. The chivalry which represents her as a divine ideal, and treats her as a slave, has never appeared in Burmah. No Burman lover extols the loved one as a super-terrestrial creation, and treats her later as a being infinitely inferior to himself.
The religion of Burmah has not labelled her the source of all evil, has never warned man to beware of her as of serpents which would lead to perdition; and no pope has designated her the "sole hope of the church." No mediocre literary efforts have inculcated in woman false ideas about themselves, men, and the world. They have always been regarded what they in reality are, and have had freedom to fulfil the duties of their position, untrammelled by conventionality and rules. Men, as well as their own sex, have always accorded them ample room for activity; and they have been esteemed the best judges themselves of what would degrade them. There are no more womanly women in the world than the Burmanese, none possess in higher degree than they the indefinable charm of womanhood.
Whether married or single, every woman, from her sixteenth or seventeenth year on, has an occupation beside her domestic duties. In the higher classes she manages her own property, in the lower she conducts some industry. In Burmah there are no special fields of employment which a woman is allowed to enter or forbidden access. As there is no caste for men, so, also, none exists for women. Freedom has been granted them to attempt anything in which they believed they could excel, without fear of public opinion. This freedom in a choice of vocation has been of profit in appropriateness of selection, and each sex has left to the other that which it felt incapacitated for itself. Strangely enough, we find that in Burmah sewing and embroidery are especial occupations of men. Women are mostly shopkeepers. The retail trade in Burmah lies in their hands, and nearly all are in trade on their own account. As the men cultivate their own land, so the women conduct their own business. They are not the agents of others, but independent tradeswomen; and this activity does not interfere with their domestic duties. Those of business take three hours of the day. Accordingly, they have ample time to devote to their housekeeping, after the daily business is over. Domesticity is the central point always of woman's life,—on no account would she ever neglect this; but the effect of this tutorship—that every woman conducts her own business—is a great influence on her life. Her outlook is enlarged. She learns things she would never acquire in the narrow sphere of home life, thus imbibing a forbearance and understanding which impresses every one with whom she comes in contact. She learns her own strength and weakness, and reckons accordingly. Divorce is as easy to obtain as the most advanced reformer could desire, but one case in a hundred marriages is rarely to be found.

Charities and Reforms.

The annual meeting of the Young Travellers' Aid Society will be held in the chapel of Trinity Church, entrance on Clarendon Street, Thursday, November 14, at 3 P.M. Mrs. Laura Ormiston Chant will address the meeting, and speak of the welcome that should be extended to unprotected travellers to a large city. The public is cordially invited to attend and learn of the great work the society has done toward making it safe for our country girls to come alone to Boston.

For thirty years the homes of Dr. Barnardo in England have never closed their doors on any waif, orphan, or destitute child, "without distinction of age, sex, creed, birthplace, or physical conditions." Over 26,000 children have been rescued from lives of misery and crime, and educated and trained for useful lives. 7,500 have been sent out to the British colonies, where good homes have been found for them, many having grown up to fill positions of influence. Nearly 5,000 boys and girls are now under training in the institutions.

A Brotherhood House has just been opened on East Newton Street, Boston, by the Boston Local Council of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. Three members of the brotherhood are expected to reside at the house permanently; and young men from the country, recommended by the clergyman of the parish from which they come, will find a homelike place to live, with excellent influences about them. What are known as "settlements" are increasing in every large city, and the value to the neighborhoods in which they are located is now recognized by thoughtful people.—Lend a Hand.

Science.

In England houses are compelled by law to be supplied with the Phillips fire extinguisher. When in action, carbonic acid gas is generated. You press a button, place the vessel in a room where the fire is, and close the door. The gas finds its way into every crevice, and the fire is soon extinguished.

Herr Otto Schulze of Strasburg has been at work for three years on an electric incubator, in which the heat required to hatch the chickens is supplied by the electric current in a way that is now well known. The difficulty in such an application of electric heating lies in regulating the current, and consequently the temperature; but it is stated that Herr Schulze has devised one which maintains the temperature within one-tenth of a degree.

Dr. Kitasato, the brilliant Japanese bacteriologist who discovered the cause of the plague in Hongkong last year, has found, he thinks, not only the cause, but also a cure for this terrible affliction. Severe as it is for the sufferer himself, it is a comfort to learn, from authoritative sources, that it is not as contagious as we sometimes fancy; and also we get in these days of scientific explanation interesting glimpses of the value of the Mosaic isolation regulations that caused the leper to be banished "without the camp." It is needless to say that Dr. Kitasato's studies lead him in a steady advance from position to position in the road that is illuminated by the discoveries of Pasteur, Koch, and Behring.—Ex.

Something New for Christmas!

Not to take the place of the Christmas Tree! By no means. But to furnish a magnificent entertainment in connection with it. The best Christmas stories in English literature illustrated by life-model pictures. Santa Claus and St. Nicholas brought into dazzling light on the screen by our wonderful lanterns.

Complete outfits $50 up; sold on easy instalments, and slides rented. Do you want to know more about this? Then write to

RILEY BROTHERS,
Branches: 26 Beekman St., New York.
BOSTON: 244 Washington St. CHICAGO: 196 La Salle St.
KANSAS CITY (Mo.): 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS: 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA: 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO: 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND: 411 Couch St.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

In Chronic Dyspepsia, Renal Calculi, &c.

THE PATIENT GAINS 114 POUNDS IN FLESH.

Mr. W. H. Gregory, of Stovall, N. C., Stated by Dr. F. R. Gregory, of Stovall, N. C.

"Mr. W. H. Gregory, a sufferer from chronic dyspepsia, chronic liver disease, almost resulting in granular degeneration, Chronic Diarrhoea, with Kidney complications, fits of renal colic, passages of Calculi, and all the worst and most distressing forms of Gastro-Intestinal Disorders, after having exhausted the catalogue of Dietetics and Materia Medica and Therapeutics, under the advice and treatment of a number of the most skillful and experienced physicians, without benefit, and having the mean-while declined, from a normal weight of two hundred and twenty to one hundred and six pounds, has been completely restored to vigorous health by a visit of three months to the Buffalo Lithia Springs and the free use of the water of Spring No. 1 to the exclusion of all other remedies, gaining while at the Springs seventy-two pounds in weight and in six months thereafter forty-two pounds additional. "The transition from a state of cadaveric emaciation to a new life of robust health and strength in so short a time seems little short of miraculous."

Dr. David E. Smith, Oakley, Virginia.

"My daughter suffered from Chronic Dyspepsia. She became emaciated and feeble and her condition alarming. The most approved treatment of the profession proving unavailing, I carried her upon a bed to the Buffalo Lithia Springs, upon a diet of Tea and Crackers, and Bread and Milk, the stomach often rejecting these, and put her exclusively upon the water of the old Spring (No. 1), the beneficial action of which was soon apparent. Under continued use of the water there was marked and continued improvement, until she was able to eat heartily and digest readily any ordinary article of food. In less than two months she returned home fully restored." This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

THOMAS F. GOODE, Proprietor, Buffalo Lithia Springs, Va.

Spring No. 1.

Spiritual Life.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troublous, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star," "The Star."

"Afterglow," like Gannett's "Wrestling and Blessing," is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged."—Christian Register.

Seeing and Being, and Other Sermons. By JOHN W. CHADWICK. 234 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Great Hopes for Great Souls; "A Mere Man"; The Constructive Achievements of the Higher Criticism; Tempted of God; The Price of Moral Freedom; Orthodoxy, what is it? Morality and Religion; The Conversion of Energy; Two Meanings of Religion; The Undiscovered Country; Samuel Longfellow; The Old, Old Story; The Fullness of Time; The Unbridled Tongue; Immortality; Seeing and Being.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

Light on the Cloud; or, Hints of Comfort for Hours of Sorrow. By M. J. SAVAGE. 176 pages. Cloth, gilt edges, $1.25.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR NOVEMBER.

"Unpardonable Sin." Rev. J. E. Roberts.
Savonarola: A Sketch. II. S. Fletcher Williams.
The Voice of Warning. James Rowe.
The Roman Catholic Church. Rev. Brooke Herford' D.D.
At the Morning. Maud L. Cotton.
The Glorious Gospel.
Demands of the Age.
Sunday School Association.
Remembrance. H. C. Tenney.
The English Congregationalists. J. T. Sunderland.
A Lesson from Tolstoi. George S. Cottman.
Talk with Boys. Jessie Whitsitt.
A Service of Welcome to the Church. Rev. Albert Walkley.
Correspondence. Rev. Margaret T. Olmstead.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women, Emily A. Fifield;
Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work, Christopher R. Elliot; Literary Notes.
Children's Corner.
NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*.*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Important Works.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMAN-DIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

Vexed Questions in Theology. A Series of Essays. By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. 250 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The remarkable faculty possessed by James Freeman Clarke for presenting difficult problems in a simple way—clearing away all non-essentials, and having the heart of the subject stand out vividly and helpfully—is nowhere better seen than in the present volume. For any earnest seeker after the more reasonable thought of God, duty, life, religion, the book has very much of help.

Kindling Thoughts. By ELIZABETH P. CHANNING. 315 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

Contains fifty-seven brief essays, such as Devo upon the heart; The angel in the shadow; A disappointed life; Plain living and high thinking; The spiritual tangle; The charm of the old; Accepting ourselves as we are; etc., etc.

It is a long time since anything so brightly refreshing as these Kindling Thoughts has come to us. They are full of that best cheer which comes from the deepest, clearest springs of faith.—Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

"Unity Pulpit"

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.
2. God in the City.
3. Reaping Time.
4. Called to be Saints.
5. Prosperity and Adversity. (By George W. Stone.)
6. The Religious Situation.
7. The Forward Movement of Unitarianism. (By Rev. George Batchelor.)

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Pleasantries.

Louise (aged four): "Please tie my bonnet-strings, and please tie 'em in a Psyche knot!"—Youth's Companion.

"Do you think I can see through you?" The burly old gentleman in front smiled good-naturedly as he retorted, "You ought to be able, sir: I've a pain in my back."—Presbyterian.

Mamma: "I hope you said something pleasant when you gave Tommy his birthday gift?" Bob: "Yes'm: I told him he was welcome to it, for it was one I had left over from last year."—The American.

Upon a gentleman's tomb in Warwickshire we read that he was "accidentally shot by his gamekeeper." Under this piece of information is the text, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."—The American.

"Who's there?" cried little Binks, egged on by his wife, who insisted that there was a burglar in the room. "Nobody," returned the burglar. "There, my dear," snapped Binks, "that's exactly what I told you."—Harper's Bazar.

At an evening entertainment in one of our country parishes recently, a stranger was conversing with the minister's wife, not knowing her personally, and asked innocently, "Do you like your minister as well as ever?" The lady (the minister's wife) replied, "I like him just as well as I ever did."

Willie (who was travelling alone for the first time, to conductor): "What is the meaning of 'W' and 'R' on the sign-posts along the road?" Conductor: "'Ring and whistle.'" Willie (after a pause): "I can see how 'W' stands for 'wring'; but I'm blessed if I can see how 'R' can stand for 'whistle.'"—Harper's Round Table.

Mother of Nine Children (looking into the stocking basket): "Well, Bridget, for one thing, I am sure we shan't have to darn stockings after ten o'clock at night in the next world." Bridget (sympathetically): "Shure, an' that's thrue for you, ma'am; for all the pictures av angels that iver I saw was barefuted."—Worthington's Magazine.

The residents of Jamaica Plain will appreciate these: A teacher in one of the public schools asked a pupil which was the most fertile plain in America, and for what was it famous, meaning the valley of the Mississippi. The answer was promptly given, "The most fertile plain is Jamaica Plain, and it is famous for being the place where Jamaica ginger is made!"—The Transcript.

One of the best stories told by Dean Hole in his "Memories" is of an old-fashioned cathedral verger, "lord of the aisles," who, one noon, found a pious visitor on his knees in the sacred building. The verger hastened up to him, and said in a tone of indignant excitement, "The services in this cathedral are at ten in the morning and at four in the afternoon, and we don't have no fancy prayers."

At a local conference recently held in a country town, where the delegates had to be conveyed from the station to the church, the society generously furnished teams. The minister, always ready to help in every way, went to the station with his carriage. Returning with a lady beside him socially inclined, she said, "Have you a good minister here?" not knowing her companion. The minister replied, "We ought to have: I'm the man."

In one of the fashionable "Kurorte" on the Rhine, reports a writer in the Realm, he came across some queer entries in the visitors' book of the principal hotel. One of the Paris members of the Rothschild family had signed "R. de Paris." It so happened that Baron Oppenheim, the well-known Cologne banker, was the next arrival; and he immediately capped the above by signing "O. de Cologne."—Youth's Companion.

The young man had gone into a department store to buy a fountain-pen. The girl in charge of the fountain-pen show-case had supplied him with a sheet of paper, a bottle of ink, and several of the pens; and, in trying them, one after another, he covered the sheet with the words Tempus fugit, the girl looking on with a kindly interest. "If you buy one, and it doesn't suit you, Mr. Fugit," she remarked, "you can bring it back and change it."—The Pacific.

There has been a discussion in the English Daily Telegraph on "Sunday clothes." It reminds us of a story of a good, honest old lady who volunteered to bring the working men and farm laborers to church. She succeeded admirably; and, when asked by the rector how she reasoned with the men, she replied: "Why, I told them that God did not look on the clothes, but on the heart, and that the minister exhorted us on Sunday morning 'to render your heart, and not your garments.'"—Churchman.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Atlanta Exposition.

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors. Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Convenient to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.

EBBITT HOUSE,

WASHINGTON, D.C.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.

Popular Prices. Regular rate $4.00 per day up. Fifty rooms on the sixth floor, with steam heat and electric light, reduced to $2.50 and 3.00 per day. Fifty rooms on other floors reduced from $4.00 to $3.50 per day. Parlors and alcove parlors at equally low rates. Special rates for the Army and Navy Officers and the Clergy.

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM

DANVILLE, New York

Established in 1858.

A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building.

BEACON STREET, BOSTON,

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

DOYLEY & CENTERPIECE BOOK

The Most

"up to date" book on the subject.

Chapters on Embroidery Stitches, Centerpieces, Doyleys, Ideal Honiton, Luncheon and Tea Cloths, Cut Work and Table Spreads in Denim. Over 70 Engraved Illustrations. Instructions for working each pattern are so plain that the beginner need not hesitate to undertake them. Invaluable to every lady who embroiders. Sent postpaid to any address for 10c. or the names of five ladies interested in embroidery and 4c. to cover postage.

THE Brainerd & Armstrong Company
2 Union St., New London, Conn.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin

BLAKE BELL CO., Boston, Mass.

XMAS DIALOGUES, Pieces to Speak and how to get up Fascinating Sunday School Entertainments—all 10c. J. & P. B. MYERS, 85 John St., N. Y.

The Loving Cup.

The late Lord Lyons, British Ambassador at Paris, used to relate the following history of the Loving Cup:

KING HENRY of Navarre (who was also HENRY IV. of France), whilst hunting, became separated from his companions, and, feeling thirsty, called at a wayside inn for a cup of wine. The serving maid, on handing it to him, as he sat on horseback, neglected to present the handle. Some wine was spilt over, and his Majesty's white gauntlets were soiled. While riding home, he bethought him that a two-handled cup would it to the inn. On his next visit he called again for wine, when, to his astonishment, the maid (having received instructions from her mistress to be very careful of the King's cup) presented it to him, holding it herself by each of its handles. At once the happy idea struck the King of a cup with three handles, which was promptly acted upon, as his Majesty quaintly remarked, "Surely out of three handles I shall be able to get one!" Hence the Loving Cup.

A full line of Loving Cups at prices ranging from $2.50 to $15.
Write for particulars.

ABRAM FRENCH COMPANY, 89-91-93 FRANKLIN STREET, BOSTON.
Crockery, China, Glass and Silverware Merchants.

CHURCH CARPETS

AT MANUFACTURERS' PRICES. 658 WASHINGTON ST., OPP. BOYLSTON ST.

JOHN H. PRAY, Sons & Co.,
CARPETS AND UPHOLSTERY,
BOSTON.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1895.

NUMBER 46.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; Congregational Ordination.	745
Living up to the China; A Forward Movement; Sentiment.	746
BREVITIES.	746
UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.
The Norwegian Principle, by Rev. D. N. Beach.	747
The Committee of Fifty, by Rev. F. G. Peabody, D.D.,	748
Roman Catholicism and Intemperance, by Rev. A. P. Doyle.	749
Business Record.	750
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
In Japan; American Unitarian Association.	750
Among the Unitarians of Hungary, by Rev. W. H. Lyon.	752
Over Summer Seas, by Augusta Larned.	756
The Centenary of Keats, by Emma Endicott Marean.	757
The Sacred White Elephant.	762
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.	750
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.	750
KING'S CHAPEL.
Historical Sketch; Installation Services.	753
A Sure Foundation, by Rev. Francis G. Peabody, D.D.,	754
SPIRITUAL LIFE.	756
LITERATURE.
"This Goodly Frame, the Earth,"	757
Miscellaneous; Literary Notes.	758
Books Received.	759
THE HOME.
Leslie's Lucky Sixpence; The Little Chicken.	760
The Russian Empress, by Sophia Friedland; A Prince's Gift; The Girls of Jerusalem; How a Book was written.	761
POETRY.
Destiny, by Emma E. Brown.	760
The Anniversary of the French Revolution.	761
MUSIC.	762
TEMPERANCE.	762
HERE AND THERE.	762
PERSONALS.	763
CHARITIES AND REFORMS.	763
EDUCATION.	763
SCIENCE.	763
PLEASANTRIES.	764

Editorial.

IN the Century for November Mr. W. D. Howells writes on "Equality as the Basis of Good Society" in a style in which the qualities of the literary artist and the social prophet are blended. There are those who may doubt whether any one using such polished English can make an impression in social agitation in a heated atmosphere, and with the air full of whizzing adjectives. But the fact is that these discussions have already made their way into the drawing-room and to the dinner-table, and are amenable to the ordinary rules of politeness, and, what is still better, to the spirit of kindness and brotherly interest which is the basis of true courtesy. Though Mr. Howells begins by apparently using the term "good society" under the conventional social limitations of that term, he carries us to something much further,—unto an ideal which has a very close resemblance to that of the kingdom of heaven as Jesus used it in its relation to reformation in society.

THERE are inequalities of circumstance and endowment which are beyond our control; but it will not do to make these an excuse for a failure to establish that equality which is feasible and practicable, and which comes through the dethronement of human selfishness. This does not mean a radical reconstruction of human nature so much as a revolution which shall bring the better part of human nature to the top. In closing his article, Mr. Howells says: "We have had inequality so long in the world that it is the convention to justify it, as it once was the convention to justify slavery, and I dare say cannibalism more remotely. It is supposed to be human nature; and it was undoubtedly human nature once, as those other things were in their time. But I do not believe that any enlightened person thinks it just; and the other sort of persons are no longer the majority in good society, or, at least, they do not dominate the ideals of good society. There is some prospect that they will not always dominate the ideals of society in the sense of humanity, but will presently be so powerless that this sort of society can be safely included in good society; and, as people are apt to become finally what they have long seemed to be, professed to be, goodness in manner will end in goodness of heart, and we shall have an equality which is at once polite and sincere."

MUCH of the interest of the election last week in Massachusetts lay in the fact that all registered voters, whether men or women, were asked to vote "Yes" or "No" on the question whether it is expedient that municipal suffrage should be extended to women. As was expected, the "Noes" were in a decided majority. The unexpected feature of the election was the large affirmative vote, amounting to over ninety thousand men and nearly twenty thousand women. Had the vote been for a constitutional amendment, or anything but a mere expression of opinion, undoubtedly a larger vote would have been cast on both sides; for many women, like a large fraction of the male voters in Massachusetts, are indifferent to the privileges of the ballot. Yet, of the women who voted, a strong majority were in favor of suffrage. Undoubtedly, the indifference among women, like the indifference among men, is largely to be attributed to the conception of suffrage as a right instead of as a duty. Many women, like many men, are perfectly willing to waive their rights, who feel bound to fulfil their duties. The right of suffrage belongs where the qualifications as to citizenship and character and education exist for exercising it; and where the right exists the duty goes with it. Let this be recognized, and neither men nor women will stay away from the polls.

HERETOFORE a Western governor or land agent, in booming his State, has had to rely mainly upon its size, fertility, and its unclouded future. But the governor of Arizona is not confined to such modern aspects of advantage. Of course he does not let us forget, as we certainly do not wish to, that "Arizona is the sixth largest political division in the United States, embracing an area of 113,000 square miles, or 72,320,000 acres, that its resources are unlimited, and its mountains are the depositories of gold, silver, copper, lead, onyx, marble, and precious stones, that it contains nearly forty million acres of grazing land, much of which is a perpetual pasture, unknown to frost or snow, on which are maintained vast herds of stock, that its valleys comprise an area of more than 10,000,000 acres of land, which, when brought under cultivation, gives marvellous returns in grain, fruits, and other products of the soil, and that it contains the largest unbroken forest area in the United States, there being from eight to ten hundred thousand million feet of standing saw-lumber."

BUT, lest any of the old countries of the world should say that, though Arizona has a present and a future, she has no past, lest Rome should point to her Coliseum, Greece to her Parthenon, and Egypt to her Pyramids, the governor declares that "this region rightly claims a history or a civilization which antedates the Christian era, —yes, and probably the Egyptian and Assyrian dynasties; for, truly, this is a favored portion of the earth's surface." And the executive may challenge Rome, Greece, Egypt, or Assyria to disprove his statements. The governors of Dakota and Montana may look with envy upon this historic claim; but let them dig up some old ammonites and other early inhabitants from their cretaceous beds, and claim that the history of their States goes back beyond the advent of man. It is dangerous enough when the great North-west and the great South-west rush at each other with volumes of statistics and prophecies; but, when they dig up the buried past and set the mound-builders and the Zuñis at warfare, they will not stop when glacial man is brought on the stand, but we may expect to see the megatheria, ichthyosauri, and other early citizens of this locality engaged in a fearful conflict for historic precedence.

OUR Catholic contemporary, the Sacred Heart Review, seeks to apologize as well as it can for the pope's injunction to Catholics of this country to refrain from participating in religious congresses where other denominations are represented. The Review says, "Leo XIII., who has undoubtedly given the matter long and careful consideration, has evidently reached the conclusion that the advantages consequent from Catholic representation at such religious congresses do not compensate for the disadvantages attendant upon participation in them." "The pope does not mean to be illiberal nor intolerant," says the Review. It is simply that Catholics have nothing to gain by these congresses. The pope does not seem, however, to have considered the question whether the Catholics have anything to give. Certainly, a church of its historic importance and imposing organization should be able to contribute something. It looks as though the pope were afraid to bring Roman Catholicism into fair comparison with other religions. But in this respect he is not worse than the archbishop of Canterbury.

WE are glad, however, to have the assurance, which the Review thinks it is almost needless to give, "that the instructions which the Holy Father has sent the American prelates on this matter by no means forbid the co-operation of Catholics with their Protestant fellow-citizens in any movement that seeks to promote the public welfare or morality, to foster fraternal feelings and good will, or to further any other commendable cause. That no such sense attaches to the papal letter is plainly shown by the action of Cardinal Gibbons, who this very week sent a congratulatory message to the Women's Christian Temperance Union, which is holding its annual convention at Baltimore, and who delegated one of his priests to bid the delegates welcome to the city in his name." A pleasant feature, too, of the Unitarian temperance meeting at Washington was the participation of Father Doyle of Baltimore, whose paper we publish this week.

CONGREGATIONAL ORDINATION.

WE have taken pains to set before our readers this week the exact order of service followed by King's Chapel of Boston in installing, last Sunday, its pastor, Rev. Howard N. Brown. There are many noteworthy points in the history of this ancient Chapel, and that of its relation to Congregationalism is one of the most interesting.

There was something in the independence of the Plymouth Pilgrims which was healthfully contagious. The Puritans who came to Massachusetts Bay ten years later were not Separatists; and, when they left England, they were, in more than one sense, somewhat at sea. They were loath to cut the cable which bound them to the Church of England; but, when they reached New England, while the ties of memory and affection remained, the ecclesiastical ties had been thoroughly dissolved. They at once felt the influence, and to some extent caught the spirit of the church at Plymouth. The result was the development of New England Congregationalism.

In this early Congregationalism two tendencies were manifest. One was the tendency, which had distinct and decided expression, to regard the individual church as the source of authority in all matters relating to the installation and ordination of the ministry. Every church not only called its ministers, but ordained them, the laity representing the church in the ceremony. This tradition has been sacredly preserved in some of the oldest churches. On the other hand, a tendency also developed to recognize as authoritative the collective will of the churches as expressed in a Congregational council. This collective will was at first fraternal and advisory, but it threatened to become mandatory and prelatical. What some of the earlier Independents feared, actually took place. Councils directly veered toward Presbyterianism, assumed synodical authority, and interfered with the liberty of the churches. New England Congregationalism gradually developed a body of traditions and precedents; and it is easy to quote from time to time, from epochs in its history, in which each of the tendencies referred to may be recognized.

To-day the Unitarian branch of the Congregational body represents most distinctly and uncompromisingly the principle of the independence and authority of the individual church, and of the right of its lay members to call, constitute, and ordain their own minister. The Orthodox Congregational body, on the other hand, has yielded, in a large degree, to the other tendency, which recognizes the associative action of the churches, in the form of a council, as essential to Congregational ordination. The extent to which this tendency has grown and overpowered Independency in the Orthodox Congregational body was seen in a recent case brought into one of the police courts of Boston, in which an orthodox minister, who had been ordained by his own church in defiance of a council, was actually fined for conducting marriages, it being assumed by the court that he had not conformed to that feature of the law which requires a minister to be ordained according to the usages of the religious denomination to which he belongs. Unitarian Congregationalism, on the contrary, stands so decidedly for the inherent right of each church to ordain and install its minister that, if any question of validity were to be raised, it would be rather that of ordination or installation by a council, apart from a church. A council of churches, as called on such occasions by Unitarians, is simply to recognize and ratify, not to constitute or ordain. It is now with them simply one of the pleasant amenities of the fellowship of the churches. Though other churches should refuse to come and extend the hand of fellowship, it would not affect, in any way, according to Unitarian practice and precedent, the validity or legality of the action of the church in ordaining its own minister.

As will be seen by the reports we publish of the proceedings, the form of service used by King's Chapel is as absolutely Congregational as it could well be. The senior warden, Mr. Arthur T. Lyman, read the call and the acceptance, and, representing the members and proprietors, formally installed and ordained Mr. Brown as the pastor of the church. There was no laying on of hands by other ministers, but simply a prayer; and the benediction was pronounced by the warden.

This strict adherence of King's Chapel to a purely Congregational form is the more interesting when we remember that that church was established in 1636 as the first Episcopalian church in New England, and that in polity as well as in liturgy it stood over against Puritan Congregationalism. Giving up its Trinitarianism and returning to the early simplicity of the Christian faith in one God, it also accepted the simple polity of the early Christian Church. Its modern assertion of the doctrine of the historic episcopate is simply its affirmation and exercise of its own right to ordain men inspired by the Holy Ghost through lay representatives and without priestly intervention. When we think of the harm that has come through the innovations of prelatical and ecclesiastical authority which are seen in the Anglican Church, and still more in the Church of Rome, it is gratifying to see King's Chapel standing for the practice as well as for the faith once delivered to the saints. And this is not merely because it is old, but because it has proved to be better than the innovations which have attempted to supplant it.

King's Chapel is not only a landmark of Boston, but a landmark of Christian faith and practice. We congratulate the old church upon its continued and abundant life. Peace be within its walls, and prosperity within its palaces!

LIVING UP TO THE CHINA.

In the Indian boarding-schools established by the United States government on the reservations the thought of economy has been one of the first considerations. The next, perhaps, has been that the Indian is to be fitted to return to a condition of life not very unlike that from which he was taken. The thought of a possible better future for him has often been lost sight of. He was born in a tepee, and ate with his fingers, without dish or table; and, if raised to a grade of civilization which might require an uncovered deal table, a steel knife and fork, a pewter spoon, and a tin pannikin, that was considered enough of a rise for a savage.

That was some years ago. Better airs breathe round the savage now. The superintendent of Indian schools reports that into some schools white table-cloths and napkins have found their way recently, and white china has been introduced in place of tin. And the result? "It has a marvellous influence on the soul-development of the children." And we all believe it. Cleanliness and beauty, two qualities fundamental in soul-development, are not associated with tin; and, though the common white ware, which is probably meant by "china," is not famous for beauty, it stands for that in the eyes of the Indians, who associate it with white civilization.

This way of reaching the inner man by attention to simple external things, and thereby securing an advance in civilization, is not confined to methods adopted for Indians. In the Lancaster Industrial School there was manifest "soul-development" when the girls, some years ago, were taken out of the coarse, uniform, baggy gowns, to which they were condemned as good enough for sinners, and clad in tidy calico, properly made and fitted. In the same way their moral atmosphere was purified in proportion as the material atmosphere, befouled by the odors of swashing mops over unpainted floors, was renovated once for all by the introduction of polished boards. And, though the tax-payers groaned when the kitchens of the Elmira Reformatory were paved with marble, the superintendent found it a cheap expenditure when he looked at the better civilization it brought into that department, especially since the labor was furnished by the inmates. At the Sherborn Reformatory the dishes from which the prisoners eat is an index of the height of the moral attainment of the inmates. One has but to cross the thresholds of the spotless dining-rooms, and see one table set with attractive cups and plates, each whole and unmarred, and another on which the dishes, though clean, are nicked and ugly, to know to which grade of prisoners each belongs. It is the old story repeated in experience a thousand times. They try to "live up to their china," like the old woman in the tale.

Between the filthy Indians squatted round a handful of burning coals, over which they were half-cooking scraps of fly-blown meat, skewered on sticks and eaten without fork or knife, such as we used to see years ago, and the neatly dressed children in the government school, eating well-cooked food, served at a white-covered table on decent dishes, there is a difference that marks the ascent of many rounds on the ladder of civilization. And it is not a sudden fashion thrust upon them; but it is the result of patient education, which means training in manners as well as morals, a broadening of interest, sympathy, and appreciation, which helps in no small way to bind these late-comers into our civilization, into a common bond with the white men among whom they live.

But education is doing vastly more for the Indian than to teach him good manners. It is teaching self-control and self-government. When government schools for them were first established, one of the important duties of an agent was to force the children to attend, not quite at the point of the bayonet, but on peril of punishment. If they did not come, they or their parents were surely punished; and, if they did come, they were just as apt to be punished for what was called sullenness and stubbornness, the inefficient teachers of those days not recognizing homesickness and heartsickness in their captive pupils. The evening study hours especially were their dread and horror. What did a wild bird of the forests know of the trammels of books and forced lessons? But some wise man turned the study hour into a recreation hour, where the lesson of the day was reviewed and brought into some sort of connection with real life. A song was sung in which all united, a story was read to which all listened, and, lo! the hour of suffering became an hour of delight. The school began to stand for something real, and the rod disappeared and corporal punishment vanished. No wonder that the superintendent of schools says, "This is well." And the remainder of his words may as well be quoted for those benighted teachers from whose hands the rattan has not yet fallen, and who have not discovered, though red savages may be held to firm discipline without the rod, that Yankee boys are amenable to rational methods. Says Dr. Hailmann, "Punishments which inflict pain as a sort of compensation for the wrong done give a wrong tendency to the moral nature. They lead the child to believe that he can buy off wrong-doing by bodily suffering or by paying something to the party who has been offended by his wrong-doing."

Indian youth who have learned this great lesson in morals are fast climbing the ladder and leaving their savagery behind them.

A FORWARD MOVEMENT.

The Unitarians in New York and Brooklyn, under the leading of the secretary of the New York Conference, Rev. D. M. Morehouse, have planned a "forward movement," and are holding a special series of Sunday night services to set it going. This is what ought to be done all along the line. Let us have a forward movement.

Unitarians ought to be the forwarding agents of every good cause, whether social, ethical, or religious. But just now they have a splendid opportunity to work through their own organizations. Of their ability to work through other organizations or independent of organization, there can be no doubt. In literature, science, philanthropy, in social and political reform, they have shown their progressive spirit. But what they need to do now is, without becoming any less broad or liberal in their sympathies, to give impulse and effect to the very machinery they have created. A locomotive is a machine constructed for a forward movement. It needs a prepared pathway and an engineer and a motive power. But what shall we say of a locomotive that stands on the track with a full head of steam and plenty of freight to draw, and is content simply to advertise itself by ringing its bell and blowing its whistle? Or what shall we say of such an engine, beautifully fitted up and polished, but with insufficient fuel to move freight or passengers? Let there be a forward movement on lines already open; let new pathways be cleared, and new fuel be provided.

Unitarians need little exhortation to accept the results of advanced thought, and they are fairly hospitable to new discoveries and encouraging to new inquiry. But what they need is a new power, organic and personal, to forward their own cause. It is their cause only by conviction and acceptance. The forwarding power they need is that of the gardener who directs the sun and waters and enriches the soil, so that it yields its fruit days and even weeks before it would have done if the intelligence and effort of man were not joined with the forces of God. Every Unitarian church ought to be an organization of fruit-growers, and the American Unitarian Association a sanctified chamber of commerce for moral and religious ideas.

SENTIMENT.

Every noble action is the expression of a noble feeling. Back of the deed is the sentiment from which it proceeded. It matters little how persistently a man may talk of his sympathy with the oppressed or of his enjoyment in the higher things of life, if his daily conduct continually gives the lie to his words; and, on the other hand, a man need say little about his religion or his theory of ethics, when day after day he is evidencing the genuineness of his convictions by kindness to others and repression of selfish impulses. If any proof is needed of the existence of good in natures that seem sometimes most given over to evil impulses, the frequent occurrence of deeds of flawless self-sacrifice even there shows that, so long as men cannot gather grapes of thorns nor figs from thistles, so long must actions of tenderness and unselfishness proceed from something akin to their own nature. If this is true of single deeds, it is even more inevitable in deliberate courses of action, persisted in despite of difficulties and discouragements, shaped by the hours of insight, and unaltered by the hours of depression. When a man comes to a great conviction of duty, he is not to be turned aside by trifles from the carrying out of its logical sequences. Thus a reasonably adequate philosophy of life is important beyond estimate, since it decides for us what manner of creature we shall be; and the old theology was right in insisting on the need of a new life,—that is, a new principle or a new conviction of duty as the foundation of a new character or course of action.

In an adequate philosophy of life there is place for every exalted sentiment. Whatever makes for harmony and beauty in the world of contemplation or in the world of action must be a help in the general progress toward goodness. Lower aims are less attractive, as one listens to a symphony by Beethoven or gazes at the Sistine Madonna or yields himself to the word music of a great poet. The beauty of the mountains or the sea, the masterpieces of art, serenely pure or eternally true, are all in league with the great forces that make for morality; and they conspire together to lead the soul to the recognition of the unity of truth and beauty and goodness.

Nevertheless, the dulness of a nature that never refreshes itself by art or music is hardly more—no, not as much—to be dreaded as the paralysis of action that sometimes comes from regarding these things as an end in themselves. No state of mind is more hopeless than that which looks complacently on its own capacity for æsthetic enjoyment, and rests satisfied therewith. The people who can stand unawed and unshushed by the grandeur of a mountain or the glory of a sunset, chattering all the time about their love for nature; the people who tell you that they adore poetry until you wish to hate all rhymed expression; the people who are so sorry for the Armenian martyrs that they cannot even read accounts of their sufferings, and yet have no morsel of practical help for them,—these are the ones whom Emerson must have meant when he talked of souls that are lost by mimicking souls.

One of the most significant chapters in Dr. James's "Psychology" is that in which he warns young people, from a scientist's point of view, that no reservoir of maxims or fund of sentiment is worth anything in the formation of character unless every opportunity is taken for putting these principles into concrete action. Every time a fine glow of feeling is allowed to evaporate without bearing practical fruit, it is worse than a chance lost; for it actually hinders the next emotion from accomplishing its proper result. He notes, for instance, the relaxing effect that music may have upon character when indulged in to excess by those who are not performers, nor sufficiently gifted to take it intellectually as well as emotionally. He advises such never to suffer themselves to have an emotion at a concert, for instance, that they do not afterward express in one way or another. "Let the expression be the least in the world," he says, "speaking genially to one's grandmother, or giving up one's seat in a horse-car, if nothing more heroic offers; but let it not fail to take place."

It can never be asserted too often that fine feelings are worth anything only when they embody themselves in fine deeds. If the feelings are genuine, they cannot help thus revealing themselves; and then they do not need much explanation or talking about. Once allowed to degenerate into sentimentality, they become the basis of insincerity,—that most fatal element of character.

Perhaps there is a lesson in this for those who have felt the enthusiasm and onward impulse of the Washington Conference. Unitarians were never more sure than now that theirs is a religion worth acknowledging and propagating. If this conviction bears fruit in more generous giving and more devoted support of the work of the denomination, it will mean added strength, not only to the organizations which do this work, but to the individuals and churches which thus translate feeling into action. At once, before this enthusiasm is a thing of the past, let us testify generously to the depth of our purposes and aims there made manifest.

Brevities.

Although it is called "King's" Chapel, the President of the United States would be welcome to a seat.

We call special attention to the admirable sermon of Rev. Dr. Peabody delivered at King's Chapel, which fully rose to the demands of the occasion.

The photograph and inscription of the mural monument to Dr. Holmes in King's Chapel will be seen with interest by many who are not able to view it where it stands.

King's Chapel has one of the best choirs in Boston, with Mr. B. J. Lang as leader. Mr. Lang has been for several years the leader of the Apollo Club and of the Cecilia, and has now been made conductor of the Handel and Haydn Society.

The Scriptural selections read in King's Chapel last Sunday, at the installation of Mr. Brown, contained the text, "They will deliver you up to their councils." But this is just what King's Chapel did not do. No council was called, and therefore their minister was not "scourged in the synagogue."

When a man does not enjoy his work in life, he may not be fitted for the work, or the work may not be fitted for him. The late Bishop Brooks said: "It may be truly said that no man does any work perfectly who does not enjoy his work. Joy in one's work is the consummate tool without which the work may be done, indeed, but without its finest perfection."

The numerals in common use are not the only Arabic survivals in America, as will be proved at the Peabody Museum, Cambridge, on Friday, November 15, when Col. Bourke, the distinguished student of the manners and customs of North American Indians, will lecture on "Some Arabic Survivals in the Languages and Folk-lore of the Rio Grande Valley."

The hard times of the past two years have been specially felt in all schools supported by private subscriptions, and our South End Industrial School has not escaped. To eke out the scanty income, a sale of useful and fancy articles will be held next Saturday, from 10 A.M. to 6 P.M., at 46 Bartlett Street, Roxbury. We are also assured that home-made candy will be on sale: whether this comes under the head of "useful" or "fancy" we do not know. This enterprise, conducted by Unitarian societies, should be most generously supported.

We often hear the expression "prison-birds": in Michigan it has a literal as well as metaphorical meaning. In the State's prison there are six hundred canary birds kept by the convicts. During the day the cages are hung outside the cells, to give the birds light and air. At night the cage is placed in the cell. There is no danger from the communication of these prisoners,—the bird prisoner and the prison-bird. At the Elmira (N.Y.) Reformatory the windows of the corridors are opened, and birds are allowed to freely come in and fly about, as many of them are pleased to do.

During the recent terrible so-called riots in Constantinople, good evidence was given of the readiness of the Armenians to accept the decisions of the Great Powers, and of their faith in the friendliness of those powers. For days the great churches were crowded with Armenians, who fled to them for shelter,—a thousand in one church, fifteen hundred in another, two thousand in a third. In vain the sultan bade the people go home, and trust to him for security. But by and by there came messengers from the representatives of England, Russia, and France, and distributed among the people in the dim churches the personal cards of these ministers. Trusting in these, the harassed people quietly dispersed, and through byways and side streets found their way to their stricken homes.

Unitarian Temperance Society.

We give herewith the addresses delivered at the meeting of the Unitarian Temperance Society held at Washington, September 23, all of them important contributions to the study of this question.

THE NORWEGIAN PRINCIPLE:

ITS RIGHTEOUSNESS, AND THE PARAMOUNT IMPORTANCE OF ITS APPLICATION IN TEMPERANCE REFORM.

BY REV. D. N. BEACH.

I. THE HOLE IN THE TUB.

In the fight of civilization with the drink evil there are two objectives, not one,—two giants to bring to earth, not one. Of these, one is the drink itself: the other is human rapacity, availing itself of the enormous gains to be had by the drink traffic, and of the weakness of human nature in the direction of drink, to gather riches at what, in the large proportion of its gains, is the price of blood. Drink and human rapacity are the two giants.

As in the case of the parson who said that he always liked to take two texts in preaching, so that, if they persecuted him in one text, he could flee into another, these two objectives have proved the convenient cover, by the process of fleeing from one to the other of them when hard pressed, for the virtual immunity of the drink evil from decade to decade, and from generation to generation.

For two generations have come and gone, and a third has neared the farther side of the stage, since the movement of civilization against the drink evil became virtually war; and during this period, while much has been accomplished in educational directions, while great improvement has occurred in many individuals among certain classes of persons and in particular territories, and while there is a general and promising toning-up on the subject in the whole field, the sum total of the evil has abated not one whit, but has terribly increased. This nation, as a nation, is more drunken to-day than it was when the temperance reformation began within it. The closing nineteenth century is more drunken, as a whole, than the closing eighteenth. Learning, zeal, eloquence, literary skill of the first order, organization, personal effort to the point of utter self-sacrifice and even of martyrdom, great uprisings of whole masses of people, prodigious and pious contributions of money, the appeal of patriotism and the solemn sanctions of religion,—all these, and much besides, have been freely thrown into the war; and yet, as a whole, the drink evil is greater than it was when the struggle began.

In some insane asylums, it is said, they have this test by which to pass the more diseased patients out of that class to the class of those who are mending: A tub with a large hole in its bottom is set in a sink, and the patient is asked to bring enough buckets of water to fill it. If he goes patiently on by the hour bringing water in the vain endeavor, they do not promote him, much though they may admire his persistence; but, if he protests that, owing to the hole, the proposal that he fill the tub is tantamount to a request that he fill the sewer into which the sink beneath the tub empties, they take courage, pronounce him improving, and pass him on into the next class of patients.

That is precisely the pass to which the average movement in temperance reform has come. Its patience, its persistence, its serene hopefulness, are an impressive spectacle. Its bringing buckets of water to a tub with a hole in its bottom so large that the tub not only does not fill, but that its water level is steadily dropping, raises fairly the question of the movement's right reason. The only plea for it, which can save its sanity, is that it does not see the hole; but why it does not see it is a question not helping out its case very much. I have, for example, within two months, heard, perhaps, the most eloquent, certainly the most direct, pointed, moving, and dead-in-earnest temperance advocate in America solemnly tell an immense audience that he expected to live,—and he is well on in middle life,—that he expected to live to set his own feet upon the neck of the drink evil. And yet, in the face of the steadily increasing force of the evil, he offered no suggestion which has not been diligently pressed for a generation. I regard the person to whom I allude as, upon the whole, one of the most sagacious men now on the temperance platform; but he does not see the hole in the tub.

What is the hole in the tub? It is the failure to divide the question. It is the endless confusion of fighting two antagonists at once under the delusion that there is but one. While you are smiting one of them between the eyes, the other of them knifes you in the small of the back. It is the old juggler's trick of concentrating attention in one direction, while the trick is wrought in the other. It is the game which Tammany tried to work off upon Dr. Parkhurst. As he puts it: "Their newspaper men would come to me, and would solemnly inquire what I thought of the social evil. I told them to go home and mind their own business. Our question just then was not about the social evil, but a vastly different one; namely, whether Tammany was fattening upon the social evil. We went almost to hell to prove that it was: we would have gone all the way, if necessary." Had Tammany succeeded in thus confusing the issue, had it played off the old juggler's trick on the movement for good government in New York, had it side-tracked Dr. Parkhurst in the sinuosities of the problem of the social status, scores of clergymen who turned a cold shoulder on the preacher of Madison Square would doubtless have made the air lurid in behalf of personal purity; and, as a result of such well-meant but unavailing effort, the police captains, their subordinates, and their superiors would have gone on their way unmolested, and would be collecting hush money from brothels to this hour.

Just this, and with entire success, the drink evil is doing. It is greatly pleased to have us discuss the problem in general. It likes our speeches, our resolutions, our literary bureaus, our platforms. What white paper we print upon in that way will not be used, it reflects, as white paper might be used, really to hurt it. It does not seriously mind even our more substantial triumphs,—the tens of thousands induced to abstain, the thousands delivered from a living hell by the Keeley cure, or a Brockton, a Chelsea, or a Cambridge recovered from its thrall. For every bucket of water thus poured into the tub, it knows how to draw off anywhere from two to a dozen. It almost applauds us in the fight, knowing that, the intenser the holy rage in these directions, the remoter will be the day when anything really effective will be undertaken.

II. AN INSTANCE IN MASSACHUSETTS.

The most recent successful use of the hole in the tub, of the juggler's trick, of the side-tracking of a Parkhurstian movement in sinuosities alike futile and nowise pertinent, has occurred in Massachusetts.

Under its local option law of 1881, by which each municipality, at each annual election, must decide by "Yes" or "No" vote whether liquor may be sold within its limits, great headway began to be made in a well-enforced exclusion of the saloon. Responsibility was fixed locally, and in many instances was bravely faced.

In 1886 certain circumstances led Cambridge, then having 70,000 people, and now 84,000, to vote the saloon out. The vote was secured and the law enforced by the employment of certain rational but unique principles and methods, which have not only rendered success perennial, but its beneficent results phenomenal, and such as no one, not even the most sanguine, could have foreseen. At once it became apparent that the reform in Cambridge had come to stay. The unexampled triumph thus scored became contagious. The swift copying of its methods and success by Chelsea—a city of somewhat above half its size, but presenting very peculiar difficulties—accentuated the contagion. Many large towns and some cities swung into line, in generous rivalry; and Chelsea and Cambridge speakers and literature were in large demand, as, in fact, they still are. Nor was this phase of the movement confined to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. As a result of such a chain of circumstances, somewhat above one-half of the population of the State was delivered from the saloon.

But some of those who were in the thickest of this second stage of the agitation, who were much on the platform within and beyond the Commonwealth, and who were in consultation and correspondence as experts, saw clearly that dead line beyond which, even by employing the Cambridge methods, very little further success could reasonably be expected under existing conditions. The liquor traffic was entrenched. It held Boston, Worcester, Springfield, Lowell, Fall River, and other large places. At the most, only spasmodic reform had occurred in them since the advent of the local option law. Worse than this, the lethargy, the lack of public spirit, and the reluctance even to accept the rational and successful Cambridge principles which prevailed in many communities, convinced the persons to whom I have alluded of the necessity of introducing an auxiliary weapon.

What weapon was called for? A weapon which would impoverish the liquor traffic, which would deprive it of the means for systematically extending its plants and augmenting its sales, which would stop its steady stream of corrupting gold from flowing wherever it might avail in any no-license campaign throughout the commonwealth. Cambridge itself had never yet won, owing to this stream of gold, save by the skin of its teeth. Salem and Lynn, which had hopefully expelled the saloon, were bought back to its enslavement by the same gold. To find a weapon which would do this—which would insure local option that fair field which it had never yet had even in Massachusetts—was the quest.

The weapon was found in Norway. That country had greatly perfected the application of the Scandinavian principle. Better than this, as showing how alive and virile its movement was, it was steadily improving that application, as, for example, by turning, in the act of 1894, much of the profits of its "company system" of selling liquor, where liquor is sold, to so remote an object as the pensioning of old age, and, for another example, by enfranchising the women of Norway to vote on the license question.

What was proposed in Massachusetts was, accordingly, this: A trial of the Norwegian principle, applied, however, to all alcoholics, and not to spirits alone, as in Norway. This principle carried much further in yet other directions; but this principle only permissively applied, by an extension of the already existing local option legislation, surrounded by many safeguards, and only possible of application in municipalities definitely committed, by long usage, to license. The law submitted,—which failed virtually by but a single vote on its third reading in the Senate of 1894, after it had passed the House and the Senate thus far by handsome majorities, but which was defeated more than two to one on the first vote in the House of 1895,—the law submitted, I say, so improved the application of the Norwegian principle as greatly to outdistance Norway, but did not set it up, only authorized, in certain exceptional cases, its tentative trial where a community should be bent on having liquor sold, and stands, defeated though it is, as a document which cannot fail to mark a new day in the fight of civilization with the drink evil.

III. WHAT IS THE NORWEGIAN PRINCIPLE?

But what is the Norwegian principle? It is a blow at the sinews of war of the liquor traffic. It strikes at its base of supplies. "It is," as the Rochester (N.Y.) Democrat said editorially last March, in opposing it the morning after it had been advocated in that city, "it is a proposal that the liquor traffic commit hari-kari." No man under it may profit by the sale of liquor.

This principle,—which abundantly justifies itself by the awful economic drain upon the body politic which the liquor traffic is, by the tens of thousands of men whom it annually slays, and by the hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children whom it reduces to utmost misery,—this principle, when a long-suffering people shall once have asserted it, will have divided the question. There will then be no possibility of this vaster Tammany's hiding its deliberate trapping and destroying of human beings for gain, by diverting men's attention to abstract questions about sumptuary laws, about individual liberty, about the relation of alcohol to the human system, etc. Under this juggler's trick, under this solemn mockery,—like trying to entangle Parkhurst in the casuistry of the social evil,—yes, under this devilish fraud, the great vintners, brewers, and distillers of the country are very generally enlarging their outputs, setting up, under chattel mortgages, the retailers as their creatures, and, through the retailers, are violating every law, and, by the salted free lunch, by ropers-in and hangers-on of the saloon, by games, gambling, sex, and every other allurements which will work, are slaying men, women, children, wrecking homes, and draining away not only the moral, but even the economic life of the people. Were this rendered forever henceforth impossible, were the last dollar coined which might ever be coined in this way, drink would remain, one giant, and a very great and terrible one; but the other and the greater giant,—which, while you are smiting the first between the eyes, and are doing so even by its crafty incitement, knifes you in the small of the back,—that other and greater giant would be dead.

IV. HOW TO HAVE BEEN APPLIED IN MASSACHUSETTS.

The application of this principle was proposed in Massachusetts:—

1. In no town of less than five thousand people, lest some small town that had no excuse for a saloon might be tempted by novelty to have one of this kind.

2. In no municipality except those which the preceding three years had voted license, and so seemed bent on license.

3. In such a municipality (1) one per cent. of the legal voters must first have petitioned for a vote on it; (2) bonds, with heavy indemnity, must have been filed, guaranteeing the organization of a suitable company; (3) then, after the regular question on the ballot, "Shall licenses be granted?" should be inserted a second question, "If granted, shall they be granted under the Norwegian system?"

4. In case of a "Yes" vote, and also of a Norwegian vote, precautions were introduced, (1) insuring that the best of two or more applying companies should get the licenses, and (2) that no person having aught to do with the liquor traffic might own any stock in the company.

5. Furthermore, (1) it was made obligatory on the State Commissioner of Corporations to have oversight of each such company, to supervise its accounts and its methods, and to wind up any company which should violate the law; and (2), in the same direction, any citizen whatever might head off wrong-doing by the company through appeal for investigation to his county probate judge.

6. The company getting the chance to do business under such exceptional circumstances, and under such manifold safeguards, (1) should have a monopoly of all the licenses granted; (2) might take out only one license to three thousand people (one to five hundred in Boston, and one to one thousand elsewhere, is our present law); (3) should have a three years' trial (fairly to test its workings); (4) should accumulate a reserved fund large enough to protect it from losing its capital stock in case it should be put out of business, but only available by it for that purpose; (5) might have, after that accumulation, five per cent.

interest on money actually invested (only from one-half to one per cent. more than the interest usually paid by Massachusetts savings-banks); (6) should devote all additional proceeds—(a) not exceeding one-half to coffee-houses and reading-rooms to allure men away from drink, (b) not exceeding one-fifth to the city or town to prosecute violations of the liquor laws, or for extra police to secure better order, (c) not exceeding one-tenth to the county for extra probation officers (largely engaged with cases growing out of liquor), and (d) the remainder, which would be at least one-fifth of all—to the State for asylums, reform schools, etc., mainly rendered necessary by drink.

Local option, in its prevalent and salutary form, was left untouched, and, in fact, was carefully guarded. Local option was simply so extended that, if certain municipalities persisted in voting license, they might substitute a vastly less objectionable method of licensing for the prevalent one. This was forced on no community. It, as I have indicated, wiped out at one stroke, if tried, five-sixths of the saloons of Boston and two-thirds outside of Boston. It devoted all proceeds of liquor-selling, after about a savings-bank interest on money actually reinvested, either to alluring people away from drink or to paying the bills caused by drink. For so beneficent an organization as a railroad, if it maim or kill a man, must pay for it; but the saloon may kill men right along and get off scott free, except as, in Massachusetts, this proposal to turn a large part of its proceeds into its damages account was first advocated.

In short, a vast advance over anything in Norway, a proposal suited to the self-governing temper of our people, an experiment ready to be tried by men in the foremost rank in practical victories over the saloon, and a measure sure to eliminate from the liquor traffic, where persisted in, (1) private profits, which alone push it, (2) the awful, systematic, and elaborate allurements of men to drink, (3) the sale of adulterated and highly inflammatory liquors, and (4) saloon politics, with their paralysis of good government, in most instances,—all these were rejected in Massachusetts.

V. HOW WAS IT DEFEATED?

How? By prodigious efforts of the liquor interest of the State, of New England, and of the United States, aided by the State Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the State Prohibitory party, the State Total Abstinence Society, the Good Templars, and many leading clergymen and others prominent in the fight with the drink evil. They and the giant traffic joined hands to forbid a rational and hopeful experiment in Massachusetts in the direction of disarming the money power of the giant, and joined hands to compel municipalities determined on selling liquor to sell it in the worst possible way rather than in the best.

For, unlike the town agency in Massachusetts in earlier days, and unlike the State's going into the business, according to the South Carolina plan, the matter was to be left, should a community refuse to prohibit the sale of liquor, in private hands. The State was not to touch it; but those private hands must be private hands hating the traffic, and only taking it up where communities would have liquor sold, in order to sell the least possible amount rather than the largest possible.

Why did so many great temperance organizations and so many prominent temperance advocates thus join hands with the liquor interest of Massachusetts, of New England, and of the United States, to defeat a proposal which it was evident that the liquor people dreaded as they had not dreaded anything for years? Because they did not see the hole in the tub. Because they failed to perceive that the question needs dividing. Because it escaped their attention that the fight of civilization with the drink evil has two objectives, two giants to bring to earth, not one. In fact, conceiving there to be but one,—namely, drink,—and conceiving that to give place, even for an hour, to the assumption that drink will be sold for yet a bit longer was affording that giant aid and comfort, they sought to smite that giant between the eyes; while the other giant—human rapacity in selling drink and in multiplying the victims of drink—joined with them, apparently to strike the same blow, but really to knife their cause in the small of the back. It was the old juggler's trick. It was the greater Tammany trying to side-track a Parkhurstian endeavor.

VI. RECAPITULATION.

In speaking thus far, I have avoided the propositional, or logical, method. I have sought, the rather, to be suggestive, to create mental images, to percuss your moderation.

I think, however, that, notwithstanding such a method, I have succeeded in making three points somewhat plain, namely:—

1. What the Norwegian principle is;
2. Specifically, how, in an improved, skilfully adapted, and carefully guarded form, its application was proposed in Massachusetts,—the high-water mark of its proposed application anywhere in the world as yet; and
3. What an example, par excellence, its rejection in Massachusetts by the combined forces of the State, New England, and national liquor interests, and of several State temperance organizations and many Massachusetts temperance advocates,—what an example, par excellence, its rejection by such an amalgamation of forces affords of the hole in the tub, of the failure to divide the question, of the facility with which two antagonists, by persuading good men that there is but one, succeed in furthering passionate onslaughts on one of them, while the other renders that onslaught more than futile. It is a big bunco game, and the noble men and women who are deluded into playing it are legion.

If, now, I have made these three points moderately plain, what I have to say in closing is in a different method.

VII. THE NORWEGIAN PRINCIPLE RIGHTEOUS.

And, first, the Norwegian principle is righteous.

It is righteous to divide the question. It is righteous to simplify issues.

The slavery question was complex. The question whether "Old Glory" should be fired upon was simple. A handful of gunpowder burned in Charleston Harbor divided the question. Everybody could understand it then. It was not unrighteous to give the older wrangle a short rest, and to march to avenge that insult. But, by doing that, the older wrangle, the vaster question, the issue which hitherto had been so confusing, emerged, simplified itself, and got settled, too.

The drink question, in the abstract, is similarly complex. It divides the best men. Nearly three generations of the most arduous discussion have left them still at loggerheads. The jury ought to agree, but it won't. But there is one strand of the knotted cable of evidence which is clear, perfectly clear. You may know it, every most recalcitrant jurymen, by its unique blackness and by its spots of human gore. To untwist that strand, and to cast it out forever, the jury is competent,—ay, and willing,—if the judge will but recall it and so charge it.

That strand in the knotted cable of evidence, uniquely black, and spotted with human gore, is the systematized, steadily enlarging, and lawless pushing of the sale of liquor. While there doubtless are law-abiding liquor-sellers, as there were humane slave-holders, the class is lawless. It will sell adulterated and poisonous liquors. It will sell out of hours. It will sell to minors and intoxicated persons. It will lend itself as a cover to the vilest politics. It is shamelessly aggressive; it systematically allures in the weak; it salts its free lunch; it distributes gift packages of liquor to start men on speers. Amusements, gambling, sex, are the bait which it freely uses to induce drinking. Its retailers, mainly, are but the tools of the manufacturers or wholesalers, who use them and their methods to create a market for an ever-increasing output. It is a leech upon human society.

To untwist that strand in the knotted cable of this great question, and to cast it out by suffering no man to profit by the sale of liquor in those communities which insist on having liquor sold, is righteous.

On the one hand, no equities on the liquor side stand in the way; for the underlying assumption of existing legislation is that the State may regulate or prohibit sales as it will, and the crimes of the liquor traffic, and the desolation which follows in its track, abundantly justify such an overt act.

On the reforming side, on the other hand, to divide a complex question, to unite a now discordant people on a proposition to which, when they understand it, most of them will agree, is righteous; that is, if it is righteous to exercise common sense.

This blow at one giant, indeed, for the moment, neglects the other; but it is not unlawful to let up on one highwayman, if another is stabbing you in the back.

Besides, this proposal nowise prejudices the fight with the other highwayman. Our rejected Massachusetts law was framed sedulously to conserve in every way the interests of the direct fight with drink, while it provided a new way of fighting the rapacity of the drink traffic, if communities should insist on having drink sold within their limits. Communities were allowed and incited, as now, to cast out the drink traffic; but, if they would not, then haters, rather than the lovers, of the traffic might undertake it, in from one-third to one-sixth of the present places, without profit, proceeds to be used to allure men away from drink, or to pay part of the damages caused by drink, and sales to be made with the object of selling the least possible rather than the most possible.

That haters of the traffic should undertake it seemed, however, to opponents of the law in Massachusetts a moral offence, a doing evil that good might come. The answer to this is that motive affects moral action; that to give whiskey in a Keeley cure or in sickness is no moral offence; that this was to give whiskey where men would have whiskey, in order to give the least, in order to bring drinking to an end, and in order to compel that traffic to commit hari-kari, which, so long as it may go on unmolested in any place, will find ways to stab in the back the most arduous temperance effort. To do this, so far from being immoral, were a moral act, a highly moral act,—an act of heroism, indeed, worthy of a Moses who did certain regrettable things because of the hardness of men's hearts, and of the Nazarene who made wine at Cana because a more excellent way was not as yet practicable.

VIII. PARAMOUNT IMPORTANCE OF THE NORWEGIAN PRINCIPLE.

But the Norwegian principle is more than righteous. Its application in temperance reform is of paramount importance.

I. Though conditions in Scandinavia, and even in Norway, are far from satisfactory, and though, in excepting fermented drinks from its operation, direct tests of its workings there are difficult, still, in the judgment of the fairest and most competent minds, the principle has there done, relatively, more than any other single principle has done in any other country for temperance. On its record, therefore, it is important that it be tried in America.

II. But, even had it failed in Scandinavia,—and its imperfect trial, under difficult conditions, might readily have caused it to fail,—its underlying ideas are the dictates of common sense. These ideas are:—

1. Go on with the total abstinence reform. Go on with efforts for prohibition in its likeliest form; namely, local prohibition. Push local option all you can.
2. Where that is impracticable, damage the liquor traffic all you can, and by a new method involving:—
 - (1) No profits.
 - (2) No allurements.
 - (3) Only pure drinks, with as low a per cent. of alcohol as the buyer will take.
 - (4) A multitude of restraining regulations which haters of the traffic, joined in a company to carry it on, will make and enforce, but which could scarcely under the other régime be got upon the statute books or enforced.
 - (5) Politics eliminated.
 - (6) The proceeds used by the Massachusetts proposal, partly to allure men away from drink by maintaining coffee-houses, reading-rooms, etc., where men's social needs may be met instead of, as now, in the saloon, and partly to pay so much as may be of the damages caused by drink.
 - (7) Motive: sell the least possible, not the most possible, as now.

In short, the record (I.) and the reason in the case (II.) alike call for the Norwegian principle.

When it prevails, the question will be divided, the people will get a chance at it, the hole in the tub will be stopped, the worse of the two giants will be dead, and the other of them will be doomed.

THE COMMITTEE OF FIFTY.

BY REV. F. G. PEABODY, D.D.

Mr. President,—Before I speak of the matter which I have been asked to present, I should like to call attention to the significance of the programme which has been prepared for this meeting. Rev. Father Doyle is the secretary of the Roman Catholic Total Abstinence Alliance, the editor of the Catholic Review, and a member of the House of Paulist Fathers. He comes to us as a representative of the new awakening of the spirit of temperance reform in the Roman Catholic Church,—an awakening which had its expression a few weeks ago in a great convention in New York,—an awakening which, on the whole, is the most promising aspect of temperance work in this land to-day. Then, on the other hand, my dear friend, Mr. Beach, comes to us out of the circle of orthodox Congregational churches. He has long been the centre of philanthropic and municipal reform in Cambridge, where he is sometimes described as the "altruistic cyclone," and sometimes as "the incarnated Cambridge idea." These two men, thus bidden to our meeting, come to us from as different schools of thought as can well be imagined; yet there is no communion too remote from their own faiths and no association too small to claim their help. This is a cause which unites all thoughtful men in its constant and burning interests. It deals with the one great, overwhelming evil of our day, and it needs all the light and all the help there are to testify and to condemn. So we gather round us here those who will strengthen our hands, and all conditions of creed or sect or judgment in detail disappear as we all stand together with the one great hope before us of a redeemed and purified land. I think we ought to realize the large unity into which we enter, and appreciate what it means, and to give our friends a hearty and cordial greeting.

When I turn from the burning words of Mr. Beach to the plain statement I have to offer you, I find myself in the position of a man who was once at a crowded meeting, and who wanted to have the windows opened. He tried repeatedly to get the attention of the chairman, but was repeatedly called to order, and at last had to protest: "I don't want to make a speech: I simply have something to say." Your president has asked me to say something of the special enterprise now being arranged by the so-called Committee of Fifty, and the first thing to say is that this work of this Committee of Fifty is not properly to be described as a new method of temperance reform. It does not take its place among the temperance agitations of the time. It has no partisan end to gain. It proposes no competition with prevailing measures of temperance work. The Committee of Fifty is solely an organization in the interest of research. It sets before itself the problem of discovering a little more truth on a subject manifestly complex and obscure. The committee was formed on the assumption that in many details of the drink question there is much yet to learn. It observes on every hand differences of judgment on most important aspects of the question among most intelligent persons, and it seeks to find the truth. The origin of this Committee of Fifty has always seemed to me suggestive. Two years ago a young student of physiology in Harvard University came to one of his instructors, and reported what might be called a young man's vision. This youth had been concerned with many phases of temperance work, and had observed the lack of confidence which many persons feel as to the scientific truth on which reform must rest. So this young man said to himself: "Is it not possible that there should be brought together on this subject some consensus of the competent? Is it not conceivable that we should get, approximately, all the learning there is, and unite it for this service, and publish its evidence for the good of all? Is it not possible, for instance, that the scientific physiologists of this country should be so brought together that they could speak one message, and give as nearly as may be the weight of all their knowledge on this subject? Is it not possible, again, that the varied legislation of this country may be so studied and interpreted by competent observers that their conclusions shall be regarded with a degree of confidence which does not now exist? It was out of this young man's vision that the Committee of Fifty came into being. Thus the committee is a body of men who are concerning themselves solely with investigation. The same philanthropic desire which moves any of us is, of course, their motive; but they strictly limit their immediate purpose to scientific and competent research. This committee is composed of persons of the most varied creeds and professions. There are Roman Catholic priests and Protestant bishops, physicians, lawyers, presidents of universities, professors from different parts of the land. It has for its president President Seth Low of Columbia University, New York, and for its vice-president Charles Dudgey Warner, for its treasurer W. E. Dodge, and for its executive committee Dr. J. G. Billings of Washington, President C. W. Eliot, President Francis A. Walker, and Col. Jacob L. Greene of Hartford, Conn. The committee has the privilege of paying its own bills. Each member pays his own expenses, and there are also procured from members of the committee and from its friends the considerable funds needed for the researches which it undertakes.

The Committee of Fifty is subdivided into various sub-committees devoted to the different aspects of this research. The so-called physiological sub-committee represents what is practically the whole of scientific physiology in this country. It has associated with it a large number of associate members; and this sub-committee is now engaged in laboratory researches and in procuring statistical information as to the habits of educated men. The Legislative Committee is composed of President Low, President Eliot, and Hon. James C. Carter of New York. These gentlemen have instituted at very considerable expense large researches in comparative legislation. They have examined the legislation of Maine, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Iowa, Missouri, South Carolina; and an important report on this most difficult and much debated subject is now in course of preparation. The so-called Ethical Sub-committee is now engaged in a large number of researches regarding the relation of the drink problem to the home, to the social instinct, to food, and to various other aspects of social and ethical life. Thus a large series of inquiries is already begun, and there is reasonable hope of obtaining a body of facts which, then, in their turn, the practical and philanthropic movements may turn to account.

When one examines this serious investigation, he is struck by several things. Its first remarkable trait is the extraordinary degree of interest manifested by busy men in this subject of public welfare. Sometimes we grow discouraged at the lack of interest in public affairs among the leaders of our thought. Those who should be the most competent seem to withdraw themselves from public concerns. But the experience of the Committee of Fifty renews one's faith in the capacity for public spirit. From all manner of business and cares, from the banker's desk and the professor's study, with the scientific man's wisdom and the philanthropist's zeal, this body of busy people come together from time to time, spending a whole day in conference, and giving themselves with a singular devotedness to this matter which seems so slightly to concern their own lives. It is a great thing to be assured that, if a subject of public welfare can be approached in a scientific spirit and with a comprehensive purpose, there is likely to be no lack of faithful service. Still further, it is plain that a large number of the most conscientious and the most competent of our people are not yet attached to service in the temperance cause, and have not found themselves able to enlist in the current methods of reform. While they bid God-speed to many a practical movement, they find themselves, by conviction or by business, debarred from active service. In the work of the Committee of Fifty many of these men have found their place. They are most interested in the discovery of truth. They believe that the truth makes men free, and so they give themselves to this new form of scientific philanthropy with a peculiar zeal.

The second point of interest in the work of the Committee of Fifty is this,—that it is concerned with the search for wisdom. Here is the service which seems to be most necessary in the social movements of the time. We need wisdom, scientific method, a solid basis of truth. It has, indeed, been a great blessing to the American world that in successive generations it has been swept over by great waves of emotional activity in temperance reform. It is even now true that the heart of the nation, if it is to be touched at all, must be touched, not by an appeal to reason, but by an appeal to enthusiasm. And yet, as society grows more complex, and as we perceive the intimate relations of one social movement to others which at first seem remote, we recognize the demand for a science of reform; and we turn with new interest to scientific investigation. We have seen this of late in our charity work. For years philanthropy went its way as an expression of emotional interest, without any thought of scientific method. But of late we have attained something which may be called a science of charity. Many people find it a hard, unsympathetic science; and it is hard and unsympathetic, just as the rock on which you build your home cannot contain the sympathies of home, and must be hard under your feet. And yet the security of the sentiment of charity is in that rock of scientific method on which it now rests, and which gives it stability and confidence. It will be the same with the movements of temperance reforms when they are known to rest on verified and generally accepted truth.

There is still another aspect in which the Committee of Fifty is interesting. It represents a quite unprecedented union of forces, and the most discouraging thing about trying to do good in the modern world is the cohesiveness of evil and the divisive tendency of the good. Here is the Christian Church, which ought to be a single mighty power for the redemption of the world, rent with dissensions, robbed of its power, and exhibiting through all its history the curse of its sectarianism. One of my colleagues returned not long ago from Athens, and told us that an American woman came one day to the American school, and asked for a guide to the Acropolis. One of our scholars went with her, and showed her the temples, and said to her, "Here was a temple of Pallas Athene, and here one of Victory, and here, perhaps, the very altar where Saint Paul read the inscription dedicating it to the unknown God." And the American woman responded, "Why, this seems just like home,—so many denominations!" So many denominations; and meantime the devil laughs at the impotence of the divided Church! So many denominations in our politics, and political profligacy chuckles at the divisions among the good. So much sectarianism in the temperance cause; and, meantime, the drink traffic, self-contented, united, smiles at these divisions among its enemies. And so this Committee of Fifty makes its contribution to that unity of spirit which is the bond of strength as well as peace. Are we not one army in this common cause, with different weapons, indeed, with different ways of attack,—some gallantly leading the charge, some called to be engineers, and to plan the scientific method of attack,—and yet all one army, with one great enemy to conquer,—the temptations and lusts that beset our modern life,—with one banner above us all, and on it written those greatest words of human history, "For their sakes I sanctify myself," and with one victory to win,—the victory of the spirit over the flesh, which shall give us a redeemed and purified people, a nation with foundations of soberness and self-denial, wherein the weak shall be upheld by the example of the strong; and no man shall so live, while the world standeth, as to make his brother to offend.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM AND INTemperance.

BY REV. A. P. DOYLE, GENERAL SECRETARY OF THE CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE UNION OF AMERICA.

To the Members of the Unitarian Temperance Society:—

The Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America extends you greeting. It means much for me to be here. My presence here, besides being indicative of the passing away of the age of fierce theological antipathies and religious animosities which have so long divided the human race into many contending camps, lays special stress on the fact that there is common ground on which we may unite our forces if we would lift up man to that higher morality and larger spiritual life which, in the designs of his Creator, is his ultimate goal.

It may not come in our day that all men will consent to sink their theological differences, and be of one mind on all the many points of dogmatic belief; but it is a long step toward Christian unity when we have joined our hands against a common foe and consecrated our hearts to the same high and holy purpose. To bridge the chasm through which for generations have flowed the dark and noisome waters of religious bigotry, it will not be found an inconvenient thing to have a middle ground where we can firmly plant the pediments of our structure, on which we can both stand with equal confidence to swing the arches that will make a broad roadway for the children of the next generation to come and go. No higher ground can be found, and none that will give us surer footing or inspire us with higher courage than the sacred ground of temperance.

Temperance work has for its special purpose the cultivation of a higher natural manhood, which is the fertile soil wherein the highest religious virtues flourish. The practice of total abstinence tones up the physical man, elevates the standards of morality, enlarges the sympathies of the heart, and thus creates the very best substratum on which the civic virtues of patriotism and good citizenship as well as the supernatural virtues of love for God and the truest charity for our neighbor can be built.

It is my privilege, then, to bring to you the fraternal greetings from sixty-five thousand total abstainers organized in the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America.

They are the choicer spirits in all parts of the country who have seen and have been infatuated by the higher type of physical, civic, and spiritual manhood, and have consecrated their best energies to its development in themselves and its realization in others. They are the heroic souls who have been willing to sacrifice their best efforts in a cause which would save humanity from the withering scourge of drunkenness, a cause that would protect the homes of the land from the ravaging wolf of vice, a cause that appeals to the highest instincts in a man's heart,—the sacred cause of temperance.

In this sacred consecration that is born of devotion to the same ideals we have found a new brotherhood that sooner or later will eliminate our differences, and eventuate in that Christian unity for which the Christ prayed when he begged his heavenly Father to keep them in his name that, "as thou, Father, in me, and I in thee, art one, that they may be one in us." There is no need of enlarging here on the virulent character of the drink plague as it affects the American people or its widespreadness, exempting no rank or condition of life, or the awful havoc it has made wherever it has held sway. Too often have our hearts been wrenched in agony over the pitiless ruin it has caused. No need is there to convince ourselves anew that, if the danger is not averted, the springs of the civic and religious life will be poisoned, and not only will America fail of her mission,—that of bringing a larger liberty and a higher happiness to all classes,—but the divine purpose in the saving of souls will be defeated.

This conviction, already deep in our hearts, has brought us together to-day. But, rather, I deem it my duty to bring to you a knowledge of our methods and a statement of results obtained, hoping in the communication of these truths that we may be the more closely united in the work, and be urged on to more heroic effort in the accomplishment of the task set us to do.

Our common purpose is to antagonize all those agencies that foster the vice of drunkenness. The end we strive to attain is to make men temperate: the means we use is the preaching by word and pen and enforcing by example the practice of total abstinence.

The Catholic Total Abstinence Union does not affirm that intoxicating drink is an evil in itself or that the use of it, theoretically speaking, is wrong; but it does assert that here, in the highly complex life of our American civilization, with its high-strung, nervous tension, where we live faster, think more rapidly, act more quickly, and die sooner, the use of alcoholic stimulant is exceedingly liable to abuse, and, if we would avoid the abuse, the safer way is to deny ourselves the use of intoxicating drink. We do not say that by any primary law of God or man all men are bound to the practice of total abstinence. But we do say that many, with whom to use is to abuse, are bound to abstain; that many others who would themselves never abuse drink for the sake of the weaker brother should never use it. And, finally, if alcoholic stimulants were completely eradicated from the common life of the people, the physical health of the race would be better, many of the great problems that perplex our commonwealth would be solved, and religion would have a better opportunity of carrying out its regenerating influence in the hearts of the people.

Therefore, we claim it to be the part of the Christian liberty wherewith we are all endowed to be free to deny ourselves if we choose; but we preach that, in the presence of a wide-spread evil, men who would serve their race and generation cannot do choicer work than come up with us on the high battle plain and fight under our white banner. It becomes almost a paramount duty among men of light and leading to shine as models of abstinence, that they may stand out as brave fighters against this deplorable evil among the people of this generation.

We recognize in the liquor traffic, as organized in this country, an agency whose whole purpose is not simply to satisfy the legitimate thirsts of the people; but it is a conspiracy whose avowed object is to create that thirst.

It is the thirst for the stimulating alcohol that is at the bottom of the drink habit. By methods known to itself, the American saloon conspires to create that thirst: hence we have set our faces fixed and resolute against the American saloon. If to-morrow we could do away with it and place in its stead a substitute that would be simply a purveyor of the legitimate wants of the people, we would say the word, and watch it go down to its destruction with happy glee. Politically, as a body, we are not Prohibitionists, nor are we anything. We have kept free from all political entanglements. There is no member instructed to vote with any party, nor is he instructed not to vote with the Prohibition party. He is left free to his own political conscience. Our Union has defined its attitude over and over again as one of uncompromising hostility to the saloon power. It esteems it not only as the fostering mother of intemperance, but it is the great national menace of our liberties that must go down if America would live.

OUR METHODS.

This is our platform: our methods are the choicest American methods of agitation. We make it our business to enforce public sentiment. In every possible way we can we preach the gospel of total abstinence. From altar and platform, through the press, from the house-top, we frown down on and endeavor to make odious the drinking customs of society. Our publication department has sent out in the three years of its existence twenty-five million pages of literature. Our local societies are organized on religious, social, or literary lines: we care not what their nature be as long as the members enlist under the banner of total abstinence.

Personally, we are total abstainers, first, last, and all the time, and then in public life, by eternally keeping at it. We hope to create a sentiment that will sooner or later relegate saloon-going and saloon-keeping to the shades of undesirable things. It used to be considered that a temperance society was merely a reformatory institution wherein broken-down drunkards were straightened out and kept sober. But we have advanced away beyond that stage. Recreative work among children, the organization of cadet societies among boys and girls, the ladies' auxiliary societies, the formation of young men's societies,—all these have incorporated a class of people under our movement so large that the vast majority of our organized members is made up of those who have never known the taste of intoxicating drinks.

WHAT WE HAVE ACCOMPLISHED.

Last summer our organization celebrated its silver jubilee: it was a happy time to sit down and reckon with the past. It was over fifty years ago, in 1838, that Father Mathew began his great crusade. Of him your own Channing has said that "history records no revolution like his." Father Mathew, the leader of this moral revolution, ranks far above heroes and statesmen of his time. But not until then were all the scattered societies united into the national organization. What have we accomplished in the past twenty-five years? A knowledge of the times is needed to compare results. The war has settled forever the great problem of human slavery on American soil; but a complex set of conditions existed which were destined to create a slavery far deeper and more galling than the black slavery of the South. A spirit of lawlessness was abroad, born of the wild life of the camp, increased by the ruin of so many homes, leaving thousands of irresponsibles without stake in the evil and far from the softening influences of home life. Then came reviving material prosperity. The smoke of thousands of factories, built seemingly in a day, began to blacken the sky. Then came the great rush to the cities, the people turning their backs on the quiet rural avocations to plunge into the fevered, exciting life of the cities; and, as though to make city confusion doubly confounded, there came to our shores a mighty tidal wave of humanity fleeing from the thralldom of despotism. The emigrant enlarged our already congested cities. He brought to us a sturdy nature and no little virtue, but he brought his weaknesses and vices as well. Not the least of his weaknesses was in many instances to misconstrue his newly gained liberty into license, and to make it the occasion of rioting and dissipation. Such a spectacle I do not think ever presented itself before a seething mass of people, with little of the restraints of home life, with newly acquired liberty, with plenteous stream of labor earnings flowing into them. Such a hot-bed was fertile soil for the rank growth of the saloon with all its vices. Ambitious place-hunting men seized the convenient avenues the saloon offered to rid the place of mastery over their fellow-men. To pander to the appetites of this motley urban population afforded an easy way of making money. Hence the saloon easily became a corruptionist factor. It prospered and waxed fat by draining the workman's home of his generous earning. It added the glitter and tinsel of wealth to its fascinations; while in the same ratio the homes of the wage-earner were robbed of its little luxuries and, in too many instances, of the necessities of life. The pitiless demon of intemperance set up his shrine behind the gilded bar, and lured his victims on to fill the jails, the work-houses, the penitentiaries, and the insane asylums.

These few side-lights, as it were, give us a picture of the American city over a generation ago. To the earnest believer in the mission of America it was a disheartening sight. Although Wendell Phillips was a stout champion of manhood suffrage, yet the sight of our saloon-ridden cities made him declare that "universal suffrage was a sham as long as rum ruled the large cities." A generation has passed; and what a change has taken place during these fleeting years! Make the contrast, and see the onward and upward tend of the tide of Christian sentiment. In the early days of our movement it was not an unusual thing to account drunkenness an amiable weakness, and the drunkard a good fellow, but a little weak: to-day the vice has been stripped of its false disguise, and is pilloried in the open mart as a horrid and disgusting evil; and, in the place of pity and sympathy, the drunkard receives condemnation and punishment. A generation ago the drunkard-maker moved in the best society; he held the first seats in the synagogue: to-day there is none so poor to do him honor, his business is put under the ban, and, where permitted to be at all, is surrounded by abundant safeguards in order to paralyze its evil-producing power. Twenty-five years ago the social glass adorned every festive occasion: to-day the best public sentiment of the land is arrayed against the saloon power.

Undoubtedly, a great change has come over the face of our cities; and the change has been wrought to a very great extent by an agency that many who have not known this have given her the least credit for it, yet her work has been done silently, constantly, at close range, and effectually. In the midst of the fevered city of this country there has been silently going to and fro, in and out, a vast army of noble-hearted and self-sacrificing men and women, who had put away from them all the joys of domestic life, who were eager with a desire to uplift humanity, whose duties took them into the tenements of the poor, by the sick-bed, who exhorted in season and out of season to cleaner and better lives, and who were able to enforce their exhortation in the solitudes of the confessional and by the death-bed.

It has been the characteristics of these religious factors that they have not been content to sit idly within the sanctuary rail, but have boldly attacked the ravening wolves who have made desolate the homes of the poor. This quiet, silent, but mighty force has been working for the last generation amid the great mass of our city populations; and little wonder that the ferment has leavened the whole mass. The urban population of America has been by a large majority Catholic; and, because the saloon has been a city upgrowth, the unfriendly critic at times said that there was an alliance between the Church and the saloon. The same unfriendly critic found the Catholic name above the grog-shops and the saloon money in the church collections.

But it is well known to the thoughtful that in the Baltimore Plenary Council of 1865 the Church officially assumed the attitude of most decided antagonism to the saloon. She repeated the denunciation of the saloon in no unmeasured terms frequently since that time. This spirit of her official decrees has been effectually enforced in the ethical teaching of her practical ministry, and it is to this constant practical and effectual antagonism of the Church to the saloon that we may credit much of the regeneration that has taken place in our city life. It has been acknowledged by the most unfriendly that there has not been in our great cosmopolitan cities an ethical power so potent in its influences for the regeneration and uplifting of the masses as the Church, and the right arm of the Church in this work has been the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America.

The success that has been achieved in the past is a pledge of what will be done in the future. To purge the Augean stables was not a work to be done in a day. The aspirations for higher and better things once developed and fostered by the same small possession will rapidly grow in its growth and increase in its strength. Many of our most perplexing problems have been already solved or are on a fair way to their solution. The twentieth century will usher in a new era of prosperity for Church and country. We are better equipped for more effectual work. The time of rough ploughing and grubbing up of unsightly stumps has gone by: the time of cheering harvests is at hand. The pioneer work has been done, and the fruitage of all this hard work needs but to be gathered in.

BUSINESS RECORD.

The meeting of the Unitarian Temperance Society was held in All Souls' Church, Washington, D.C., on Wednesday afternoon, October 23, the president, Rev. C. R. Eliot, in the chair.

In opening the meeting, Mr. Eliot said, in substance: We come here face to face with one of the greatest social problems of our time. When I use the word "social," I point to a change that has taken place in this temperance discussion. Not many years ago the temperance problem might have been called a problem for individuals, that is, it dealt chiefly with the rescue of individuals from intemperance. The problem remains the same to-day, only it has taken to itself a still larger meaning. Individual rescue is still the object of our endeavor, but we are now looking at the question as one which deals with society and the welfare of society at large. The temperance question enters into the problem of a people's health, the problem of crime, the problem of poverty and its remedy. It is from that point of view that we are to discuss it this afternoon. We are looking at it with calmer eyes than has sometimes been done, and the watchwords are investigation on the one hand and education on the other. The agencies that are at work to-day—and we may be thankful that it is so—are science, the Church, and the law. All three of these agencies we have represented here this afternoon.

The addresses printed above then followed, Father Doyle's paper being read in his enforced absence by Mr. Eliot.

During the meeting a telegram was received from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which was holding its session at Baltimore, bringing cordial greetings from that body, to which a reply of the same tenor was sent by unanimous vote.

The church was well filled, and the meeting was certainly one of the best the society has ever held. Regret was expressed that Father Doyle was unable to be present personally.

IN JAPAN.

There are thirty palaces belonging to the imperial family in various parts of Japan; but the present emperor has never occupied more than three or four of them, and some of them he has never seen. There is a stock farm at Nikko belonging to the mikado; and tourists are always amused at a large, oddly painted sign which advertises milk from his cows for sale. The emperor seldom leaves the new palaces at Tokyo, which are more modern and comfortable than any of the others, and were only completed in 1888. They consist of a labyrinth of one-story buildings, all connected by covered passages and surrounding beautiful courts. Their architecture is of the ancient Japanese style, with high roofs at sharp angles and heavy gray tiles; and the interior of most of them is finished in the native fashion, with partitions of sliding screens and floor matting, which the inmates use for beds, chairs, and tables, as it happens to be necessary. But several of the rooms have French furniture of ornate and expensive workmanship, much of it being rosewood, handsomely carved and inlaid. The apartments occupied by both the emperor and empress are furnished in that way. Both prefer to sleep in a modern bed and sit on a chair before a table, with knives and forks and china when they take their meals; but the emperor is understood to wear the native dress, except on occasions of ceremony, and, when the empress retires to the privacy of her apartments, she throws off her close-fitting waist and corsets and puts on the more comfortable kimono. The Churchman.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

The great Conference, with its inspiring and encouraging influence, has been held; and the Register has reported it fully, and, I am sure, satisfactorily. The Treasurer did not dare test Mr. Barrows's generosity by offering any Book-room talk while the columns of the paper were so crowded; but, now that the report is completed, perhaps we may come again with our little budget of books and notes.

First we want to call attention to a new edition, "The House Beautiful," by Rev. W. C. Gannett. This is a fine edition that sells for fifty cents net, and it comes just in time for the holiday trade. We need not speak of the book itself. Few books in our rooms are better known or more generally admired. We hope to be able to announce the publication of Mr. Gannett's admirable paper on "Incarnation," given at Washington, before very long. Meantime it may be found in the last number of the Register.

"Ethical Addresses," by various lecturers of ethical societies. Ten addresses by Felix Adler, William M. Salter, W. L. Sheldon, M. M. Mangasarian. 194 pages. Price $1.00 net.

"This Goodly Frame, the Earth," by Francis Tiffany. A book of travel delightfully written, and one that is sure to meet with a large sale. Mr. Tiffany is so well known, and his writings so generally admired, that any work of his would be favorably considered by the public. But this book, which is made up of personal impressions received during his recent journey round the world, will be doubly enjoyed for the information it contains and the very attractive manner in which it is presented. 361 pages. Price $1.13.

We also have some copies of Dr. Herford's Dudleian lecture at Harvard College recently. 10 cents per copy.

President G. Stanley Hall, of Clark University, Worcester, Mass., gave us one of the most interesting and valuable addresses of the Conference. President Hall is the editor of two quarterlies, both devoted to the special branches of study and investigation in which he is engaged. One is entitled the Pedagogical Seminary, the other, The American Journal of Psychology, $4.00 per annum. Single copies, $1.50. We have a few copies of such on our table, if any of our friends would like to have them. Dr. Hall's work is along the most advanced lines, and no doubt he will soon make some very important additions to our stock of information on the subjects of Psychology and Pedagogics.

VISITS.

The National Conference, of course, was the great event of the year. Sunday after Conference, with old friends at Wilmington, Del., a day of refreshment, though perhaps not of rest; but there are some occupations make us glad to be weary, and this was one of them. Thursday, October 31, with "Ministers' League for Practical Work," a delightful meeting at the lovely home of Dr. Bradley, at the "Three Arches" in Brookline. This organization is a helpful one to all of us engaged in the work of the denomination. Some steps were taken at this meeting that were surely in the right direction. Framingham, Mass., Sunday, November 3, to speak concerning the work of the Association. A lovely day, and a fair congregation. From Framingham to Worcester in the evening, to speak to a union meeting of our three churches there.

A few weeks since we tried to have this meeting; but the rains descended, and prevented it. This time the heavens smiled upon us, and we had a large congregation. We hope to hear a good report from the churches in Worcester; and, judging from the past, we think we have a right to expect it.

Wednesday, November 6, Plymouth and Bay Conference at the old town of Hingham, in the North Church. A fine day, the tone of the meeting was healthy, and the views expressed were generally hopeful.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNITARIAN UNION.

This new national organization is slowly getting into form to present its propositions to the young people of our churches. If the spirit of criticism does not get the better of our enthusiasm, this movement ought to result finally in a combined attempt to promote the cause of truth, as understood by Unitarians, and those who naturally find their spiritual home with them,—an attempt that is sure to be successful if it can be made all together.

We understand that it is not intended to interfere with existing organizations, but rather to supplement and bind together what we have into a national organization.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

The Sunday School.

THE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON.—The second regular meeting, thirteenth season, 1895-96, will be held in the parlors of the Church of the Disciples, corner of Warren Avenue and West Brookline Street, Monday, November 18. Subjects: "The Place and Function of Sunday-schools in Church Life," by Rev. S. H. Roblin, pastor of Second Universalist Church in Boston; "The Place of Doctrines and Morals in Sunday-school Instruction," by Mrs. Kate Gannett Wells of Boston, Committee on Hospitality, Mrs. Christopher R. Eliot, Miss Bertha D. Eaton, Miss Frances I. Rust, Miss Emma W. Lee, Mr. Richard C. Humphreys.

The usual Channing Hall "Talk" will be held next Saturday, November 16, at 25 Beacon Street, at 2.30 P.M., conducted by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. The "Review Lesson" will be treated. All cordially invited.

Following its custom, the Unitarian Sunday School Society is now sending out its "Annual Appeal to Individual Donors." For many years friends of the society and those interested in Sunday-school work have assisted by donations of various sums of money, according to inclination and ability. The Sunday School Society appeals through the Register for remembrances of this kind. Remittances can be forwarded to Mr. Richard C. Humphreys, treasurer, 141 Franklin Street, Boston. This organization has expended more money than ever the past few years in providing helps for Sunday-schools. Will those interested in providing a future for our Unitarian churches, and in sustaining the moral and religious training of our youth, hold up the hands of the Sunday School Society by contributions to its treasury?

No. 7 of Every Other Sunday, November 24, will be the Thanksgiving issue. The honored day of household memories and gatherings is pleasantly recalled by various stories, pictures, and poems. Christmas has done a great deal to draw away from Thanksgiving Day commemoration, but there is still good reason for cherishing this fireside anniversary.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning: announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

WORCESTER LEAGUE.—The Worcester League of Unitarian Women will meet on Wednesday, November 20, at the Church of the Unity, Worcester. Subject, "Our City Schools." Morning session at eleven o'clock. All women are invited.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel: Afternoon services will begin next Sunday, November 17, at 3.30. Some changes have been made in the old form of evening prayer, and a small book has been printed which will be used next Sunday for the first time. There will be a short sermon, and more than the usual amount of music. A special feature of these services will be the introduction of some piece of music, like a violin solo by some competent performer. The choir consists of Mrs. Francis Wood, Miss Lena Little, Mr. W. J. Winch, and Mr. Max Heinrich. Mr. B. J. Lang is the organist. All seats are free, and the public is cordially invited.

The Wednesday noon services will begin on Wednesday, December 4, and will continue until Easter, as in former years. The first service will be conducted by Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D.

Ministers' Monday Club: November 18, 10.30 A.M., Rev. Richard W. Boynton will preside. Rev. Theodore P. Prudden of the Congregational church (Trinitarian) of West Newton will give the address on "Christian Unity." Prof. Herron of Chicago Hull House will be present. The public invited.

Parker Memorial: The Sunday evening services at this place (corner of Berkeley and Appleton Streets), which have been so popular during the past two winters, will be resumed November 17, at 7.30 o'clock. The sermon will be preached by Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D. Special music by the Weber Quartette. The general subject for the entire course is "Outlooks over Life, Duty, and Destiny." All seats free, and a welcome to every one. The Benevolent Fraternity of Churches, under whose auspices all the work at the Parker Memorial is conducted, will carry on Sunday evening services at various points in the city. One object is to provide a church home for the churchless.

Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): A special series of Sunday evening meetings will begin on November 17, at eight o'clock. The general subject will be "Makers of Modern Society"; and the following order will be observed: November 17, Rev. John Graham Brooks will speak upon "The Wage-earner"; November 24, Rev. Thomas Van Ness, upon "The Preacher"; December 1, Rev. M. J. Savage, upon "The Business Man"; December 8, Rev. S. W. Brooke, upon "The Poet"; December 15, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, upon "The Home-maker." To these, as to all other meetings, all are cordially invited. The regular afternoon service is held at 3.15 o'clock; Sunday-school at 1.45. The Winkley Guild meets at 7.

Second Church: There is considerable stir and activity in the Second Church this season. Mr. Van Ness has the added help of Mr. C. A. Langston of the Divinity School, and Miss Kate L. Brown in the Sunday-school primary. The ladies of the Benevolent Society are to hold a reception and fair November 20 and 21, proceeds to go toward a "General Improvement Fund" for the church. It is expected that this entertainment will be more than an ordinary fair, as great preparations have been made by the ladies for more than a year looking to the success of the undertaking. It is particularly requested that ladies from all the other Unitarian churches in Boston be present in the evenings at the receptions, in order to promote acquaintance and good fellowship among those of our denominations.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.—Rev. John C. Kimball is taking charge of the Unitarian work in this place during the absence of Rev. J. T. Sunderland.

BROOKLINE, MASS.—Rev. John P. Forbes of Taunton will preach in the First Parish Church next Sunday, November 17.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.—All Souls' Church has extended a call to Mr. and Mrs. L. W. Sprague of San Francisco. Mr. Sprague preached here October 13, and Mrs. Sprague has been supplying the pulpit since.

CARTHAGE, MO.—The ordination of Mr. F. W. Bennett of the last class of Harvard Divinity School took place Monday evening, November 4. The quaint little chapel, which had been newly improved and decorated, was filled with an interested congregation. The programme was: voluntary; anthem; invocation and Scripture by Rev. Abram Wyman of Topeka; "Lead, Kindly Light"; sermon by Rev. T. B. Forbush of Chicago; hymn; prayer of ordination, Rev. A. Wyman; charge, Rev. T. B. Forbush; fellowship of churches, Mr. Wyman; act of installation, Prof. J. M. White, chairman of trustees; address to the church, Mr. Forbush; doxology and benediction by the pastor. The musical selections were rendered by an excellent choir, and the service was very impressive and satisfactory. Carthage is in the Missouri zinc and lead district, and is the oldest and most beautiful town of the section. It has some eight thousand inhabitants, and is connected by both electric and steam railways with Joplin and Webb City, containing twenty thousand more. The location is favorable for the promulgation of liberal Christianity, and Mr. Bennett has both the ability and incentive to become its evangelist.

DIGHTON, MASS.—A harvest festival was held in the Unitarian church Sunday evening, November 3. The pulpit was brightened with flowers and fruits, and songs and recitations voiced the harvest thanksgiving. The Helpers' Guild, which was organized a year ago, has been very successful, and the means of spiritual awakening among the younger people of the church. During its first year the guild earned by its entertainments $135 for the purchase of new books. The winter's course of programmes includes a series of religious subjects, illustrated by studies from Channing, Emerson, Longfellow, and Whittier. The Children's Band of Helpers also holds regular meetings Saturday afternoons, consisting of a praise service with responses, Lend a Hand motes, etc., with short stories and poems. The children have also practical lessons in helpfulness, and are preparing the second in a course of entertainments for the purchase of juvenile books. Rev. Mary L. Leggett has been in charge of the work here a year; and, although she has not accepted its permanent pastorate, the old church already responds to her efforts with glad, new life.

GARDNER, MASS.—The fair for which the ladies of the Unitarian church have been planning was held successfully November 6 and 7. A unique feature was a table where the best religious books were put on sale, and sermons and other Unitarian literature given away free. "The Faith that makes Faithful" and Dr. Everett's "Ethics for Young People" had especially large sales.

GREEN HARBOR (MARSHFIELD), MASS. Rev. William H. Savary closed two years of missionary labor in Grace Chapel with the month of October. There is an encouraging progress made toward a more complete union of Grace Chapel society. At a church social on October 25 Mr. and Mrs. Savary received a testimonial of affection in the presentation to them of a silver vase suitably inscribed. They are to reside at Jamaica Plain for the present.

NEWPORT, R.I.—The winter's campaign has begun in this parish with full force and unabated zeal. As the summer friends depart, the regular parishioners, who have been inland or to the mountains, return, and make good the average Sunday congregation. The Sunday-school resumes its fall work and study, with an increased membership. The officers of the Young People's Guild have published an interesting programme of moral and religious topics to be taken up and considered upon twenty successive evenings, an original paper being read at each meeting. The Unity Club will pursue a regular course of study upon "Russia: Its Past, its Present, and its Future," besides having a concurrent series of papers upon various literary and scientific subjects. The club now numbers two hundred and sixty-five members, which completely fills the church parlors, and compels the names of new candidates to be laid upon the table until a vacancy occurs. The ladies of the Women's Alliance have shown great energy and enterprise during the summer months in securing excellent public speakers to address their meetings.

PROVIDENCE, R.I.—The Ladies' Aid Society of the Olney Street Congregational Church gave a "Birthday Party" in the church vestry November 8, which netted the handsome sum of $80. As this sum was supposed to represent the combined ages of all who contributed, at the rate of one cent per year, it will be seen that this was a very venerable gathering. If we may trust the returns, the ages ranged all the way from one year to five hundred. Certainly, a happy combination of youth and old age in the service of the church.

ROXBURY, MASS.—At All Souls' Church parish house, Warren Street and Elm Hill Avenue, will be given, on the evenings of November 20 and 21, a unique exhibit of tableaux vivants. The proceeds of the two evenings will be devoted to Alliance work. Admission is fifty cents, and the exhibit will begin promptly at eight o'clock.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—Second Church: Rev. A. J. Wells of Redlands is supplying the pulpit temporarily. The Sunday-school and the young people's Sunday evening meeting, over which Mrs. Sprague presided so ably, are being cared for by Dr. G. L. Danziger, formerly rabbi of the Jewish congregation in San José. During October the pulpit was ably supplied by Rev. George Heber Rice of Stockton, Mr. John Monteth, and others. The Unity Club has recently given under its auspices a course of three lectures for the benefit of the church. Mr. Monteth and professors from the State University delivered the lectures.

WASHINGTON, D.C.—The excellent impression made upon the local population by the recent session of the Unitarian National Conference in this city was evidenced by the large attendance Sunday morning, November 3, which filled every seat on the floor and many in the gallery. Rev. C. W. Wendte, on his way to his California work, occupied the pulpit morning and evening. During the week he has met many old-time parishioners and friends, now residing here, and been the recipient of many courtesies. He will preach again next Sunday morning, and in the evening lecture on "Joseph Haydn," with musical illustrations by the choir, and leave by the late train for San Francisco. The society, while somewhat bewildered at its sudden loss of its long-settled and beloved pastor, Mr. Shippen, is full of heart and hope, and will presently take in hand the question of his successor. For the present it will avail itself of such pulpit supplies from Sunday to Sunday as it may be able to secure. Rev. Thomas Van Ness was to preach for the society the following two Sundays; but, illness preventing, Rev. L. W. Sprague will take his place for one Sunday.

THE PLYMOUTH AND BAY CONFERENCE held its autumn meeting Wednesday, November 6, with the Third Congregational Society in Hingham, Rev. C. T. Billings pastor. The day was one of rare beauty; and the attendance was very large, three hundred and twenty-five being entertained at dinner. The devotional meeting was conducted by Rev. E. C. Guild. The business meeting was opened by the president, Mr. C. D. Nash of Whitman. Rev. C. A. Allen, Rev. C. T. Billings, and Mr. J. H. French were appointed a committee to raise $150 to help the East Weymouth society in paying for its church building, as a memorial to Rev. Dr. Moors. The morning address was given by Rev. E. C. Butler, on the subject "How to build a Church." The bright stream of wit and anecdote had always its deeper current, and the speaker drew the audience to recognize the profounder source of success and prosperity. Discussion was opened by Rev. R. R. Shippen and Rev. W. R. Hunt, and continued by Rev. Messrs. Allen and Fish. After the collection and the serving of a collation in Loring Hall an essay was read by Mrs. C. T. Catlin of Brooklyn, N.Y., which was suggestive and instructive in its description of the progress and possibilities of women's work in the church. An address by Mr. G. W. Stone followed, in which the opportunities of the new era in our denominational life were set forth clearly and persuasively. Mr. Turner of Norwell and Rev. C. A. Allen also spoke. After a cordial vote of thanks to the speakers and to the people of the New North Church the members of the conference sang a hymn, and received the benediction from Rev. Dr. Osgood of Cohasset. This session must be marked as one of the most helpful of later years, and proves, if proof were needed, the great value of such meetings, not only to those who attend, but throughout the churches which must catch their spirit and impulse. John W. Day, Secretary.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of the Unitarian Sunday School Society. Additional donations for year ending Sept. 30, 1895:—

Sept. 5. Fitchburg Sunday-school.....	$10.00
" 7. Orange, N.J., Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 7. Mrs. Mary T. Porter.....	5.00
" 9. Brockton Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 9. Marlboro Sunday-school.....	20.00
" 10. Andover, N.H., Sunday-school.....	2.00
" 10. Worcester South Unitarian Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 10. Roxbury First Parish Sunday-school..	75.00
" 11. Uxbridge First Congregational Society	10.00
" 11. Miss Mary Grew, life member.....	10.00
" 11. Brooklyn Conn., Sunday-school.....	3.00
" 13. Whitman Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 13. Beverly Sunday-school.....	25.00
" 16. Fairhaven Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 16. Turner's Falls Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 16. Lexington First Congregational Society.....	20.00
" 16. Barton Square Society, Salem.....	25.00
" 16. Medfield Sunday-school.....	11.10
" 16. Oakland, Cal., Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 17. Littleton First Congregational Society	20.00
" 17. Farmington, Me., Sunday-school.....	3.75
" 17. North Andover Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 18. Wellesley Hills Society.....	15.00
" 18. Ayer Sunday-school.....	4.00
" 18. Taunton Sunday-school.....	25.00
" 18. Baraboo, Wis., Sunday-school.....	1.00
" 18. Hudson Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 18. Wm. J. F. Drummond.....	5.00
" 19. Passaic, N.J., Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 20. Kennebunk Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 20. Athol Second Church Sunday-school..	10.00
" 20. Leicester Sunday-school.....	4.00
" 21. Newton Centre Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 23. Portland, Ore., Sunday-school.....	20.00
" 23. Milton First Parish.....	3.00
" 23. South Natick Sunday-school.....	50.00
" 23. Rockland Sunday-school.....	7.00
" 24. Santa Ana, Cal., Sunday-school.....	2.75
" 24. Church of the Messiah, N.Y., Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 24. Concord, N.H., Sunday-school Association.....	20.00
" 24. Chelmsford Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 24. Wychendon Church of the Unity.....	33.50
" 24. Concord, N.H., Second Congregational Society.....	14.05
" 24. Barnstable Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 24. Lawrence Sunday-school.....	20.00
" 24. Saco, Me., Second Parish.....	13.40
" 24. Lebanon, N.H., Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 24. Gardner Sunday-school.....	2.17
" 24. Sherborn Sunday-school.....	2.00
" 24. West Dedham Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 24. Wollaston Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 25. Framingham First Church.....	7.00
" 25. Framingham First Church.....	4.25
" 25. Milford, N.H., First Unitarian Society	5.84
" 25. Exeter, N.H., First Unitarian Society	10.00
" 25. Milbury Sunday-school.....	3.00
" 25. Pepperell Sunday-school.....	2.00
" 26. Portsmouth, N.H., Sunday-school Society.....	25.00
" 28. Hamilton, Can., Sunday-school.....	2.00
" 28. Norton Sunday-school.....	2.00
" 28. Westford Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 28. Sharon Sunday-school.....	4.00
" 30. Medfield First Parish.....	20.00
" 30. Dorchester Third Religious Society	10.00
" 30. Weymouth First Unitarian Society.....	20.00
" 30. Scituate First Parish.....	2.60
" 30. Bolton First Parish Sunday-school....	10.00
" 30. Melrose Sunday-school.....	25.00
" 30. Second Church Sunday-school, Boston	50.00

Sept. 30. Watertown Sunday-school.....	$5.00
" 30. Norwell First Parish.....	11.00
" 30. Montpelier, Vt., Church of Messiah Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 30. Second Parish in the town of Worcester.....	51.36
" 30. Grace Chapel Sunday-school, Green Harbor.....	2.00
" 30. Chatham Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 30. Weymouth First Parish Sunday-school.	27.05
" 30. Pilgrim Sunday-school, San Francisco, Cal.....	25.00
" 30. Peterboro, N.H., Sunday-school.....	3.36
" 30. Hyde Park Sunday-school.....	7.48
" 30. Chitroepe Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 30. Bangor Independent Congregational Society.....	25.81
" 30. Springfield Unity Sunday-school.....	40.00
" 30. Yarmouth, Me., Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 30. Providence, Olney Street Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 30. Duxbury Sunday-school.....	1.83
" 30. Manchester, N.H., First Unitarian Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 30. Mrs. J. W. Winkley, life member.....	10.00

RICHARD C. HUMPHREYS, Treas.

Business Notices.

The Most Simple and Safe Remedy for a Cough or Throat Trouble is "Brown's Bronchial Troches." They possess real merit.

Washington Excursions.—The Royal Blue Line announces another series of personally conducted seven day tours to Washington, D.C., the first party leaving Boston Wednesday, November 20. The rate of $23 covers every expense of the entire trip. An illustrated itinerary may be obtained by addressing A. J. Simmons, N. E. P. A., 211 Washington Street, Boston.

A Thing not to see.—The luxury-loving reader should be careful to avoid seeing the engraving of the new Morris chair shown in another part of this paper by the Paine Furniture Company. It is such a creation in cabinet work as would tempt the veriest anchorite, and undermine his whole ascetic theory of life. The announcement explains that this chair is executed from a private design, and is intended as a possible presentation chair or for use in a private library or club. It is certainly not expensive.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Deaths.

In Tiverton, R.I., 9th inst., John S. West, aged 70 years and 10 months.
In Winchester, 6th inst., Mrs. Margaret S. Hixon, aged 74 years, 11 months, 6 days, wife of Lewis A. Bruce and daughter of the late Capt. Thomas Hixon.
In Medford, 31 ult., Silas Gibson, aged 93 years, 9 months, 3 days, formerly of Nashua, N.H.
In Dayton, Ohio, 27th ult., Mrs. Abby F. Smith, daughter of the late John R. Miller, formerly of Northboro.

Religious Notices.

THE address of Rev. O. K. Crosby is Yarmouth, Me.

Training of Attendants for the Sick Room

will be resumed by the Massachusetts Emergency and Hygiene Association, with Miss DELIA KNIGHT as Instructor, November 5, Tuesday, 3 P.M., at 9 St. James Avenue, where applications can be made to her daily from 3 to 5 P.M., or apply to Secretary, Mrs. K. G. WELLS, 45 Commonwealth Avenue.

JAMES KAY APPLEBEE

is open to engagements for PREACHING or LECTURING. Address: ALLSTON, MASS.

South End Industrial School,

45 Bartlett St., Roxbury.

SALE.

Saturday, November 16, 1895,

10 A.M. to 6 P.M.

Literary Lectures

—FOR—

UNITY CLUBS, WOMEN'S ALLIANCES, Etc.

By Rev. GEO. H. YOUNG

—ON—

Madame de Stael.....	Jane Austen.
Elizabeth Frye.....	Mary Lamb.
Louisa Alcott.....	Charlotte Bronte.
George Elliot.....	Jane Welsh Carlyle.
Dorothea Dix.....	Margaret Fuller.
E. B. Browning.....	Alice and Phoebe Cary.

For circulars and terms address

LAWRENCE, MASS.

Series of attractive lectures.—Lawrence American. Delightful lectures.—Lawrence Eagle.

Large and select audience gathered to enjoy the literary treat offered. Mr. Young is a very interesting speaker, and held the attention of his audience closely. All who listened to this lecture will be anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity offered for the remainder of the course.—Portsmouth Times.

AMONG THE UNITARIANS OF HUNGARY.

BY REV. W. H. LYON.

II.

If hereditary gout is the meanest of diseases, since your ancestor had all the port and you have all the pain, so vicarious reward is the easiest of gains, since others do the service and you get the grateful return thereof. I had difficulty in recognizing myself as an obscure American parson while I received the respectful bows and courtesies of the villagers whenever I took my walks abroad or found myself placed in the uppermost room at the feasts and the chief seat in the synagogue. I tried to remind myself that there were just as good men in the English or American ministry as I was, and that I should not exalt myself beyond measure above them because the parable was reversed, and the sons who stayed at home were eating the husks of obscurity, while the prodigal son in the far country was feeding on the fat of the land and shining in the fierce light that beats upon a throne.

Yet to these elder sons there was sent a special message. Hardly had we finished breakfast on the morrow, which was Sunday, than one of the Uzon boys came running into the house in great excitement, saying that the ministers were coming; and we could already hear the tread of many determined feet on the road beneath our windows. Uncertain what the purpose of this throng might be, whether, perhaps, in my zeal to speak Hungarian I had said some horribly malapropos thing for which I was now to be led to the stake, I gave one thought to home and friends, and composed my countenance to a compromise between conciliation and fearlessness. Scarcely had this complicated operation been finished, when thirty-one ministers poured into the room, clad in their silk and velvet robes; and Rev. Salomon Gál, in excellent English, gave me the message of the Hungarian clergy to carry to those of England and America,—a message of fraternal greeting and of the common joy of a common faith and service. Nothing could have been more gracefully done or more gratefully received and hereby transmitted.

As we walked out into the morning air after this, I had leisure to see the village and its people. The village consists of two or three long streets, diverging more or less from the brook that runs through its centre. The houses are never more than one story in height, built of stone covered with plaster and painted white, sometimes with light blue trimmings, and roofed with tiles or thatch. Behind almost every dwelling stands a barn, which is one of the most picturesque of buildings, having a very high and steep thatched brown roof, over the ridge-pole of which project the ends of the rails, placed astride it to keep the straw down. The romantic, semi-barbaric look which these barns give the village is among the most ineffaceable of the stranger's recollections. I have another cause to remember them from the fire which on that hot Sunday afternoon destroyed over thirty of them. The long drought had made their great expanses of thatch as dry as tinder, and from one burning roof the flying wisps of straw kindled others, till it seemed as if the whole village must go. The one little hand-engine was brought out; but, as the only water to be had was in the almost dry brook, and the only hose carried hardly a hundred feet, it was of little use, and the farming tools and stores of grain burned pitifully, unchecked.

The Szekler people, like their Hun ancestors, are short of stature and dark of complexion, and, unlike them, gentle, kindly, and serious of aspect, the women often looking sad and worn. The men, in their Sunday clothes, look a little like English parsons, with low, soft, black felt hats and waistcoats buttoned to the throat. Their light gray homespun trousers, sometimes embroidered on the sides with black, are tucked into high top-boots. The women wear dark kerchiefs over their hair, sometimes surmounted by straw hats, a single upper garment of heavy white cotton cloth, covered in colder weather by a jacket of dark and often embroidered woollen stuff, voluminous skirts, and top-boots like those of the men. All the Szeklers are hard workers; but their faces are as intelligent and sensible as they are honest, their family life is lovely, their patriotism fervid, and their hospitality simple, unaffected, and generous. Now that the weight of tyranny has been lifted from them, and they are recovering from the dreadful confusion that followed the rebellion of 1848, their minds are expanding and blossoming in the warm air of liberty. Their children are going away to the higher schools, and the readiness with which they take on the polish of culture shows how firm and fine is the substance of which they are made. The ministers and professors of the land are the sons of Szekler farmers, and are prophecies of light to come. The Szeklers have always loved learning, and have clung to all they could get. In one of the old fortified walls that surround some of the churches there is a large room where, it is said, the schoolmaster continued his teaching while the fathers manned the ramparts and the mothers cooked the food. That room is a symbol of the love of education which has never been slackened by any of the hardships through which the Szekler race has had to pass for so long.

The exercises of the day began with a meeting of the Consistory. As the bishop was passing from this to the church, he was stopped by a throng of people in the colonnade of the school-house; for they were bent upon celebrating his Jubiläum. Forty years had passed since he was ordained to the ministry; and, though fortieth anniversaries are seldom celebrated, his flock could not restrain their enthusiasm any longer, or else they remembered how often forty is mentioned in the Bible, as if it were a sacred number. I have never seen a more genuine and hearty demonstration. Bishop Ferencz is one of the real Unitarian leaders of to-day. Though, as I have said, having but little nominal power, his ability, his eloquence, and his character give him great influence. There is little in his appearance to suggest the Hungarian, or even the foreigner of any nation. His face is quite American. His manner is simple and sincere, unaffectedly cordial, and winning. He has the Hungarian natural eloquence, and always commands attention, though his speech is quiet and unpretentious. A man singularly compounded of power and gentleness, he gains the affection and reverence of all who meet him.

The throng that stopped him in the porch of the school-house was headed by representatives of the Consistory, of the professors of the university, of the deans and ministers of his former church in Kolozsvár, of the Unitarian women and of the young Unitarian women, each of whom gave him some handsome gift, as a large silver double inkstand, a gold pen-holder, a great Bible, books of portraits, etc. Search had been made for a Doré Bible in English; but none could be found, and one in German had to be substituted. As the bishop wishes to learn English, perhaps the book could be found for him in our own country. Each present was accompanied by a speech, to which the bishop answered in Hungarian, which, if it was as fit as it was musical, must have struck home with every word.

Then we went on to the new church. Crowds of people had gathered, and shouts of Eljen! Eljen! greeted the good bishop at every turn. It was a beautiful Sunday morning; and great numbers had come from the surrounding villages, partly to celebrate the special occasion, and partly to have a holiday. Gypsy and Wallachian beggars, with all kinds of horrible deformities and pitiable mutilations, dogged our steps. Any one more filthy or ragged than many of the other gypsies it would be hard to find. One sees here the pure (or impure) type, which rarely, if ever, gets into the northern lands, reckless, stealthy, yet sometimes with a certain wild beauty that fascinates the stranger. The Wallachians are often as repulsive to see, with their dark faces, the men with lank, black hair trailing to their shoulders, long, drooping mustaches, straw hats with wide, hanging brims, white shirts, and baggy trousers tucked into high boots, and kept on by wide belts, the women with richly embroidered jackets and aprons, and sometimes of strikingly beautiful, voluptuous faces. The larger part of the crowd was, of course, Szeklers. It was estimated that five thousand visitors had come in, and against the walls and along the street were booths where meat and drink and fancy articles were sold. Wine was abundant; yet there was no sign of intemperance, and the throng of men and women wore innocent holiday faces.

The church to which we were going is a very handsome building, pure white all over, excepting the great octagonal dome, which is covered with bronze tiles. It is cruciform, with the dome over the intersection, and with two towers on the front. It stands on the one hill of the village, and, partly surrounding it and contrasting with it in color, is the gray remnant of the old, high fortifying wall into which the inhabitants used to flee from invasion. In the rooms which are built into this wall are still to be seen the large chests in which the inhabitants kept their grain against such time of need,—a sort of mediæval safety-deposit vault. Inside the church is also pure white, except the handsome oak pulpit and the painted organ-case in the gallery over the door. There are also side galleries around the entire church, except the chancel. The ceiling is open into the high dome, under which, in a large, open space, stands the small communion-table, covered with rich brocades.

The church is a striking contrast to the humble village that lies below it. The reason is that, while the people are poor, the congregation as such is the richest in the Unitarian body, having about 300,000 florins, or $120,000, in lands and forests. Of this property about 44,000 florins were put into the church, making a building that would do honor to any town.

The services of dedication differed little from what they would have been with us, except that there was no reading of Scripture. I think that Scripture is seldom read at any service. Prayer is reverent and solemn, and always ends with the Lord's Prayer. The singing is congregational, led by a zealous choir of young people at the organ, and was hearty, though, as in Germany, very slow. It was only by close attention through several verses that I could recognize in the "linked sweetness long drawn out" our old friend "Greenville." The sermon was given by Prof. George Boros, without manuscript, fluent, direct, and earnest. As Charles Dudley Warner, looking down into the bed of a Nova Scotia creek at low tide, realized for the first time how much water adds to a river, so I, looking at the refined face of the preacher and the attentive air of the crowded church, but understanding not a word of what was said, realized for the first time how much it adds to a sermon to know what the minister is talking about. He pleaded, I was told, for reliance upon the distinctive purposes of a church and for the importance of preaching our faith more urgently now that other and less spiritual modes of gaining converts were failing. Prof. Boros, by the way, is one of the Hungarians whom we must see in this country some time, a most attractive and cultivated young man, of American rather than Magyar countenance, a hard-worker, both for our faith and for the education of his people.

The dedication was immediately followed by the Lord's Supper, which always accompanies a meeting of the synod. Upon the little table under the dome were tall, quaint goblets of gold, studded with gems, and plates filled with bread in small cubes. After an earnest prayer the elements were distributed to the ministers and officers, standing in a large circle around the table, then to other men, and, last of all, to the women. The church was full, holding perhaps a thousand persons; and, of the crowd outside, the majority were also waiting their turn. Those of us who had received came out, therefore, and proceeded to the banquet shed, where we were joined at last by the bishop and his helpers. Our Hungarian brethren believe, with the hymn, that "religion never was designed to make our pleasures less," and pass, with the utmost naïveté, from religious to convivial joys. An English socialist writer incidentally scoffs at Puritan "reverence," by which he understands the setting apart of certain times and places as sacred, to be regarded with sober faces and spoken of with bated breath. Of this the Hungarian has very little; and the bishop and his helpers went directly from the Lord's Supper to the banquet with its laughter and good cheer, its wines and its toasts and its gypsy band playing the music of the day. So, at the ball of the next evening, the young ministers who had been ordained in the morning appeared as floor managers and participators in the dancing, with all the zest of Seniors on "Class Day." Yet they have their little "reverences," also, and looked askance at my cool, thin, gray suit (the weather was hot enough to change one's ideas about future possibilities), and seemed to think me not quite a minister till I had put on a sweltering black suit that decidedly made my pleasures less.

The banquet was a most delightful and unique affair. A large temporary shed of rough boards had been erected, holding about five hundred, and filled with long tables, with a cross table at one end for the leaders and guests, and a platform for the gypsy orchestra, which played superbly without any notes at the other. The fare was excellent,—soup with spaghetti, boiled corned beef with sauce of horseradish or currants, small turnips hollowed out and filled with minced meat and rice, worthy of being naturalized here, roast goose and cucumbers, pastries, luscious musk and water melons, grapes, and other fruits. There were three kinds of wine, and two of mineral water, to be mixed therewith.

Most enjoyable of all were the toasts. These are not reserved for the end, but, after the bishop had given the formal toast to the king, were scattered throughout the rest of the dinner. A man rises, and shouts, Höljen es uraim! ("Ladies and gentlemen"), the conversation and clatter slacken, the band is cried down, and the speaker pours out his speech, at the end of which there is a clinking of glasses, and the din of tongue and fork goes on, if, indeed, it has very much stopped. It was delightful to listen to these impromptu speeches; for the Hungarian, if these were fair specimens, has a natural eloquence such as marks no other nation, except, perhaps, the Irish. Pastor or layman, he spoke as the bird sings, because he must, because his soul pressed at the gates of his lips, and must utter itself. I felt abashed when, as a matter of course, the representative of the foreign Unitarians was toasted; but I had prepared a little strategy which won the hearts of my hearers, and made them forget the slower tongue and colder temperament of the Westerner. I had Prof. Kovács hammer into my memory a few appropriate Hungarian sentences, which I fired off upon this occasion. Two exploded at the beginning of my speech, and the house roared with delight at what they saw was meant as a compliment; and two more sentences ended the chaotic address, after which I sat down, panting, but victorious. Prof. Kovács then translated the English body of my talk, and gave to my thoughts an eloquence of his own which was put by the hearers to my credit. I had expected, when I went to Hungary, to speak in German; but I soon found that, for reasons to be given when I come to speak of the hopes and aims of the Hungary of to-day, this would not have given anything of the delight which came from my clumsy recognition of the fact that the Hungarian is one of the languages of the nations.

So closed the exercises of the day. There was to have been a ball in the evening; but the fire, with its sad effect on the poverty of the village, made it seem out of place. In a more modest form it took place the next evening for the benefit of the needy. The crowd melted away, and dispersed to the surrounding villages in quaint vehicles. There were carts made of poles, with heavy wheels, and drawn by from one to four yokes of buckskin-colored oxen, with beau-

WOULD YOU HAVE THE HANDSOMEST

GLOVES?

THEN WEAR ONLY THE

GENUINE DUCHESSE,

Which come in all the popular styles, dressed and undressed Kid, button and Foster lace, long and short wrists,

And cost no more than other makes.

CALL AND INSPECT, OR SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

All Gloves fitted when desired, and every pair warranted.

CHANDLER & CO.,
SOLE AGENTS,
WINTER ST., BOSTON.

Agency Dr. Jaeger Sanitary Woollen System.

tiful, long, projecting, polished, and sharp-pointed horns, or by black buffaloes, with heads stretched straightforward almost on a line with their necks, and black horns curving backward close along their cheeks, and lighter wagons drawn by small, wiry horses, such as those on which Gibbon says the dreaded Huns thundered down upon the Roman legions. The carts and wagons, however, have no springs, and are the only instruments of torture left over from mediæval days. By sundown most of the throng had disappeared, and the villagers were left to condole with those who had lost almost all their subsistence for the winter by the conflagration. All night the air was heavy with the smell of burned hay and timbers, and reddened with the flames that were reluctant to leave their prostrate prey. Bölon will have sad as well as glad memories of the synod.

King's Chapel.

HISTORICAL SKETCH.

King's Chapel, the first Episcopal church planted in New England, was established A.D. 1686. Its first clergyman was Robert Ratcliffe, a graduate of Oxford, and a pulpit orator of more than common ability. Services were held for a time in the town house, the doors of every meeting-house in Boston being resolutely closed against the new society. The opposition was based partly on dislike of the Prayer Book, but still more on fear of the encroachments of Episcopal authority and royal prerogative. On the other hand, adherents were gained from those sincerely attached to the mode of worship adopted by the Church of England, and from those who rebelled against the tyranny of the Puritan government.

In 1687 Gov. Andros virtually forced an entrance to the South Meeting-house (afterward called the Old South), and compelled the owners of that building to yield it part of the time to Mr. Ratcliffe's congregation. Though this joint occupancy was attended with much friction, there was, on the whole, less trouble than might have been expected. The first house of worship erected by the society was finished in 1689, and stood on the same land still occupied by the church. This small wooden building was enlarged in 1710, but was afterward taken down to make way for the stone chapel still standing, which was first used for public worship in 1754. Among the original contributors to the building of this venerable edifice, we find the well-known names of Peter Faneuil, Gov. Shirley, and Sir Henry Frankland.

Samuel Myles, Roger Price, and Henry Caner followed Mr. Ratcliffe in order as rectors of the chapel, down to the time of the Revolution. Gifts of plate and books and furniture were from time to time received from the successive kings and queens of the mother country, and each royal governor was made first warden of the chapel during his term of office. In making choice of its fourth minister, the Chapel deliberately signified its claim to congregational liberty. The question having been raised, the society voted not to refer the matter at all to its diocesan as hitherto, but to choose a minister for themselves from "the clergy in New England." Mr. Caner was therefore called from Fairfield, Conn., and was installed as rector, "no mention being made of the Bishop of London throughout the whole affair."

Dr. Caner remained in office till the evacuation of Boston by the British army in 1776. He was a staunch Loyalist, and left for Halifax with the troops, taking with him 2,800 ounces of silver plate, "the gift of three kings." The Chapel was closed for a year, and was then offered to the congregation of the Old South, whose sanctuary had been temporarily spoiled by its transformation into a riding-school for British troops. King's Chapel thus paid its debt to the Old South, contracted nearly a century before.

In 1782 the wardens invited James Freeman to be their reader for six months, and the following year he was chosen pastor of the church. In 1785 the proprietors voted that it was necessary to make some changes in the Liturgy, and chose a committee to consider and report such alterations. These changes, when reported, were adopted by an overwhelming majority. They were for the most part a substitution of other and more Scriptural phrases wherever the doctrine of the Trinity was referred to in the service. The effect of them was, in Dr. Greenwood's words, that "the first Episcopal Church in New England became the first Unitarian Church in America."

After these changes had been effected, it was quite impossible for Mr. Freeman to secure Episcopal ordination; and in 1787 the officers of the Chapel proceeded to ordain him for themselves. The church thus adopted the Congregational theory of the right and power of the individual church to ordain its ministers; and this position it has again and again solemnly reaffirmed at the installation of those whom it has chosen to be its pastors. Of these, since Dr. Freeman, there have been but three,—Francis Greenwood, Ephraim Peabody, and Henry W. Foote. Mr. Brown, the minister just installed, is therefore ninth in an order of succession reaching back more than two hundred years.

to the "Book of Prayer and Praise" issued by the Association.

Mr. Brown's devotional feeling, his culture, and rare intellectual ability, his patriotism, historic spirit, and practical wisdom, all combine to fit him for the pastorate of a church, distinguished in the past for these qualities in both pulpit and in pew.

INSTALLATION SERVICES.

The services of installation, by which Rev. Howard N. Brown was formally received and recognized as pastor of King's Chapel, began with a voluntary, rendered by the organist, Mr. B. J. Lang, during which the senior warden, Mr. Arthur T. Lyman, Rev. F. G., Peabody, D.D., and Rev. H. N. Brown entered the desk. At the conclusion of the voluntary the senior warden, Mr. Lyman, said:—

"Proprietors and members of King's Chapel: at a meeting held in this place April 15, 1895, the proprietors of King's and guard and inspire him by thy Holy Spirit to be the minister of these people's souls. And so direct this people and their minister into thy most gracious favor, and further them with thy constant help, that in all their works begun this day, to be continued and ended in thee, they may glorify thy holy name, and finally by thy mercy obtain everlasting life through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

Warden Lyman then continued: "Brethren, the wardens and vestrymen of this church, acting for the proprietors, and agreeably to their instructions, have taken order for the ordination and installation of their elected minister, according to the forms and usages of this church in ordaining its ministers, as first adopted at the ordination of Rev. James Freeman, 1787, and followed in the installation and ordination of Dr. Greenwood in 1824, Dr. Ephraim Peabody in 1845, and Rev. Henry Wilder Foote in 1861.

"With this action of an independent church, these ministers have all tried to make King's Chapel stand in its place in Christ's kingdom and in fellowship with all Christians. By the forms and terms adopted we do not seek to abridge the liberty of our minister; for we do not hold him responsible to us alone for the instructions he shall give, knowing that he is already responsible to his own conscience, to his master Christ, and to God, who, we trust, has called him to this work. We only seek to settle and define the meaning and extent of the compact formed between us and the man we have chosen to this sacred office.

"We, the wardens, vestrymen, and other proprietors of King's Chapel, in Boston, by virtue and constitution of the laws of this Commonwealth, have elected and constituted and appointed the Rev. Howard N. Brown to be our minister, public teacher, and pastor, to preach the word of God, to dispense lessons and instruction in the duties of piety, religion, and morality, and to minister the holy ordinances in this congregation, and to do, perform, and discharge all other offices which of right belong to any minister, public teacher, or pastor, by the authority of the laws and constitution of this Commonwealth; and it is hereby intended and understood that the authority and rights here given to Rev. Howard N. Brown to be our minister, public teacher, and pastor, are to remain in full force so long as he shall continue to preach the word of God, and dispense instructions in the duties of piety, religion, and morality, among us, conformably to our sentiments and opinions of the Holy Scriptures."

The warden then addressed Mr. Brown, saying:—

"Reverend Sir,—You have been chosen by the proprietors of King's Chapel to be their minister, public teacher, and pastor; and you have accepted this appointment and trust. Therefore, we, the wardens, vestrymen, and proprietors of this church, by virtue of our lawful authority, do, before God, and in the presence of these witnesses, solemnly ordain and declare you, Howard N. Brown, to be our minister, public teacher, and pastor; and, in testimony thereof, we deliver to you this book containing the basis of our precious Christian faith, and enjoin upon you the due observance of all the divine lessons and precepts contained therein, especially those which relate to the office and duties of a minister of Jesus Christ, and whatsoever else of truth and duty consistent therewith shall be made known unto you.

"And may the Lord bless you and keep you. The Lord lift up the light of his countenance upon you, and give you peace now and forevermore.

"And let all the people say Amen."

The congregation responded, Amen.

The Bible referred to in Mr. Lyman's address, and delivered to Mr. Brown, has been used in King's Chapel since 1768.

RESPONSE BY MR. BROWN.

Having already signified my willingness to assume the sacred office to which the vote of this church has called me, and being here present to receive the solemn charge now laid upon me, I need not reaffirm a decision that has passed beyond my recall. I desire, however, at this time to express to the REV. HOWARD N. BROWN.

Rev. Howard N. Brown was born in the town of Columbia, near Richfield Springs, Herkimer County, New York, in 1849. His father was a Baptist minister. His son early found the trammels of the old theology too strait for his intellectual or moral growth. He then determined to enter the Unitarian ministry. He studied at the Harvard Divinity School, and began work in a missionary church in Ilion, N.Y. From this post he was soon called, in 1873, to succeed Rev. Dr. Hedge as pastor of the First Parish in Brookline, Mass. Here he remained for twenty-two years, until his call to King's Chapel in May last. Other churches in Chicago and Boston had tried to secure him without success. It was only a strong sense of duty that led him to dissolve the ties at Brookline, and take up the work at King's Chapel. During his ministry at Brookline a new and beautiful church was built under his inspiration and leadership.

Mr. Brown has not only ministered faithfully to his own church, and maintained a high order of devotional and pulpit service, but has rendered invaluable aid to American Unitarianism. For many years he has been a director of the American Unitarian Association; and his wise counsels have been of great value in the practical work and exigencies of that organization. Among other things, he gave much time and labor

Chapel made choice of Rev. Howard N. Brown, and invited him to become your minister and pastor. [The letter to Mr. Brown and his reply were then read.]

"That invitation having been given and accepted, Rev. Mr. Brown is here, and we are assembled to ratify before God, and in his presence, the compact thus entered into; and to the end that we, a portion of Christ's flock, and this man, our elected minister and pastor, may duly feel and acknowledge the importance and sacredness of the relation which is now to be formed between us, and that it may be ordered for his and our good let us humbly implore the blessing of Almighty God."

Prayer was then offered by Rev. Dr. Peabody as follows:—

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we come to thee for thy blessing upon our worship here this day. We thank thee for the abundant blessings visited on this church through the generations that are gone. We thank thee for the words of grace which have been spoken here, and the examples of godly living which have abounded here, for all the rich tradition of piety and integrity, of sweet and saintly souls, which make this place a holy temple of the living God. And now, we pray thee, grant thy best blessing to this thy servant. Illuminate his mind by the visitation of thy spirit. Speak to his heart from day to day the words that he shall deliver here, and keep officers and members of this religious society something of the gratitude I feel for the kindness they have shown to me, and to declare my humble but earnest trust that the blessing of God will be upon the relation here established. While I have no confidence whatever in my own unaided ability to meet the requirements of this place, I firmly believe that I have been led to it by something more than the will of man, and that, in trying to be a faithful minister of the gospel of Christ, I shall have such help that I need not wholly fail. Such, at least, shall be my constant prayer to Him who is the giver of all good; and I entreat that your petitions may go with mine for the prosperity of the holy work committed to our hands. Let us pray.

KING'S CHAPEL, BOSTON.

Mr. Brown then offered a prayer, which concluded the installation service. The regular order of morning prayer, according to the King's Chapel Liturgy, was then followed, and the following sermon was delivered by Rev. Francis G. Peabody, D.D.

A SURE FOUNDATION.

BY REV. FRANCIS G. PEABODY, D.D.

"Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his; and, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity."—2 TIM. II, 19.

The apostle in this chapter is looking at the growth of Christianity, as a builder stands and looks at the growth of his building. He is, as he says elsewhere, a wise master-builder. He is not the designer of the building. He and Apollos and Cephas and the rest, as he wrote to the Corinthians, are simply working out in various materials—costly stone, it may be, or wood or stibble—the design which has been put into their hands. Behind the builder, that is to say, stands the architect. God has, as it were, sketched his design for the Church that is to be; and these are his workmen, to build what has thus been planned; and the master-builder in this master-builder knows to have been the architect's design. Some of the workmen have thought they knew more than the designer. Hymenæus and Philetus have been putting up in one corner of the structure a new doctrine of their own about the resurrection; and it stands there, a grotesque blemish on the great architect's plan. The master-builder is indignant. He calls these perversions of the truth "profane babblings" and "foolish questions," and he points out to young Timothy the tawdry little additions, which, if they are not taken down, will deface the great design. But then, with a great sense of relief, this master-builder recalls one incident in the history of the building which has practically fixed its essential form and plan. God, the architect, while he may tolerate great variety of method and material in the superstructure of the Church which he designs, knowing that it can be easily modified and replaced, has seen the foundation of the whole laid under his own eye. The foundation, he knows, is what will determine both the shape and stability of the whole structure; and, whatever else may happen to the Church, the foundation is fixed. "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid,—which is Jesus Christ." Beneath all the varieties of superstructure in thought and life, which may deface God's plan for the Church of Christ, lies this one substantial and unchangeable foundation, hidden—as this apostle says—"with Christ in God." That is the first thing which gives comfort to the man who begins to see how many false and foolish superfluities are to be built into the structure of Christianity. But there is more than this to comfort him. Not only has God laid this foundation, which not even mistaken Christians can change, but, still further, he has given this foundation a special mark and stamp, so that we may know that it rests in Christ. God has set, so says this passage, in the corner of this foundation a corner-stone, and has inscribed on it, just as men do now, the words which mark the nature and purpose of his building. And so, as Christianity grows, men will make their mistaken contributions to the towers and pinnacles above; and perhaps the day will come when a better appreciation of Christianity will see the mistakes and will correct them. But meantime there shall be no mistaking the fundamental purpose of the great design. It shall always be known, at least, what this slowly rising structure was designed to be and do; for that is forever indicated by the shape of the foundation and by the place and inscription of the corner-stone. That gives the master-workman courage for the Church that is to be. It is disturbing enough, God knows, to watch the bad work of Hymenæus and Philetus, intruding their new teachings into the simplicity of Christ; but, after all, it renews the apostle's confidence to be able to say, "Nevertheless, the foundation of God standeth sure."

THE FIRST KING'S CHAPEL.

A sure foundation! Let us, first of all, try to repeat this note of confident hope with which the apostle settles down on the things which cannot be moved,—this great sense of relief which comes to any man when he discriminates between the thousand things in Christianity which may be superadded to the Christian foundation and the plain, permanent, unmistakable foundation which lies often hidden from view beneath. For in our day, as in that of Paul, the heresy of Hymenæus and Philetus is common enough,—the desire to make of Christianity a complicated, overloaded structure of elaborate doctrines such as quite obscure the original design. To such a heretic—and he commonly thinks himself as far as possible from heresy—Christianity is a theological system, wrought out into details of opinion, so that the first thing which catches the eye and gives character to the structure is this multiplicity of beliefs. Each creed-maker adds a new pinnacle or buttress, and gathers round him his own little communion of sympathizers, and cries: "See! We never knew till now what the Christian Church was meant to be!" And so the process of sect-making and heresy-building goes gayly on. Now, over against all this subdividing and super-refining of truth, which this Christian apostle does not scruple to call "profane babblings" and "foolish questions," he settles back with a great peace of mind on what he calls the "simplicity that is in Christ,"—the clear distinction between the prodigious number of superadditions which may or may not be in harmony with God's plan in Christ, and the extraordinarily few fundamental beliefs which make the permanent foundation and support of Christianity. And I suppose that this glad return to the sure foundation is the note in any age of a deepening religious life. A young beginner, like Hymenæus and Philetus, wants a perfect system. He builds up his pretty structure of doctrines, as a boy builds with his blocks, and points to it and says, "There never was anything so elaborate in this nursery before." But, as he grows older in religious experience, the sense of value shifts. We grow—do we not?—to care less for a great many beliefs, but a great deal more for a few beliefs. We begin to value systems less and foundations more; and this progress of conviction comes not so much from adding new truths to our the flickering light-houses that mark the coast; and then, in some awful night of trial, from the reeling deck of some shattering experience, you came to see these same lights as the only things which can save you from total shipwreck and guide you to your port. And then, at last, in that darkness, lit only by those trembling beams, you come to know why the Power that rules that stormy coast has set there even a few scattered lights which you can absolutely trust. That is the new courage with which, in a time like this, when many old beliefs are called in question, one settles down in the things that are sure. This is, from many points of view, an age of destruction in the Christian Church. Many a belief is shaken, many a creed is shortened. Many of the elaborate theories of the past seem to many a man like the vain babblings and foolish questions of Hymenæus and Philetus. But does all this mean—as so many suppose—a decline of faith? On the contrary, it may be the sign of a renewed stability. A time when all beliefs are questioned is the best time to sift out the beliefs which are fundamental. It is a time of discrimination. Quantity gives way to quality. The issue of these tumultuous controversies is to be this,—that men shall settle down on a few great truths, against which neither history nor criticism has any weapon, and that on this broad and plain foundation not strength alone, but unity, will be found. There never was a better creed, but by leaning very hard on a few old truths, and finding them strong under the strain. When a man in the oil fields of Pennsylvania counts up the value of his property, he does not say, "I have ten wells, while my neighbor has one, so I am richer than he"; for he knows that ten wells may be dry, and one, if it but be the right one, may be a fortune. What he wants is not ten wells, but one that flows. If he has one such, he is rich. Out of its mysterious depths there leaps an overwhelming flood which fills his tanks and pipes, and makes him cry, not for more wells, but for storage room for the wealth which he has found. That is precisely the way a man strikes truth. It is not the number of shafts he sinks which counts: it is finding something in any one of them. It is not many beliefs which you need: it is much belief in something. You do not ask for many gods lest some of them should fail you. One God that is real is a great deal to a man. One truth that is a real truth is a great deal to a man. Out of its mysterious depths there wells up to him a whole flood of assurances and consolations, as though the whole truth of God had but that single outlet. Yes! that is the story of Christian experience. To the deeper life the creed grows shorter, but it grows more real. You rest on fewer things, but you rest your whole weight. It is not multiplicity you want, but reality; not a little belief in many things, but much belief in something. Truths which once seemed unimportant have come to flash on you with their full significance. It is as if once you had been sitting on the shore idly watching age for religious faith than this which calls men so absolutely from the uncertainties of their own superstructures to the sure foundation of God. It is like the time when, through the midst of traditionalism and ritualism of his day, there swept the cleansing wind of the influence of Jesus Christ. His people were believing many things, but they were not believing much of anything. They were adding new turrets to their temple, while its foundations were crumbling below. Then he recalls them to the few great facts on which the whole was built. "Behold! on these," he says, "rest all your law and prophets." And they dealt with him as a destroyer of the faith, for he shook some of their pet pinnacles till they tottered and fell. But he was not come to destroy: he was come to fulfil,—to fill out, that is to say, the fundamental faith with its tremendous meaning. The return to simplicity was the note of supremacy. The deepest secrets of the soul were in its simplest utterances. The world's great epoch came when beneath the mistakes and accretions of the thoughts of men there was laid bare the plain and sure foundation of God. That is the doctrine of the foundation, which makes the one great source of peace and hope among the conflicts of one's experience and of this perplexing time in which we live.

INTERIOR, FACING THE CHANCEL.

But the apostle does not deal with the foundation alone. In the corner of that foundation, he goes on to say, the designer of the whole has set a stone; and on either side of that corner-stone he has set his own inscription. It is the custom of builders to-day. It was the custom of the Jewish law. "These words which I command thee this day," says Jehovah in the earlier time, "thou shalt write upon the posts of thy house and upon thy gates." Now what has God written on this corner-stone of the Church which men are to build from his the apostle means when he reads on the one side of God's corner-stone this fundamental truth, not "We know the God who is ours," but "God knoweth them that are his." Here is no controversy with theology. It is simply that, at the beginning, other stable Christianity than that which, first of all, makes a man depart from iniquity. How often in the history of the Church of Christ has it seemed as if it were something else than a school of character! How often have the ecclesiastics and theologians tried to write some other text on the corner-stone! But other foundation cannot be laid than that which is laid. There is no discipleship of Jesus Christ except through the cleansing of individual character. By their fruits ye shall know them. There is no conceivable elaboration of beliefs, or forms, or rituals, or authority, which can make a body of people into a church of Christ, unless on their corner-stone is written the simple pledge of the consecrated character. That is Christ's test of Orthodoxy: that is his mark of the true Church. All this has grown, by this time, plain enough. The Christian Church is ready to accept the moral test; and no church can have the allegiance of the practical age which does not, first of all, say, "Let every one that names the name of Christ depart from iniquity." But in our day we are come to the opposite heresy. If the good life is essential to Christianity, what is Christianity but the good life? Is it not adding a difficulty to demand any relation to God? What have we to do with the supernatural? Let us have ethics without a creed, character without religion,—that is the talk of the time. What difference does it make what you believe, so long as you do right? Let us take this corner-stone of the Church, and turn to the wall as superfluous its first inscription,—the Godward-looking one,—and turn to the world the other writing,—the demand for righteousness,—and on that still simpler foundation rest content. Now, to all this talk of duty divorced from faith, of ethics without worship, as a foundation-stone, the apostle's answer is simply this,—that these two ways of life are simply different sides of the same corner-stone, different aspects of the same foundation. What is your changeable discussions of the time, but on this sure foundation. On one side of its corner-stone is a deep and humbling sense of God, and on the other is a clear integrity toward man. The marks of a true church are, first, its contribution to worship, and then its contribution to character. Its foundation stands sure, having the seal, "The Lord knoweth his own" and "Depart from iniquity." Let us thank God together that we meet in the name of such a church to-day,—a church which through its centuries of history has stood on this corner-stone of piety and righteousness. The first thing which any stranger perceives on entering these doors is this,—that it is a place of worship, not an auditorium or a concert hall or a social exchange, but a place to say one's prayers, in the quiet, calming sense of God's loving care; and this sense of a worshipful church grows with each year of loving association with this place, and sweetens the memory of every child of this church, as he looks back on his happy privilege of nurture here. From year to year these scattered lovers of this place return, not to some great occasion of oratory or of festivity, but to the sacred hours of personal prayer, or the quiet partaking of the Lord's Supper amid the holy memories of devout ministers and of many a domestic saint. About us here are the generations of worship. The words of prayer speak to us from the silent lips about our chancel walls. They are wrought into the very frame of this ancient building. Her gates speak of salvation, and her walls sing of praise. And then on the other side of our corner-stone is set the praise of character. Out of these generations of a prayerful church has issued a history of integrity and consistency such as few congregations inherit. We look back across our personal experience for the types of absolute, high-minded integrity in our community, for the souls of honor in the world of affairs, and there rise up in their familiar places here the men of that genera-

INTERIOR, FACING THE CHOIR.

design? It is a twofold seal, says the apostle. The one teaching faces one side of the building: the other looks the other way. One is a teaching about God: the other is a teaching about man. One has to do with religion, the other with ethics. One is the fundamental doctrine of Christianity concerning our relation to God: the other is the fundamental doctrine of Christianity concerning our relation to men. The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal: first, "The Lord knoweth them that are his"; and, then, "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." Let us look, for a moment, at these opposite sides of God's corner-stone, as it lies there in its place in the one foundation. What, on the one hand, is a Christian's fundamental relation to the life of God? What is the foundation of his religious experience? I suppose we should be inclined to answer: "First of all, he must find God, he must believe in God. He must be sure that there is a God, and must know something of his ways with men." And no doubt the workings of the human mind do find their natural culmination in these thoughts of the method of God with men. That is theology; and, no doubt, theology is the queen of the science, not to be despised or ignored or outgrown, but only to be renewed and strengthened as the other sciences contribute material to it more and more. But, after all, this knowledge of God to which man's thought is led,—how slight a thing it is! How it stands like a baffled explorer at the edge of the little island of what is known, and gazes out upon the sea of mystery! The ocean before it is real, but it is unexplored. It is not to be denied, but it is not to be fathomed. So man's wisdom stands before the depth of the life of God; and the wisest push out a little way into that ocean, and to them it seems vaster than before. Is this attitude, then, of the theologian and philosopher, this way of exploration,—justified and manly as it is,—is this the attitude which represents the religious life of man? Hardly do you ask the question when the whole history of practical religion rises up and answers, No! When we deal in such researches, we are in reality reversing the way in which religion makes its first approach. We are not in religion, first of all, inquirers and explorers: we are, first of all, receivers. Religion is, first of all, not our discovery of God, but God's discovery of us. What we feel sure of, first of all, is not the scope of our knowledge of him, but the completeness of his knowledge of us. It is not the sense of our searching for God and finding him which moves us: it is the sense of his finding us. That is religion: it is ignorance in the hands of knowledge, weakness led by strength, the child accepting the Father, not to understand him, but to obey him. And that, I suppose, is what as at the end, of our knowledge of God, we are surrounded by the larger truth of God's knowledge of us. That is what leads men, not to philosophize, but to pray. That is what builds, not a hall for lectures, but a church for worship. Out of the sense that, in all our ignorance and blindness, we are yet held in the love and life of God, flow forth the psalms and prayers, the peace and hope, which give a church its place in the history of man. Oh! when one thinks of all the long, sad history of human endeavor to establish the religious life on man's knowledge of God, the presumptuousness of the theologians; the formalism of the ecclesiastics, the foundation of the Church sought in organization or ritual, then one begins to feel the relief with which the apostle settles down on the sheer and simple sense that God knows him. O Hymenæus and Philetus, he says, cease your speculative babblings about past resurrections and future mysteries, and read again what is written on the corner-stone! God does not ask of you all knowledge of the heights and depths of Providence. The foundation of your faith is neither in your wisdom nor your guesses. There are a great many things in heaven and earth which you will not understand until, perchance, you stand in the clearer light of another world. But just to take your life as known of God, as a part of his vast design, working out its own salvation because God works in it to will and to do,—whatever else you may build upon that confession,—that is the sure foundation of a church of Christ. Such a church is created, not for speculations of philosophy, but for expressions of worship. When you enter such a church, you are recalled, first of all, to the thought that God knows you. You bow yourself in prayer, and say, "The Lord knoweth them that are his"; and on this plain foundation you rest, and your heart sings the psalm of this dependence and trust:—

"Thy calmness bends supreme above,
My restlessness to still.
Around me flows thy quickening life,
To nerve my faltering will.
Thy presence fills my solitude;
Thy Providence turns all to good."

That is the writing which Saint Paul saw on one side of the corner-stone,—the side which faced toward God. Look now, for one moment, at the opposite side,—the side, as we saw, which looked toward man. On it is written the other half of the one seal. And what is it but simply the demand for Christian integrity? "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." That, to the apostle, is the other mark of the corner-stone of Christianity. The test of religion on its human side is nothing else than conduct. The fellowship which is in Christ is, first of all, a fellowship of character. There can be no duty? It is your faith turned toward man. And what is your faith? It is your duty turned toward God. Live out your duty broadly enough, and you come out into the mysteries of religion. Live out your religion definitely enough, and it controls and inspires every simplest act of duty-doing. The reason people are satisfied with duty without faith is because they have not begun to perceive the extension of duty to its ideal ends, and the reason they are satisfied with a religion which is not tested by conduct is because they have not really come close to the power and judgment and fear of a living God. Here are not two things, but one. Given a large enough duty-doing, and it reveals your God; given a real enough God, and he quickens your duty. It is as if you had been born on some small island, and did not know it was an island. It is real ground under you, and you live in the interior, and do your duty there. But then, some day, you go up to the heights above your home or out to the margin of your land; and there, beyond you, stretches the infinite and unsuspected sea. So the life of faith holds the life of duty in its arms; and round about the pressing realities of the daily service of man lies—often unsuspected—the vaster reality of the infinite and encompassing life of God.

Such, then, is the Pauline doctrine of the corner-stone. The Church of Christ, which is to outlast the babblings of any age, is to be built, not on the turbulent and tion, and there pass before our memories such names as Emerson and Lowell and Minot and Perkins and Thomas and Jackson and Appleton and Curtis and Stevenson and Bulfinch and Eliot and the long series of other upright leaders of this congregation forty years ago. We look about us in this place of ancient memorials, and the same consistent character is celebrated in its monuments, from that of Samuel Vassal, "who boldly refused to submit to the tax of tonnage and poundage," to that of William Sullivan, Homo nobilis, humanus, atque beatus; of John Lowell, Vir integerrimus; of Charles Apthorp, Prudens et liberalis; of Joseph May, "of inflexible integrity, exact, untiring, unselfish"; of Samuel Appleton, "a Boston merchant, without guile." Finally, we pause at yonder doorway, and see the same sort of piety come to its natural fruit of heroism in the young men of this church who "Heard the voice without reply,

MURAL TABLET TO DR. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

'Tis man's perdition to be safe
When for the truth he ought to die."

So the Chapel stands, on its sure foundation, having this seal with its twofold text,—on the one side worship and on the other character,—"The Lord knoweth them that are his" and "Let every one that names Christ's name depart from iniquity." So she stands, with her fine symbolism, close against the crowded thoroughfare, at her door the bustle of the world, and just within the quietness of prayer, at one end the hurry of the street, and at the other the peace of the Lord's table. So she stands, strengthening souls for life by the power of their prayers, setting those two things close together which are often set apart,—the world and the spirit, the altar and the street, the soul's need of worship and the world's need of righteous men. And so she still shall stand, in this new period of her prosperity and usefulness which she gladly begins to-day. Into the lineage of gracious souls who have served at her altar my brother and my friend reverently enters. The traditions of this place become his own desire. On the same corner-stone he is to build the piety and the character of the new time. O my friends, surround him with your loving prayers this day! Strengthen his heart and his hands in every generous endeavor. Permit him to serve you in the ways which God may make plain to him as best; that so, in the mercy of our God, the Chapel still shall stand, in its spirit as in its walls, not a noisy, showy influence among us, but quiet and calm and gray, a great, gray rock amid the turbulent tide of the city street, a rock of rest and refuge whose foundation standeth sure, and hath its seal set upon it by a living and a loving God.

OVER SUMMER SEAS.

BY AUGUSTA LARNED.

The southern line to the Mediterranean and Italy is so diverse in experience from crossing the great Northern Atlantic basin, especially when the waves are charmed and the winds are whist, all one's impressions of sea life become modified; and the quiet, eventless run of eleven or twelve days to Genoa seems more like a coasting tour or tranquil yachting excursion than a venture upon the great deep.

Day after day you slip along shining parallels, and find the ocean tame, with its claws pared, robbed of violence, with no getting up of its wide back, no foaming and fury, but utter peace, with a gentle wash of waves against the ship's side, a placid trail upon the mirror-like sea made by the big ship as it steams onward. Warm winds attended us until we crossed the Gulf Stream, low hanging, sultry clouds, a pervading sense of heat. Port-holes were wide open by day and night.

The people on board were mainly well, only languid, with a sense of sea change, the lotos-eating of the ocean that comes to all who cast off from land, a sense of unreality as if partial death leaves you suspended in some strange limbo between sleeping and waking.

The things left behind grow dim and formless, the future lies cloudlike on the horizon. You cannot grasp what you have abandoned, you cannot forecast the future. Vast horizons, shining spaces, the trembling, furrowed flow of the sea, pale, evanescent colors that come and go, dissolve familiar ideas, like morning mists. You come into new time. You cannot reckon any longer with the friends at home. Your world narrows to the small ship's company, and perhaps to the people who sit with you at table,—the humorist, the musical young lady, the doctor, the professor, the people of various nationalities and tongues. The ship's deck becomes a little world. You study races there, but by hints and indirections and asides. The shadow of an idea seldom crosses your mind. To lie in a steamer chair, wrapped like a mummy in a travelling rug, to hold a book in your hand you never read, to watch some active children play at shuffleboard, and to wonder at their energy, to think remorsefully of the letters you must prepare for the post at Gibraltar,—these are the vague images painted on the background of sea until some glorious burst of color out of the gray waste strikes a spark from the dull surface of your mind.

There are people about you; but you have nothing to say to them unless a flight of gulls or a string of porpoises flirting their tails in air draws out a commonplace remark. The half or wholly sea-sick ones look at such as visit the dining saloon three times a day with a weak species of animosity. Eating becomes to them a gross and vulgar exercise, remote from the limbo of loathing in which they live. But suddenly from the lookout there is a cry of "Land!" that sends all feet scudding to the port-rail, and touches a nerve of vigor in all minds, weary of the burden of the old man of the sea. We are nearing the Azores. Flores looms gently on the horizon, out of a violet haze. She is but a dim picture; and we steam too far north to catch a glimpse of Fayal and St. Michael, but come close in to Terceira, with its broken mountain line, its fertile slopes, carrying the palm, the olive, and vine down to the sea, its lovely, clean-looking little harbor guarded by a giant rock, its string of villages, each with a church spire, clasping hands round the entire island. All seemed so friendly, so peaceful, so clean, and wholesome on that little island in the purple semi-tropic seas, we were sorry to say good-by and be delivered to a shoreless waste of brine.

But a day more, and you come to Cape St. Vincent, the southern point of Portugal, a dull reddish mass of naked rock, cut out in terraces as cleanly by the sea's tooth as if hewn with a chisel and hammer. The light-house on the barren point, where the waves spurted and foamed, was the first we had seen since leaving New York Harbor. The Azores are destitute of such aids to the mariner. Next to the light-house tower is seen the low brown roof of the house of Henry the Navigator, that farsighted prince whose deductions of new worlds were strokes of genius that led to the triumph of Vasco da Gama and Columbus.

We passed Palos in the night, and thus lost the sight of the monastery where Columbus was sheltered, and the little port from whence he set forth to track a new hemisphere, in his three tiny caravels. But all pales on this southern line before the excitement of an approach to Gibraltar. In the roseate dawn of a perfectly cloudless morning, when the sea was all a-shimmer with tender gray and soft, transparent mist, and the side of every baby wave caught a pink reflection, we rose hurriedly to see the red eye of the light-house gleaming on the point, and the great rock looming like a lion couchant through velvety brown shadows, while lights sparkled from the town and shipping, and a moon worn very thin and silvery hung belated in the sky. Great flocks of gulls were circling round the steamer. The bay was alive with odd craft, fruit boats, coal barges, fishing-smacks with lateen sails, and coastwise tugs and steamboats. Africa lay in mysterious shadows on the hither side. We tried to believe that Tangier was just "over yonder," with its towers and mosques, and just beyond the desert. All around us circled the shores of Spain; and the rock itself, one huge fortification and engine of war, loomed over our heads.

We dressed with excited fingers, swallowed a cup of something warm, and then quickly descended the gang-way to the lighter that was to take us ashore. The pilot, a swarthy Spaniard, wearing hoop ear-rings and with the cunning of half a dozen languages at the tip of his tongue, received our good money, and tried to pass upon us some of his own bad Spanish coins. Little boats filled with venders of laces, knick-knacks, and "bull-fight" fans, whereon are depicted scenes from the bull ring, darted about us, like swallows. But in a moment we were steaming toward the town where the rock showed its thousand mouths, garnished with the black muzzles of great guns ready to belch forth fire and smoke. The sea-wall shows strong and handsome that matchless masonry the English know so well how to build. The landing-place was alive with motley groups of Spaniards, Moors, red-coated soldiers, and nondescript curs and boys. We were on the debatable ground between Europe and Africa. The Moors from Tangier, who trade in Oriental goods, were by far the most dignified and handsome men we saw. One man in particular was a beautiful object amid the varied grime of the unwashed Gibraltar rabble. His skin was like olive satin, set off by a muslin turban of snowy whiteness. His flowing yellow robe was of stand-alone, window-curtain brocade. His yellow slippers were pretty enough for the feet of a girl baby, and above rose spotless white silk stockings.

We passed a paved court and under an archway, and received a ticket permitting us to remain on the rock until gun-fire, seven in the evening. The "cabbies" were all waiting outside to capture us; and in a moment we were whirling away in a queer little carriage through the one long street of the town, lined with blank walls and queer little shops, where we jostled donkeys and donkey-drivers, and the straggling, dark-skinned people who brought to us the sense of delightful foreignness and the thrill of the picturesque. Over the walls little gardens showed glimpses of verdure, and through doorways we saw cool courts and a gleam of flowers. Details of soldiers passed us, looking glum and bored, as if life on the rock were a prison-like existence. Through the embrasures of the sea-wall great guns poked their black noses. You are shown a hundred-ton one, as a special curiosity, that can carry death and destruction fifteen miles, the whole width of the strait.

The hanging gardens are filled with semi-tropical plants, and the palm shows its feathers over many walls. The public garden is wedged between the north and south ends of the town, and in the way of art has tricked itself with a bust of Eliot and a statue of Wellington. Its bowers and shady nooks were dusty from the long drought, for the rock burns in summer and freezes in winter. The south town is the court end; and here is a pretty drive along the sea, with a fine view of the Spanish coast. Far above is perched the signal station and Queen Anne's tower. Above, where the road ceases to crawl painfully along the bare face of precipices, a series of steps are cut in the rock for the weary feet of the soldiers.

A whole day is required to penetrate, by aid of a government order, the inner galleries and casemates that circle and worm their way through the body of the rock, making a kind of venous and arterial system for its vast, strong interior. The Cerberus of a thousand mouths is watched by five thousand soldiers, who live under strictest military discipline. The town and garrison are fed by Africa and Spain. Meat comes from the latter, vegetables from the former. As cholera has broken out in Tangier, owing to the return of the Mecca pilgrims, a strict quarantine is observed; and a kind of famine seems to impend for the people on the rock.

Spanish town lies so near the great fortress, the soldiers, Spanish and English, patrol within a few rods of each other. The Gibraltar people are expert smugglers. To evade the high Spanish duty on tobacco, they train dogs to carry tin boxes of cigars fastened under the body, and concealed by green boughs. The dogs are of marvellous sagacity. They allow themselves to be shot at by the coast-guards, and then run and plunge into the sea. They scale every sort of barrier, and make nothing of penetrating high barbed-wire fences. If the boxes of tobacco are dropped in the sea, smugglers in boats are at hand to pick them up. And thus the illicit trade goes on merrily.

We returned to the ship, laden with Manila baskets filled with fruit and huge, stiff bunches of autumn flowers. Steam was got up, and the big liner was soon ploughing through dark blue Mediterranean waters, as tranquil as our familiar Hudson. We watched for a long time the coast of Spain, the Sierra Nevada Mountains rising in long undulations, with dreamily shadowed crags, and spurs, and belts of forest up to the perpetual snow-line, shining like a pearl crown. Then came the opaline outlines of the Balearic Islands, the dark blue sea against the faint rose of Minorca, pencilled like a flower with aerial colors. Then the French Riviera rose upon our vision, Nice sitting in white loveliness by the sea, and the maritime Alps impending in air, and tantalizing the mind with half-discerned suggestions of beauty. So we glided on to the Italian coast, past Mentone to San Remo, and on a perfect day closed our beautiful voyage by steaming into the harbor of Genoa.

Spiritual Life.

The highest art, the highest literature, lead always out on to the high ground of morals. No culture is complete which informs the mind and educates the aesthetic taste, and does not open its various channels into the larger one of human character.—L. Harvey.

What men at any time feel and believe socially is precisely what they feel and believe in their religious life, the rule of their conduct showing their thought of the divine. If they have a living righteousness, from hearts loving, forgiving, not judging, generous not according to exact measure, without servile fear of others or a desire to inspire such fear toward themselves, then to them God has this same living righteousness, from the same disposition of heart.—Henry Mills Alden.

If any man should escape temptation, it will not be because he is strong, but because he is weak. There are natures so shallow and thin as to be below temptation. The tempest which raises the billows of the Atlantic does not make a ripple on a street pool, and the tares that strive with the wheat unto harvest in the deep rich loam would wither on the stony soil. Pharisees and prigs are not tempted; and, therefore, they must always be less than men.—Ian Maclaren.

A Private Design.

Some one has described Brahminism as "spiritualized loafing." If that is so, this chair should be a good one to send to the Hindoos; for it comes very close to spiritualized luxury. Yet it would surely play havoc with the ascetic views of the Brahmins.

The engraving shows a private design for an Improved Morris Chair. It is of extra (or "Club") size, with deep, wide seat and broad arm-rests. The frame is of Mahogany, superbly carved, with massive claw feet enclosing concealed casters.

In its size and appointments it is one of the most imposing Morris Chairs ever exhibited. It is an admirable selection for a gift or presentation piece of furniture.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

THE CENTENARY OF KEATS.

BY EMMA ENDICOTT MAREAN.

The one hundredth anniversary of the birth of John Keats has just passed; and it affords a convenient point from which men can consider afresh the work of the poet, and estimate how far it has been an influence in the life of the century. There is nothing more eternal than the words of a great, creative poet. He is the interpreter of life, and he comes close to the everlasting verities of the universe and of human nature. By his power of mental vision, he sees how the ideal is often more real than the actual, and he attains intuitively to truths that the scientist and the philosopher must later spell out after him with infinite pains. He is the leader of men. His name, of all others, is never writ in water; and his spirit lives in the world that struggles on after his ideals, alive and potent after the lapse of years.

The great test of a poet's greatness is, perhaps, his final universality, that power of insight and expression which bring him in close touch with all sorts and conditions of men. John Keats was not at first, indeed he has never been, one of those poets who succeed in coming into first-hand, immediate relation with the life of the people. Blackwood's Magazine wrote at once of "the calm, settled, imperturbable, drivelling idiocy" of Endymion; and the Quarterly Review set down the same poem as "unintelligible, rugged, diffuse, tiresome, and absurd," two choice collections of adjectives, which might well be the despair of ambitious reviewers to-day. Yet the greatest influence does not always belong to him who succeeds at once in gaining his audience. A great thought once uttered, even if it enters but one or two minds, is sure of repetition, development, explanation, and commentary, sooner or later. It filters through the words of others, influences those who can repeat its message in a form more fitted to duller comprehensions, and, recognized or unrecognized, it reaches at last all the people, blending with the thoughts and words of others to help on the eternal search for the living truth.

The neo-pagan poetry of Keats seems in one sense to stand apart from the movement of the century as we can see it to-day. Its passion for beauty and its joyous acceptance of Greek ideals seem to be unconscious parts of a reactionary protest against the limitations and realities of the world as we are forced to know and meet it. His immortal lyrics seem bounded by dreams and divorced from this workaday sphere of action. His life was too brief to let us assert dogmatically what his future work might have been; but even in its few short years he had time to prove the truth of his words, that he had loved the principle of beauty in all things. It was Keats himself who saw that life, to be beautiful, must first be true, and that the eternal quest of poet, philosopher, educator, must be to make the truth beautiful. It is not forcing a point to take Endymion as a story of the progressing spirit of man, awakened, he knows not how, to a vision of perfection, and drawn by his very nature to seek after it. In a letter written Jan. 30, 1818, Keats said indeed that he intended the poem to show "a regular stepping of the imagination toward a truth. My having written that argument will perhaps be of the greatest service to me of anything I ever did. It set before me the gradations of happiness even like a kind of pleasure thermometer." The golden butterfly of pleasure cannot satisfy the soul deepened by the contemplation of something higher. Soon the suffering of the world presses close, and hope dawns only with renewed faith in the early vision which shall unite even the present pain and sin and sorrow into an abiding beauty. This vision must hold its own, not only on the heights where the evil of life fades into soft obscurity, but in the deepest depths. He must follow the airy voices even through the silent mysteries of earth, and only faith in the eternal Love may "undo this tangled thread and wind it to a clew." The final lesson that no love is true which is not part of a larger, holier love is hardest to learn; but he understands at last "that all love and beauty is one, that the truth of the finite is truth of the infinite, that the fitful and dimly realized beauty in common life and the beauty gained through suffering is one with the beauty of light and joy." This is the lesson of the century, that we are bound together in a fellowship of common sorrows and common joys which yet reach out into realities far beyond our sight.

Keats was by nature and perhaps by choice a poet of contemplation. Yet his contemplative thought has been translated again and again into the calls that have stirred some of the deepest thinking and the truest living of these later years, and his words have not yet been outgrown. We are his debtors still, not only for the rare beauty of his expression, but for the thought that often matched it.

Literature.

"THIS GOODLY FRAME, THE EARTH."*

Many have taken in hand to set in order the things they have seen in a journey around the globe. But, for the most part, the books have been more interesting to the writers than to the readers. The gentle reader sets out, like Pliable with the Pilgrim, fully intending to accompany him to his journey's end. But, alas! after a few chapters, he finds himself in the Slough of Despond, where he wallows in a bottomless abyss of irrelevant facts. Then said Pliable, "Ah, Neighbor Christian, where are we now?" "Truly," said Christian, "I do not know." Whereupon Pliable "makes a desperate effort or two, and gets out of the mire at the side nearest his own house." And the chances are that, while the Pilgrim author is conscientiously trudging on through custom-houses and bazaars or is crossing deserts on dromedaries, Pliable is taking little journeys in the world, all the more interesting because their geographical range is so limited. Rather than follow the traveller around the world, he prefers to go with Thoreau down the Concord River, or walk with Charles Lamb around the London streets, or even to join Wordsworth on his leisurely and unadventurous excursion. And I must confess that, for one, I am inclined to sympathize with Pliable; for in a book of travels more depends on our companion than on the number of miles he has gone over. The globe-trotter has not usually time for the one thing we value most,—"the harvest of the quiet eve."

But what if, Thoreau and Charles Lamb could have enlarged the scope of their rambles, until they found themselves wandering meditatively around "this goodly frame, the earth"? What if, with the happy facility of forgetting burdensome details, they had jotted down their reflections and impressions? That would be a different matter; and it might not only reclaim Pliable, but might even convert Obstinate, who has vowed that he will have nothing to do with travels. A peripatetic philosopher, with a wholesome sense of humor, quaintly philosophizing around the globe, is not to be confounded with the ordinary literary tourist, note-book in hand. Such a peripatetic philosopher is Rev. Francis Tiffany, who has given us not another book of travels, but a series of delightful and suggestive impressions. Other books will tell you how to get to Tokio or to Delhi: this will tell you how you would feel when you got there, if you were Mr. Tiffany.

In his memorable discussion with the returned traveller, Parson Adams declares: "Master of mine, perhaps I have travelled a great deal further than you, without the assistance of a ship. Do you imagine sailing by different cities and countries is travelling?" And then he tauntingly asks the poor fellow who has been carried about the world on ships rather than on the wings of his imagination whether he had heard Scylla or seen Charybdis or passed the spot where Dædalus fell into the sea. "Nay, you may have been on the banks of the Caspian, and called at Colchis to see if there is ever another golden fleece?" "Not I, truly," answered the host: "I have never touched at any of these places." "But I have been at all these," replied Adams.

Mr. Tiffany, in most charming fashion, combines for us the two kinds of traveling. To be sure, he has the assistance of ships and other means of bodily conveyance, including, on one occasion, a philosophic elephant provided for him by the Maharajah of Jeypore; but these are unobtrusive accidents of his journey. While the body is traversing space, the mind is making still longer excursions into past time, and visiting the scenes we dream of. Here is the kind of a traveller who will have time to call at Colchis, and make kindly inquiries about the golden fleece.

*THIS GOODLY FRAME; THE EARTH. Stray Impressions of Scenes, Incidents, and Persons in a Journey touching Japan, China, Egypt, Palestine, and Greece. By Francis Tiffany. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin, & Co.

What pleasure awaits the reader, on some winter evening, when he comes to the chapters on Agra and Delhi! He is not merely taken to the British India of the present, but he catches an entrancing glimpse of the India of the Moguls,—vast, mysterious, luxurious. He is transported to the times when

“In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree.”

There is exquisite art in the contrast between the light touch of the chapters on Japan and the sombre reflections which come in the presence of the deserts and the temples of Egypt. But the reflections are never too long drawn out, and the reader is not asked to take them too seriously. Here is a picture of a caravan of camels, as "the ships of the desert, heavily freighted to the sand-line," heave in sight: "Camels in the desert are no intrusion. They simply enhance the sense of its loneliness and desolation. Gaunt, withered, silent-footed, a root out of dry ground, with no form nor comeliness, they look as natural a product of its forces as Mohammed of old or a Mahdi of to-day. Simply blown together in a loose-jointed way by the winds, creatively playing with the whirling sands, do they seem."

The fortunate readers who long ago discovered "Bird-bolts" need not be told that Mr. Tiffany belongs to the small and select circle of American humorists whose humor has ripened till it has attained a delicate literary flavor. Of humor of the hearty aboriginal sort we have no lack; for Mark Twain we have always with us, and other approved workmen who can turn out jokes of continental proportions. The good American prides himself on these, as he does on the Rocky Mountains or any other obvious features of the landscape. But there is another sort of humor of the unobvious, evanescent kind. It never surprises us into laughter, but plays around a subject like summer lightning, and only now and then betrays us into a smile. It lurks in a whimsical turn of a phrase, and escapes in the next sentence. It is consistent with underlying seriousness, and even with a gentle melancholy. This kind of humor implies a full mind and quick sympathies. It perceives the great in the small, and the small in the great: it is quick to see the disparity between men's ideals and their achievements, and many a time it is a mere "toss up" whether a given scene produces sorrow or amusement. Or, rather, it is a matter of temperature, as on an early spring day it is a question of only a degree or two whether there shall be rain or snow. The unmitigated optimist, who dwells always in the unclouded sunshine of dogmatic assurance, has little understanding of the changing moods of those whose temperaments belong to the season when, without warning, snow and rain and bright sunshine follow each other. The steady summer heat is the best for corn, but it is in the fickle spring weather that we look for the arbutus. If Mr. Tiffany were a Mark Tapley, equally cheerful under all circumstances, he might personally have had a better time; but he would have written not nearly so good a book.

To illustrate by a single instance: one fancies, in reading the paragraph entitled "A Borneo Philosopher," that, when Mr. Tiffany perceived in the uncouth orang-outang a striking resemblance to the intellectual countenance of Immanuel Kant, the suggestion was an exceedingly painful one. Here was the beginning of a meditation on the vanity of humanity in general and of philosophers in particular. But, before such a meditation came to be written out, the temperature had risen above the freezing point; and the result is a whimsical and genial little homily, not belittling to the Transcendentalist, and delightfully consoling to the orang-outang. Appearances are, perhaps, against him: his forearms are a trifle too long, and he is generally not in good form; but those eyes and that brow are not for nothing! We shall have "The Critique of Pure Reason" when he gets around to it. In the mean time what a pleasure it must be to have "jaws powerful enough to chew up whole cocoanuts"!

By the way, Houghton, Mifflin & Co. have added greatly to the attractiveness of the volume by cutting it up into paragraphs, which he that runneth may read, rather than hewing it into solid chunks of chapters. Our book-makers have too long discriminated in favor of the steady-going people who like to read a book through consecutively against the equally deserving persons who prefer to pick and choose and to take "here a little, there a little." It is the same principle which makes the railway managers discriminate in favor of the patrons who give them "the long haul" at the expense of those who only require the "short haul." That a book should be read in the same order in which it was written is a superstition derived from the days when we were under the beggarly elements of the text-books. In this case the author's words have been so rightly divided and the salient points have been so enticingly indicated that one may begin where he will, with the sense that all shall be well with him. If he prefers to begin, Hebrew fashion, at the last page, and read back discursively from Athens to Minneapolis, as at least one reader has done with great pleasure, he will find the path made easy; and he need fear no typographical pitfalls for his wayward feet.

But, though, thanks to its literary style, it is easy reading, we have in this book materials for those who are interested in earnest thinking. On its title-page it purports to give only stray impressions of "scenes, incidents, and persons." This hardly does it justice. The author's deepest impressions are evidently not of "scenes, incidents, and persons" so much as of the principles, ideals, and persistent forces which have moulded the countries through which he has passed. We are made to see, not Chinamen, Hindus, and Egyptians, but China, India, and Egypt. Above all, the author loves to place before us the religion of each land as the best expression of its interior life. The renewed interest in the ancient religions of the East will make many turn to the pages where the impressions which each makes are recorded. They will find here what is characteristic of our time,—ready sympathy with all forms of faith; and they will find, also, what is more rare,—keen discrimination. S. M. CROTHERS.

Miscellaneous.

Harper & Brothers publish a new edition of Thomas Hardy's "Return of the Native" in attractive type and binding. It is one of the best of Hardy's novels, and those who have made his acquaintance since it first appeared will do well to read it. There is an impressive etching of the lonely heath which is so impressive in the story, and a map of Wessex; but we miss the quaint bird's-eye, topographic picture of the heath which we had in the original edition. Because the story is Mr. Hardy's, it is desperately sad. But life is larger and better than the part of it his vision circumscribes.

"The Romance Publishing Company" have put a book on the market called "Love Fugue." Some one objected to "Psyche" as a queer way of spelling "fish," "Fugue" is a queer way of spelling "fudge." And yet, if "fudge" was not intended, it describes the book better than "fugue." Such a mush of gush and slush we have not often seen. It is very silly gush and very dirty slush; and yet, strange to say, there is a ready-made notice sent by the publishers which is furnished by two Unitarian ministers. They should take the advice of Arthur Hugh Clough, and "consider it again." "Perhaps," says one of them, "there is nothing like this work in all literature." There is comfort in that.

D. Appleton & Co. have made a new edition, "Uncle Remus: His Songs and his Sayings," which is all that Joel Chandler Harris, or his friends, or the most enthusiastic lover of Uncle Remus and his stories, could desire. It contains one hundred and twelve illustrations by A. B. Frost; and it is a case of "two hearts, one beat," in such perfect sympathy are the author and the artist. Mr. Harris may well question whether this new edition will not be more popular than the old one, because Mr. Frost, "by a stroke here and a touch there, has conveyed into the quaint antics of these amiable brethren of wood and field the illumination of his own inimitable humor." If hundreds and thousands of Uncle Remus's readers do not reread him in this altogether fascinating book, we will never prophesy again.

Literary Notes.

The publishing committee of the Channing Auxiliary of San Francisco have prepared a unique and interesting calendar for 1896, which will be for sale in this city by W. B. Clarke & Co. Price $1.

Fifty-five years ago, just before Brook Farm opened, Margaret Fuller held ten conversations on "Greek Mythology" at the house of Rev. George Ripley in Bedford Place. The intense interest in Grecian myths, art, and poetry felt in Boston at that time found expression in these talks.

FOR THE REED ORGAN

"Organ at Church and in Concert."

By J. W. Simpson. For pipe or reed organ. A new collection which brings within reach of the ordinary player some of the finest organ music published in years. Not difficult, and of great variety. 74 Pieces. Cloth, $2 00, postpaid.

"Parlor Organ Galaxy."

By W. F. Sudds. A fine collection of vocal and instrumental music for the reed organ. Selected to suit all tastes and the ability of young performers. 40 Instrumental Pieces. 17 Vocal Pieces. Heavy Paper, 50 cents; Boards, 75 cents, postpaid.

"Clarke's New Method for Reed Organs."

The standard instruction book for the reed organ, distinct from any previous work by the same author. It contains all that is needed for a mastery of the instrument. Boards, $2.50, postpaid.

"Bellak's New Method for the Organ."

German and English Edition. Also with German text. Paper, 75 cents; Boards, $1.00, postpaid.

"Winner's Eureka Method."

The popular instruction book. Paper, 75 cents, postpaid.

Oliver Ditson Company

453-463 Washington St., Boston
C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

E. P. Dutton & Co.'s CALENDARS FOR 1896.

Over 70 Different Kinds. Among them are Cathedral Chimes Calendar.

Six leaves, illustrations of six famous English cathedrals (11 x 14), $2.00.

Sweet Nature.

Landscape pictures appropriate to season (14 x 9), $1.25.

He Careth for You.

A devotional calendar, twelve leaves (7½ x 9½), $1.00.

Wit and Humor Calendar.

Twelve leaves, with comic illustrations (9½ x 7½), 75 cents.

The Circling Year.

Twelve leaves (5 x 6½), with selections from Shakespeare and illustrations in colors, 50 cents.

My Times are in Thy Hands.

Twelve leaves (5 x 6½), with Scripture texts and illustrations in colors, 50 cents.

Our Pets' Calendar.

Six illustrations of favorite pets (7½ x 9), 50 cents.

From Month to Month.

A devotional calendar, ten leaves (5 x 4), 25 cents.

From Day to Day.

Poetical selections, twelve leaves (7 x 2½), 25 cents.

BLOCK CALENDARS.

With Leaf for Every Day.

The Farrar Calendar.

Card (8½ x 11), with quotations for every day in the year from Dean Farrar's works, 50 cents.

The Phillips Brooks Calendar.

Card (8 x 10½), with quotations for every day in the year from his works, 50 cents.

Christian Year Calendar.

With texts for every day, 40 cents.

The Water of Life Calendar.

Devotional selections for every day in the year, 25 cents.

Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of prices.

E. P. DUTTON & CO.,

PUBLISHERS,

31 West 23d Street, - - - New York.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

Charles Scribner's Sons' New Books

LITTLE RIVERS. A Book of Essays in Profitable Idleness. By HENRY VAN DYKE. Profusely illustrated. 12mo, $2.00.

"Readers will find Dr. Van Dyke a pleasant expounder of nature and a very entertaining companion."—N.Y. Evening Sun.

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF NAPOLEON, his Family and his Court. Memoirs of Constant, first Valet de Chambre of the Emperor. Translated from the French. With an Introduction by IMBERT DE SAINT-AMAND. 4 vols., 12mo, $5.00.

THE ART OF LIVING. By ROBERT GRANT. With 135 illustrations by C. D. Gibson, B. W. Clinedinst, and W. H. Hyde. 12mo, $2.50.

"He deals with the practical problems in the every-day life of the every-day man with his own characteristic wit and fancy."—Boston Advertiser.

THE BACHELOR'S CHRISTMAS, and Other Stories. By ROBERT GRANT. With 21 full-page illustrations by C. D. Gibson, Irving R. Wiles, A. B. Wenzell, and C. Carleton. 12mo, $1.50.

"It contains some of the very brightest stories by this very bright author. A thoroughly fascinating and delightful book."—Philadelphia Press.

UNC' EDINBURG. 'A Plantation Echo. By THOMAS NELSON PAGE. Illustrated by B. W. Clinedinst. Small folio, $1.50. Uniform with the handsome illustrated editions of "Marse Chan," "Meh Lady," and "Polly."

CONSTANTINOPLE. By F. MARION CRAWFORD. Fully illustrated by Edwin Lord Weeks. Square 12mo, $1.50.

"It gives a charming description of Turkish life, and depicts sights and scenes in the Sultan's capital."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

WOMEN OF COLONIAL AND REVOLUTIONARY TIMES. A Series designed to portray the lives and the times of the eminent women of the Colonial and Revolutionary periods. The first volume, now ready, is on Margaret Winthrop, and written by Mrs. ALICE MORSE EARLE. 12mo, $1.25.

ENGLISH LANDS, LETTERS, AND KINGS. Queen Anne and the Georges. By DONALD G. MITCHELL. 12mo, $1.50. Continuing the former volumes, "From Celt to Tudor" and "From Elizabeth to Anne."

REFLECTIONS AND COMMENTS, 1865-1895. By E. L. GODKIN, Editor of the New York Evening Post. 8vo, $2.00.

A volume of essays selected by the author from the mass of his work during thirty years of editorial experience.

COLLEGE GIRLS. By ABBE CARTER GOODLOE. Illustrated by C. D. Gibson. 12mo, $1.25.

"The stories are all excellent in quality, and some of them are exceedingly bright."—Boston Advertiser.

MISS JERRY. By ALEXANDER BLACK. A novel and original love-story, illustrated from photographs from life. 16mo, $1.00.

COUSIN ANTHONY AND I. Some Views of Ours about Divers Matters and Various Aspects of Life. Uniform with "Windfalls of Observation." By EDWARD S. MARTIN. 12mo, $1.25.

CRUISING AMONG THE CARIBBEES. Summer Days in Winter Months. By CHARLES A. STODDARD, D.D., Editor of the New York Observer. Illustrated. 12mo, $1.50.

CAMEO EDITION. New volumes in this dainty series are: "A Chosen Few," selected short stories, by FRANK R. STOCKTON; "A Little Book of Profitable Tales," by EUGENE FIELD; "Reflections of a Married Man" and "The Opinions of a Philosopher," by ROBERT GRANT. Each volume, with etched frontispiece, 16mo, $1.25.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, 153-157 Fifth Ave., N.Y.

Just Published

A CATECHISM OF LIBERAL FAITH

By Rev. Charles F. Dole

The following extracts from the Preface show the character of this new manual: "The purpose of this Catechism is to further a thoughtful understanding of the good life. The wish here is to show that man belongs to an unseen universe; that this universe is divine and beneficent; that a certain distinct and noble type of thought, feeling, and conduct is in accord with such a universe; and that the highest and largest life grows out of the realization of these facts."

The book contains 34 chapters. Pages 112. In cloth, 35 cents a copy; per dozen, $3.50. Paper covers, 20 cents a copy; per dozen, $1.80.

Revised Edition

UNITARIAN CATECHISM

By Rev. Minot J. Savage

We also have for sale Mr. Savage's Catechism (published by George H. Ellis), which has been used in our Sunday-schools for some time with great favor. The author says in his Preface: "This little Catechism has grown out of the needs of my own work. It is an attempt to help teachers and parents by putting in their hands in brief compass the principal things believed by Unitarians concerning the greatest subjects. This is an effort to make the path of ascertained truth a little plainer."

Pages 67. In cloth, 30 cents a copy; per dozen, $2.50. Paper covers, 20 cents a copy; per dozen, $1.50.

Send orders to the

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY
25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

WHY READ AT RANDOM?

Men and women of authority in the most interesting fields of literature have chosen 2100 works for The List of Books for Girls and Women and their Clubs, adding just the word of description and criticism an inquirer wishes to have. Nothing so helpful has ever been published before. Some of the departments:—Fiction, a reviewer for the Nation. History, Rev. ben G. Thwaites. Natural History, Olive Thorne Miller. Education, Prof. Edward R. Shaw. Fine Art, Russell Sturgis. Music, Henry E. Krehbiel. Country Occupations, Prof. L. H. Bailey. Domestic Economy, Useful Arts and Livelihoods, Augusta H. Leypoldt. Hints for Girls' and Women's Clubs, with Outline Constitution and By-laws.

Cloth, $1; paper, 50 cts.

Published for the American Library Association.

Library Bureau, 146 Franklin St., Boston. Branches, 273 Stewart Building, New York; 603 Chestnut St., Philadelphia; 125 Franklin St., Chicago; 10 Bloomsbury St., London, W.C.

Channing Auxiliary Calendar

FOR 1896.

RHYMES AND CHIMES.

The Poetry of Steeples,
The Bell in the Belfry.

Beautifully printed in brown on Japanese paper. Boxed. Price $1.00, including postage. Address

CHANNING PUBLISHING COMMITTEE,
1300 Taylor Street, San Francisco.

Two New Books by J. R. Miller, D.D.

Dr. Miller's Year Book.

A message for each day in the year. 16mo, ornamental binding, gilt top, $1.25; flexible levant, full gilt, $2.50.

The Hidden Life.

16mo, unique binding, gilt top, 75 cents. Dr. Miller's works are so well known that they need no extensive advertising. They are a source of delight to many thousand readers all over the land, and their essential qualities may be summed up as "Sensible," "Practical," "Devout," and "Interesting."

For sale by all booksellers.
T. Y. CROWELL & CO., New York and Boston.

Mrs. Caroline H. Dall is about to publish a book entitled "Margaret and her Friends," which is made up from notes of these conversations taken at the time, together with some description of the people who heard them.

"The History of Punch and its Times," by M. H. Spielmann, with about one hundred and twenty illustrations, portraits, and fac-similes, is just announced by the Cassell Publishing Company, New York. The volume traces the history of the paper. It gives some account of its struggles, of the astonishing power and influence it rapidly acquired, its quarrels and friendships, its politics and opinions, its dinner and its "Table," the origin and plagiarism of its jokes and the sources of its humor, its "Cartoonists," and the story of their work, its "Curiosities and Charivarieties."

Books Received.

From Lee & Shepard, Boston.
Broken Notes from a Gray Nunnery. By Julia Sherman Hallock. Price $1.25.
Aunt Billy, and Other Sketches. By Alyn Yates Keith. Price $1.25.
Kyzie Dunlee, "a Golden Girl." By Sophie May. Price 75 cents.
"Little Daughter." By Grace Le Baron. Price 75 cents.
Young Master Kirke. By Penn Shirley. Price 75 cents.
The Lottery Ticket. By J. T. Towbridge. Price $1.00.
Half round the World: or, Among the Uncivilized. By Oliver Optic. Price $1.25.
From Estes & Lauriat, Boston.
Nautilus. By Laura E. Richards. Illustrated. Price 75 cents.
Neal, the Miller, A Son of Liberty. By James Otis. Illustrated. Price 75 cents.
Jerry's Family. A Story of a Street Waif of New York. By James Otis. Price $1.25.
From D. C. Heath & Co., Boston.
Märchen und Erzählungen für Anfänger. By H. A. Guerber. Price 60 cents.
Lectures Courantes. Quarante leçons de lecture et de conversation suivies d'exercices de traduction par C. Fontaine, B.L., L.D.
Cornell's Le Cid. Edited with introduction and notes by F. M. Warren. Price 30 cents.
From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York.
Stories and Poems for Children. By Celia Thaxter. Price $1.50.
The Singing Shepherd, and Other Poems. By Annie Fields. Price $1.50.
From Leach, Shewell & Sanborn, Boston.
Shakespeare's Comedy of a Midsummer-Night's Dream. Edited with introduction and notes by Katharine Lee Bates. Price 35 cents.
From Ginn & Co., Boston.
The Principles of Argumentation. By George Pierce Baker.
From Harper & Brothers, New York.
Jude, the Obscure. By Thomas Hardy. Illustrated.
Red Men and White. By Owen Wister. Illustrated by Frederic Remington.
Oakleigh. By Ellen Douglas Deland. Illustrated.
From the Black Sea through Persia and India. By Edwin Lord Weeks. Illustrated by the author.
Notes in Japan. By Alfred Parsons. With illustrations by the author.
Sunshine and Haar. Some Further Glimpses of Life at Barneraig. By Gabriel Setoun.
People we Pass. Stories of Life among the Masses of New York City. By Julian Ralph. Illustrated.
Doña Perfecta. B. Pérez Galdós. Translation by Mary J. Serrano. Introduction by William D. Howells.
From Macmillan & Co., New York.
Katawampus: Its Treatment and Cure. By Edward A. Parry. Illustrated by Archie MacGregor. Price $1.25.

From Thomas F. Crowell & Co., New York.
The Making of Manhood. By W. J. Dawson. Price $1.00.
First Things First. Addresses to Young Men by Rev. George Jackson, B.A. Price $1.00.
London Idylls. By W. J. Dawson. Price $1.25.
From A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago.
Means and Ends of Education. By J. L. Spalding, Bishop of Peoria. Price $1.00.
Life and Love. By Margaret Warner Morley. Illustrated by the author. Price $1.25.
A Child of Tuscany. By Marguerite Bouvet. Illustrated by Will Phillips Hooper. Price $1.50.
From the Wood-Allen Publishing Company, Ann Arbor, Mich.
The Marvels of our Bodily Dwelling. By Mary Wood-Allen, M.D.
From D. Appleton & Co., New York.
Natural History of Selborne and Observations on Nature. By Gilbert White. Introduction by John Burroughs. Illustrations by Clifton Johnson. Price $4.00.
The Knight of Liberty. A Tale of the Fortunes of Lafayette. By Hezekiah Butterworth. Illustrated by H. Winthrop Peirce.
From Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York and London.
The Sale of a Soul. By F. Frankfort Moore. Illustrated by H. C. Edwards.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.
Grand Wedding March. For the Pianoforte. By Adam Gelbel.
The Miser's Remorse. Bass song as sung by Webster Norcross. Written and composed by Ino. E. Webster.
When Richelieu the Red Robe wore. Baritone or bass song in B-flat. Words by Leroy L. Hight. Music by Harvey Murray. Song for mezzo-soprano in E-flat. Wake not, but hear me, Love. Words from "Ben-Hur" by Lew Wallace. Music by Lillian L. Bissell.
Big Boy and Little Mama. Song in G. By Frances A. M. Bird.
The Road to Slumberland. Song in D-flat. By Frances A. M. Bird.
I'm a Perfect Peach. Song. Words and music by Charles Southworth Hill.
Little Studies for Little Hands. Waltz in G. By Irving Burdick.
March in C. Irving Burdick.
Mazurka in F. By Irving Burdick.
Swiss Song in C. By Irving Burdick.
From Wm. A. Pond & Co., New York.
Fairly Lillian. Etude Caprice for Pianoforte. By S. B. Mills.
La Lionjera. For Pianoforte. C. Chaminade. Revised and fingered by Wm. F. Pecher.
The Reveille March. Two-step. Louis Tocaben.
When the Moon climbs High. Words by Underhill Forbell. Music by Victor Gray.
"Shout Hosanna, Christ is born!" For Soprano. Words by Susan A. White. Music by John B. Marsh.
Angel's Song. Mezzo-soprano. Words by Edmund H. Sears. Music by Rose M. Eversole.
Down at Ephraim Johnston's. Words by Leontine Stanfield. Music by Frank J. Webbe.
Angels from the Realms of Glory. Christmas Anthem for quartette or chorus. By J. Haydn Waud.
Rejoice Greatly. Christmas Anthem. By A. W. Lansing.
The Heavenly Babe. Christmas Carol. By H. P. Danks.
Proclaiming "Peace on Earth." Christmas Carol. Words by Joseph Fletcher. Music by W. Dressler.
Hail! This Happy Morning. Christmas Carol. Words by Lavinia E. Brauff. Music by H. P. Danks.
A Little Town of Bethlehem. Christmas Carol. Words by Rev. Phillips Brooks. Music by A. G. Carmiencke.
Hear the Angels sing. Christmas Carol. By H. P. Danks.
Softly, gently, breaks the Morning. Christmas Carol. Frank H. Major.
Christmas Carol. Annual No. 33. With compositions by J. Mosenthal, A. J. Holden, Geo. W. Warren, W. O. Wilkinson, H. R. Shelley, B. E. Backus.
Christmas Carol. Annual No. 34. With compositions by W. Ahrens, H. P. Danks, R. DeKoven, Pond, Jr., Geo. W. Warren, S. B. Whiteley.
Christmas Services for the Sunday-school. By H. P. Danks.
Benedictus. Soprano Solo and Quartette. By W. E. Haesche.
Catalogue of Christmas Music.
Catalogue of Octavo Sacred Music.

AGENTS WANTED

"I made Josiah a han'some dressin' gown out of some sofa covering I had in the house. . . . It wuz very dressy with its beautiful tassels."

"SAMANTHA IN EUROPE."

A NEW BOOK BY JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE.
Agents Wanted Over 100 Illustrations by De Grimm.

She that is Josiah Allen's Wife Has Been to Europe. Josiah went along, and Baron C. De Grimm, the famous artist and caricaturist, followed them. They went to England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales; also to France, Germany, etc. The results are that we have now in press Samantha's latest and greatest of all her books, telling the "strange and skairful" story of their adventures in strange cities, royal palaces, and in out-of-the-way places. They also visited the Duke of Veragua, Eulalie, and others they had met at the World's Fair in Chicago. Baron De Grimm has made over 100 illustrations of the events of the trip, all of which will appear in the book. With its profound interest, depth of wit, genuine humor and sound philosophy, verily this book will sweep all before it. Not only Americans, but English, German, French and other folk are eager to read it. As many copies will surely be sold as were of all Samantha's other books combined: more than half a million. Write for terms and territory At Once. About 700 pages, large Octavo. Price, by Mail or Agent, Cloth, $2.50; Half Russia, $4.00. FUNK & WAGNALLS COMPANY, Publishers, 30 Lafayette Place, New York.

Christmas Cards, Booklets, and Calendars by Mail.

Our Card and Booklet packets have become a necessity in thousands of families at Christmas time.

We will send the first six packages for $3.25, and 20 cents for postage, or the complete set of ten for $5.40, and 40 cents for postage. Satisfaction guaranteed.

No. 1.—For fifty cents, and 4 cents for postage, 17 fine Christmas Cards, together with a cut out artistic TOY NOVELTY.

No. 2.—For fifty cents, and 4 cents for postage, 10 large and finer Cards, and a PAPER DOLL, with changes of costumes and hats.

No. 3.—For $1.00, and 6 cents for postage, a choice selection of 25 beautiful Cards, with one large, artistic NOVELTY GROUP.

No. 4.—For $1.00, and 8 cents for postage, 10 Calendars for 1896, including an EASEL CALENDAR and a SLIDING BANNER CALENDAR.

No. 5.—For 25 cents, and 2 cents for postage, 10 beautiful Christmas Cards.

No. 6.—For fifty cents, and 4 cents for postage, 6 LEAFLETS, tied with a ribbon or cord.

No. 7.—For 50 cents, and 4 cents' postage, 5 Christmas Booklets of Marcus Ward and others, with one POCKET CALENDAR for 1896.

No. 8.—For $1.00, and 8 cents for postage, 7 artistic Booklets, including one with words by Miss Havergal, and the Magnificat or Jubilate Booklet.

No. 9.—BIRTHDAY PACKET. For 50 cents, and 4 cents for postage, 10 fine Cards and 5 Birthday Booklets.

No. 10.—SUNDAY-SCHOOL PACKET. For 50 cents, 25 Cards, assorted, together with one of Marcus Ward's Booklets.

FOR TEACHERS. 50 Beautiful Cards, no two alike, some fancy-shaped, for $1.00, and 8 cents for postage. Better assortment, $2.00, and 10 cents for postage. A very choice selection, $3.00, and 20 cents for postage. And for 50 cents, and 4 cents for postage, 25 Cards, no two alike.

STAMPS AND POSTAL NOTES RECEIVED.

Selected with care for different tastes and ages. Also, Boxes of Assorted Novelties, Cut out Animals, Soldiers, etc., 25 and 50 cents a box. New and very attractive for children.

PAPER BY THE POUND. Sample sheets of paper and envelopes from 10 cents a pound and upward, with prices and number of sheets to a pound, sent on request of 15 cents.

SPECIAL OFFER. On orders of $10 and over we will prepay freight charges to nearest railroad station. Club your orders with friends, and take advantage of this. Agents and dealers should correspond with us.

For $1.75 we send a copper plate, finely engraved, with 50 cards. Estimating and Stamping. We guarantee satisfaction.

Handsome boxes of fine stationery, plain or illuminated, for 35 cents, 50 cents, 75 cents, $1.00 to $2.00 each, sure to give satisfaction.

H. H. CARTER & CO., 5 Somerset Street (near Beacon), Boston.

WANTED 5000 MORE BOOK AGENTS men and women, for the fastest selling book of the times DARKNESS & DAYLIGHT in NEW YORK With 250 new illustrations from flash-light photographs. Introduction By Rev. Lyman Abbott.

A Christian woman's thrilling story of years of rescue work "In His Name," alive with intense interest, touching pathos, humor and story. Most splendidly illustrated. $6th thousand in press. Bishops, Ministers, etc., say "God speed it." Eminent women endorse it. It sells at sight, and pays Agents from $50. to $100. a month. We pay Freight to all points, Give Credit, Extra Terms, Premium Copies, and Free Outfit. Write for terms and specimen engravings to HARTFORD PUBLISHING CO., Hartford, Conn.

Beautiful Books

of Noteworthy Literature

MESSRS. HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND COMPANY take pleasure in announcing a New Edition of the WORKS OF JOHN BURROUGHS.

A beautiful edition of Mr. Burroughs's writings in nine duodecimo volumes. Printed on cream-tinted laid paper, and bound in a simple but artistic style. With several portraits of Mr. Burroughs and engraved title-pages. Limited to 1,000 sets. Price, cloth, gilt top, $13.50, net, per set; cloth, paper label, untrimmed, $13.50, net; half calf, gilt top, $27.00, net.

Lovers of exquisitely made books, and lovers of the very engaging volumes which we owe to the fine observation and the literary skill of Mr. Burroughs, will heartily welcome this new edition which puts these treasures of literature into a form so artistic and every way attractive.

LATER LYRICS.

Selected from his four latest volumes of poetry by THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH. A gem of a book like Mr. Aldrich's XXXVI. Lyrics and XII. Sonnets, and Friar Jerome's Beautiful Book. 18mo, vellum or cloth, $1.00.

THE SINGING SHEPHERD, AND OTHER POEMS.

By ANNIE FIELDS. 16mo, cloth, paper label, $1.00.

The season is not likely to bring poetry finer than this or in a more engaging form.

STORIES AND POEMS FOR CHILDREN.

By CELIA THAXTER, author of "An Island Garden," etc. Edited by SARAH ORNE JEWETT. With a frontispiece illustration. 12mo, $1.50; also bound with a finely decorated cover for a Holiday Juvenile, $1.50.

A delightful book for children by Mrs. Thaxter, characterized by the remarkable freshness of her sympathies, the alertness of her imagination, and the immortal child element in her nature.

SONGS FROM THE GOLDEN GATE.

By INA COOLBRITH. With four illustrations. 16mo, gilt top, $1.50.

For a score of years or more Miss Coolbrith has been the acknowledged poet-laureate of the Pacific coast. She has now gathered her poems which she considers most worthy of permanent preservation; and they appear in an attractive book, carefully printed, tastefully bound, and fitly illustrated.

THOREAU'S POEMS.

Complete in a 16mo volume, carefully printed, with uncut edges. $1.50.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

Seeing and Being, and Other Sermons.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK. 234 pages Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Great Hopes for Great Souls; "A Mere Man"; The Constructive Achievements of the Higher Criticism; Tempted of God; The Price of Moral Freedom; Orthodoxy, what is it? Morality and Religion; The Conversion of Energy; Two Meanings of Religion; The Undiscovered Country; Samuel Longfellow; The Old, Old Story; The Fulness of Time; The Unbridled Tongue; Immortality; Seeing and Being.

"The Companion has been growing better, brighter every year for more than sixty years."

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION

A host of the most famous men and women in Great Britain and America have contributed expressly for The Companion for 1896—the 70th year of its publication.

For all the Family.

52
Times a Year.

Six Holiday
Numbers.

700
Large Pages.

$1.75
A Year.

Every member of the family, from youngest to the oldest, finds in each issue amusement and education in the Serial and Short Stories, in its Editorials, Anecdotes, Health and Miscellaneous Articles.

The Companion is published every Thursday and is received each week in more than thirty-six thousand post-offices in the United States, and by more than Half a Million Homes.

Special Souvenir Numbers, double in size and appropriate to each season, are published at Thanksgiving, Christmas, New Year's, Washington's Birthday, Easter and Fourth of July.

The size of The Companion page is four times that of the leading Magazines. In each Volume nearly 700 pages are given, profusely illustrated.

The subscription price is $1.75, paid in advance. No other weekly or monthly publication gives so great an amount of Entertainment and Instruction at so small a price.

Distinguished Contributors.

The Princess Louise.
The Marquis of Lorne.
The Lord Chief Justice of England.
Sir Benj. Ward Richardson.
Secretary of the U. S. Navy.
Secretary of the Interior.
Secretary of Agriculture.
Judge Oliver W. Holmes.
Sir William H. Russell.
Frank R. Stockton.
W. Clark Russell.
General Nelson A. Miles.
Hon. Thomas B. Reed.
The Dean of Salisbury.
Sir Edwin Arnold.
Justin McCarthy.
Camille Flammarion.
And
More than 100 Others.

Send for Full Illustrated Prospectus and Sample Copies Free.

REMARKABLE OFFER!

New Subscribers who will cut out this slip and send it AT ONCE with name and address, and $1.75, will receive:
FREE—The Youth's Companion every week till January 1, 1896.
FREE—Thanksgiving, Christmas, New Year's Double Numbers.
FREE—Our Handsome 4-page Calendar (7 x 10 inches), lithographed in nine colors. Retail price, 50 cents.
AND THE COMPANION 52 weeks, a full year, to January 1, 1897.

SEND

This slip with

$1.75

50-ct.
CALENDAR
FREE

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, 201 Columbus Ave., Boston, Mass.
Send Check, Post-Office or Express Order, or Registered Letter, at Our Risk.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.
DESTINY.

BY EMMA E. BROWN.

Fine traceries of birch, and here and there
The heavier scrawl of maple, ash, and oak,
Scribbling of larches, with the bold black stroke
Of Norway pines, and dash of spruces where
The forest clammers on from knoll to knoll,
And writes in hieroglyphics on the scroll
Of sunset all her children's names with care,—
A cabalistic language understood
By sturdy men, not wise in books or schools;
And on the morrow, 'gainst their glittering tools
And brawny arms, I know the brave old wood
Will battle mightily, till by and by
Upon the waiting stream below will lie,
Conquered and prone, the stalwart brotherhood.

Conquered and prone, indeed, but not destroyed!
Nay! thus prepared for use, and some erelong
Shall stand erect again amid the throng
Of stately ships: the tall, straight pine employed
Just as befits its height,—a towering mast,
Strong to resist the stroke of every blast;
While oak, ash, maple, and the supple birch that toyed
With every breeze ribs, beams, and rafters make.
The spruce, too, and the larch with boughs like lace,
But fibre firm as iron, shall find place
In many a home throughout the land, and take,
'Neath carver's tool, new beauty on its face.

Each finds at last its destiny; and we
Are Nature's children, too, and know erelong
By test of fibre just where we belong.
Why should we strive for what we cannot be?
Better it were to own the High Decree
That orders for us from our very birth
Our own one place and work upon this earth.
Ay! wise is he who yields to Destiny.

LESLIE'S LUCKY SIXPENCE.

Leslie Sylvern was a little girl who lived in a little house in a little town. The town was named Bubble, and was in Nebraska. Leslie was seven years old when her aunt from "back east" came to pay her mother a visit.

"She is just exactly like a fairy god-mother," Leslie confided to Billy. "She has silk dresses in her trunk, Billy, and I think one is velvet! She has the prettiest hands, with nails like the inside of the sea-shell that papa bought at the State Fair. She speaks soft, but the words sound as if they were loving you. And there's a smell about her clothes like our sweetbrier bush and the sweet peas mixed together."

"Can she shoot?" questioned Billy.

"I," faltered Leslie, "I don't—know."

"'Cos she ain't of much account," decided Billy, critically, "if she can't shoot. I seen a woman at a circus over in Kansas who could bust nine glass balls out'n every ten."

"My!" breathed Leslie with round eyes.

"Oh, she was smart!" condescended Billy, with a swagger. But before long he, too, surrendered to the stranger within the gates. He took Aunt Elyssa down to the old mill near which the wild ducks flocked. He drove her in a buckboard over the prairies. He hunted up for her the flowers she admired. He experienced a consuming sense of the vanity of all human affection when his Aunt Elyssa asked his mother to let Leslie go home with her.

"I intend," she avowed, "to saunter eastward at the most leisurely rate. I'll stay in Omaha a week, in St. Louis a week, and in Chicago a month. I have been such a rover all my life, I really believe I have friends in every city on the continent. I'll spend May in Washington, and spend about a fortnight in Philadelphia. I expect to get home about the end of June."

"But, Elyssa dear," her sister cried, protestingly, "what would you do with a child in all that travel? She would be a great care to you."

"She would be a great delight and comfort to me, Alice. You know I lost a little girl just Leslie's age. To have Leslie with me for a while would be almost like finding Fay. I'll promise to bring her back safe in the fall."

Mrs. Sylvern hesitated. She would miss the sunshiny presence every hour; but, if the child were to grow stronger, to be happier,—"Leslie may go," she decided softly.

Billy went out to the coop, and began throwing sticks at the chickens. He felt at war with the world. He, too, desired to see the wonderful world where there were shops and street-cars and crowds of people, the world where there was something to see beside corn, and that he could not—yet.

The day of Leslie's departure arrived. Billy swallowed his disappointment and a lump in his throat. He was genuinely sorry to lose this merry little sister of his, who looked so sweet and kissable in her new fawn-colored Gretchen coat and big rosetted hat. It was with a feeling of surprise he recollected he used not think Leslie as pretty as Janie Simonds, because she had a tooth out in the upper front row and freckles on her nose. He thought her beautiful just then.

"I'll mind your red bird and the rabbit," he promised, giving her a kiss redolent of the peppermint drops which had been bestowed upon him in compensation for staying at home.

"Will you? And the hen with the white forehead? She's mine, too. Yes, I'm coming, Aunt Elyssa! And tell Gracie Lanse she can play with my doll that has the legs loose,—not the one in the party dress, for the dress won't wash, and,—oh, mercy me, Billy," the words rising into a shriek of dismay, "if I didn't 'most forget my lucky sixpence!"

Billy's eyes rolled and blinked curiously, and he gulped at the air once as if struggling to speak.

"Jiminy!" he exclaimed, with a kind of perfunctory sympathy.

Leslie flew upstairs. Presently she was down again, clutching a tiny purse tightly.

"Goodness knows what might have happened," she later confided to her aunt, "if I hadn't remembered to bring my lucky sixpence. You see I found it one day, and old Mammy Mame was washing at our house; and she said, 'Long's you wear that round your neck, honey, or carry it in your pocket, you won't have no bad luck, nor nothin's goin' to happen you!' So it would be terrible if I'd forgotten it now!" And tighter still she held the little purse, as if therein lay immunity from all evil.

Leslie saw sights in the days that followed which made her dusk blue eyes open like morning-glories in the sunshine that follows dawn. She saw Omaha, precipitous, picturesque, progressive, with its odd little houses perched high on its clay banks, its homelike streets, and its electric cars whirring up and down. She saw St. Louis, staid and conservative, its fine old residences looking strangely desecrated by the smart shop buildings which had sprung up around them.

She saw the crowded streets of Chicago, and looked from the Auditorium tower across the tossing waters of Lake Michigan. She trotted down the shallow steps leading from the Capitol at Washington, saw Pennsylvania Avenue all gayly glittering at night, and peered in at the pillared portico of the White House. She wandered through the quaint parks, the handsome streets, the tempting stores of Philadelphia; and she felt herself the wisest of little women when she reached New York.

"If," she said to her aunt, with a sigh of satisfaction, as they ate their breakfast on the dining-car steaming into the Empire City, "if it wasn't for my lucky sixpence, we'd never be eating these lovely griddle-cakes now, would we?"

Mrs. Chalmers smiled at the solemn little face opposite. "How is that, dear?" she questioned.

"Well, you see there was that bridge outside Omaha that burned up. The train we came on might have been on that bridge at that time, if we hadn't come the day before. Then there was that cyclone in Illinois. We might have been blown away in that, if we got to Chicago before the day after. The rain in Philadelphia that made streets so muddy might have drowned us if there was enough of it; and the train that took us over the river might have tumbled off into the water, but," triumphantly, "nothing bad happened to us because I brought my lucky sixpence!"

Her aunt nodded.

"Once," Leslie continued gravely, "a cat came into our back yard. We think she was mad, 'cause she talked through her teeth. She would have bit Billy, only I came out and throwed a stone at her, and she ran away, because I had my lucky sixpence in my pocket."

"Indeed," Mrs. Chalmers said interestedly.

"Yes, and there," impressively, "were our chickens. A great big hawk was just a-flig-gering down to catch them; and I chased them quick into the covered coop, and fastened the door, so she couldn't. I had my lucky sixpence tied around my neck that morning."

"Gracious!" ejaculated Mrs. Chalmers.

"Oh, that wasn't much!" averred Leslie, deprecatingly. "Once my lucky sixpence saved my life. There was a lovely fair at the county seat. They had a merry-go-round there, and some colored people who sang in a tent. A boy got run over and killed; but I didn't!"

"How did that happen?"

"That I didn't get killed? Oh, I couldn't find my lucky sixpence, so I stayed at home."

"Oh!" comprehensively.

There never in this world was a little girl who kept her ears so wide open for accidents and calamities and catastrophes of all kinds as Leslie did that summer, and she was quite positive each and every one of them was only averted by her lucky sixpence. Taller, radiant, and healthy, her aunt took her back to Bubble in the fall.

"O Billy!" she cried, giving him a fusillade of kisses when she escaped from her mother's embrace: "I've brought you a real, sure-enough steam-engine; and—what's the matter?"

For Billy was looking strangely downcast and remorseful. "You didn't ought to bring me anything, Leslie. You know what I done," he said.

"I don't. Let her play with my doll with the party dress on?" in sudden suspicion.

"No. Worse'n that."

"Forgot to feed my red bird?"

"No. Can't you guess, don't you know?"

She shook her head.

"I—I took your lucky sixpence, just the loan of it, out'n the fastened-up part of your purse before you left; and I hadn't no chance to put it back."

A silence followed the confession.

"And I hadn't it at all?" said Leslie, staring amazed.

"No," replied Billy, penitently.

"And you had it all the time?"

"Yes." He timidly extended a battered dime with a hole in it. She took it from him.

"Billy," she declared magnanimously, "I'm almost glad you had it; for, if you hadn't, something would have happened to you, sure. Let's go and start that steam-engine!"—Kate M. Cleary, in the Youth's Companion.

THE LITTLE CHICKEN.

Aunt Bell sat on the veranda, reading. It was warm in the sunshine, but in the shadow behind the vines a little breeze shook the leaves and played with the stray locks of her pretty hair which Marjie loved to twine about her little fingers while listening to one of auntie's stories.

Marjie was not on the veranda this morning. She had been busily playing "house" with a little friend under the maple-tree; but at last they had grown tired, and seated themselves on the soft green grass.

Marjie and Louise had been the warmest of friends ever since the first day that Marjie had come to visit grandmamma and Aunt Bell, and had slipped one of grandmamma's cookies through the picket fence to the little girl next door. After that each morning Marjie would take Ida May and go next door to see Louise or Louise would bring Maud Irene to see Marjie. The children had played happily together until this morning, but something to-day had gone wrong. Perhaps Maud Irene's new hat caused the trouble. It had been sent all the way from Europe to Louise, and had a lovely white feather drooping over one side. It certainly was very becoming to Maud Irene.

"O Marjie, just see how beautiful Maud Irene looks!" cried Louise, clapping her hands. "I wish some one would send Ida May a hat just like it, don't you?"

"No," said Marjie, shortly, in a cross little voice, as she caught Ida May in her arms, "I don't like feathers, anyhow! And we're going to play hop-scotch the very next thing, so you needn't choose hide-and-go-seek."

"But I do choose," cried Louise, hurt at Marjie's sharp tone. "I'm the visitor to choose, and I don't like hop-scotch."

And then such cross words were said by these two little girls that Aunt Bell, who had been watching it all from behind the screen of honeysuckle, wondered if she had better call to them and end the trouble. But Louise had put Maud Irene in the carriage, and trundled her out of the yard so fast that the wonderful hat with the beautiful feather rolled off on the sidewalk before she could catch it. Then Marjie had the yard all to herself. She found a nice stone for hop-scotch, and began to play; but somehow there was no fun in playing alone. She tried to think of other games, but all seemed to need two to play them. She wandered slowly about the garden, feeling lonely and forlorn, not knowing exactly what made her so sad. At last Aunt Bell saw a little figure coming slowly up the veranda steps toward her. It sank down in a chair, and said plaintively,—

"Please, auntie, tell me a story."

Aunt Bell sat thinking for a moment, and then began:—

"Once there was a little chicken who lived in a beautiful yard. He was very happy running about among the flowers, but the best times he had was when the little bantam next door came to play with him. How they enjoyed themselves! Our chicken was kind and polite to his visitor."

"One morning as they were playing the lady of the house came out with a nice crust of bread in her hand. She saw the chickens together, and threw the crust down between them. But what do you think they did? Instead of nicely sharing the crust, each one flew to it, and seized it with his bill. They pulled and tugged with all their might until our chicken, who was the stronger, gave a sudden jerk, and pulled the crust away from his friend. The bantam was so angry that he ran as fast as he could home."

"And then our chicken had everything to himself, the beautiful garden, the lovely flowers, and the big piece of crust; but he felt very badly. He tried to eat the crust, but it didn't taste good after all. He tried to run about and play, but he felt too sad. He did not know what was the matter."

Aunt Bell paused, and looked toward the big piazza chair.

"Is that all the story?" asked Marjie. "I don't like such a sorrowful one. Why don't you make the chicken and the banty be friends again?"

"Don't you like the story, Marjie?" asked Aunt Bell, with a queer little smile.

"There's Louise alone on her piazza. She looks as though she had been crying."

Marjie slowly walked to the veranda steps and looked toward the house next door.

"Auntie," she said suddenly, "I think I'll go to Louise's house. Maybe she'll play hide-and-go-seek."

Then Marjie did not understand it, but Aunt Bell smiled at her so brightly, and said in her most loving tone,—

"Good-by, my dearest little chicken."—Eliza P. Sulphen, in the Christian Work.

A Good Almanac is one of the best books to have in the house for reference.

The Sunlight Almanac for 1896 contains 480 pages, bound in crimson leatherette and stamped in gold (worth 50c.).

Given Free to users of Sunlight Soap

How to obtain them. Commencing Nov., 1895, and until all are given out, purchasers of Sunlight Soap will receive one FREE from their grocer.

Contents. A Complete Almanac, Tables, Directions for Home Management, Language of Flowers, Gardening, Games and Amusements, Dress-making and Fashions, Recipes, Dreams and their significance (page 330).

Sunlight Soap

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

She matched the world in arms against man's right;
And, when the Fates would stay victorious France,
With her own conquests must they dull her lance,
And legions worn with fadeless battles smite.
O laughter at the shocks of time, her might Rejoiced in more than arms; the great advance
Through Europe of her triple ordnance
Man owes to her! O Century, born to-night,
Fulfill her glory! Europe still hath slaves,
Scourged by the Turk, mown by the Scythian car.
Siberia, more rich in heroes' graves
Than the most famous field of glorious war,
Yet waits; and by the bloody Cretan waves
Man suffers hope, and pleads his woe afar.

—George Edward Woodberry.

For the Christian Register.

THE RUSSIAN EMPRESS.

BY SOPHIA FRIEDLAND OF ST. PETERSBURG.

"Have you seen the empress to-day?" asked my friend, as we were strolling down the Nevsky Prospect toward the Anitschkoff Palace.

"Not yet. But if we can take our stand before the palace for fifteen minutes, unnoticed by the policeman, we will surely see her. The papers announced her arrival from Peterhoff, where she spent the summer; and this is the hour for her afternoon drive."

I had just finished my sentence, when I heard a voice close by saying in a loud, awe-struck whisper, "Gossoudarinja" (the Czarina). I gave a hurried look at the peasant, who at the approach of the imperial landau had taken off his cap; and in the resigned, gentle features of the man I once more read the deep love and devotion, the readiness to sacrifice his life for the czar and czarina, that characterize the common classes of Russia.

While the gates of the Anitschkoff Palace were being opened, I had sufficient time to look into the face of Alexandra Feodorovna, Empress of all the Russians, Queen of Poland, Grand Duchess of Finland, etc.

She is still in mourning for her father-in-law, the late czar; and the sweet face looked even paler than usual (her health is not very strong at present), but the smile with which she returned the greetings of her subjects might well win her every heart. Her eyes have rather a sad expression, but I am told by those who come in closer contact with her that the Russian czarina is anything but sad. That look is but the result of great seriousness and deep thought.

The sympathies of the Russian people were always hers. Some years ago, when the young Princess Alix of Hesse had been a visitor at her sister's, the Grand Duchess Elizabeth, wife of Grand Duke Serge, governor-general of Moscow, it was rumored that the Czarowitz Nicholas had fallen in love with her.

The Russians, as a rule, do not favor the German element in our country, least of all the number of Protestant princesses that crowd the emperor's court; and the powerful Panslavistic party actually hated the idea of another German for their empress, hoping the heir to the Russian throne would marry the Princess of Montenegro, a member of their own Church. But, when it became known that the little German princess was as good and intelligent as she was beautiful, the good-natured Russians made the sign of the cross, and asked God's blessing for her.

A year ago the young princess was suddenly called upon to leave her home and enter Russia, under the saddest circumstances, and the Russian people felt deep pity for her; but the prevailing sentiment all through the nation was hope, hope for the future.

Young, beautiful, highly educated, intelligent, kind-hearted, and beloved by her husband, would it not be easy for her to use her influence with him for the benefit of the Russian people?

Until now the Russians have not been disappointed, and they know whom to thank for the many improvements in their social institutions.

Life at the Russian court is not quite so attractive as foreigners usually believe. At least for the czarina it involves as much work as pleasure. She holds no "Drawing Room"; but, as the patroness of a great many benevolent societies and the imperial institutes, where the children of the nobility are educated, she has to receive a number of people on business, and also those who are entitled to a presentation. It requires a great deal of tact and a very good memory to say the proper thing to everybody.

The dowager empress was famous for both. Never did she forget to inquire after a sick daughter or an absent son. Once only was she known to make a mistake. When the veterans of the Turkish-Russian war were presented to her, she asked General Verofkine, who had lost his hearing in the war, whether his eyes were still troublesome.

The court is crowded with a number of young grand-duchesses, who, not having the responsibilities of the monarch's wife, lead a life of continued pleasures.

The great court balls at the Winter Palace are a brilliant spectacle, but a great nuisance to those who are unlucky enough to be invited. Unless it be their first experience, they actually hate it; but as nearly all of them occupy high positions, and are personally acquainted with their majesties, they have to be there when the czar and czarina take their round through the magnificently decorated ball-rooms. They arrive at half-past nine precisely, and leave at midnight. During these hours the visitors may be compared to dummies, as they hardly dare to move.

Woe to the dame whose modiste has been tardy; for, if her carriage stops before the palace at one minute after nine, she may as well, or rather the horses may as well, turn their heads homeward, for at nine o'clock the gates of the palace are closed.

Etiquette has to be observed by the czarina as well as by those who surround her; and I have often heard that the dowager empress, when much younger, used to tremble under the scrutinizing regards of the old Princess Kotchubey, the Great Mistress of Ceremonies.

On great national occasions, like the wedding of the czar or the coronation festivities, all the ladies invited have to appear in the national costume, the kokoschnik (diadem) and veil; but at the ordinary balls the length of the train and the décolleté of the waist are only subject to court etiquette.

A PRINCE'S GIFT.

One of the most remarkable stories of princely ingenuity in the making of gifts is published by the German newspapers, and is undoubtedly true. The English governess, to whom is intrusted the education of the German emperor's children, recently celebrated her birthday. The emperor and empress loaded her with gifts; and each of the imperial children, save one, gave her "something nice," as they had learned to say in English.

Prince Oscar, the fifth son, who is now just seven years old, brought his governess nothing but a small, empty pasteboard box. As the young lady showed some surprise, Prince Oscar said, "Don't be afraid, governess: there isn't anything in the box; but to-morrow papa's going to pull my first tooth, and I'll give you that, and you can keep it in the box!"

Next day the German emperor, with the persuasions and coercions customary in such cases, pulled the first tooth which his son Oscar had shed. True to his word, the prince came rushing with it to his governess, and deposited it in the pasteboard box. Youth's Companion.

THE GIRLS OF JERUSALEM.

Of social life the girls of Jerusalem know nothing, absolutely nothing, writes Edwin S. Wallace, United States consul at Jerusalem, in November Ladies' Home Journal. They occasionally meet, a few together, and appear to enjoy each other's company a little. They talk about their household work, —which is really everything they know,—and indulge in some light, gossip chat about friends, though their gossip is never of a harmful kind. In conversation they show some little animation and spirit; but, being ignorant and illiterate, they have no idea of grammatical form of expression. Occasionally cards, dominos, and checkers are played; but the native girls have little inclination for any pastime involving mental effort. Such things as dances, fêtes, and fairs, are unknown to the girls of Jerusalem. Occasionally, they are taken on a family picnic to some olive orchard near their homes, where they pass part of the day. From these and all similar gatherings men are barred. There is absolutely no commingling of the sexes. For a girl to appear at any assemblage where there are men would be regarded as audacious and shocking. No Jerusalem girl would do such a thing: she would not dream of committing so fatal a breach in the unwritten though well-defined law governing the conduct of her sex.

HOW A BOOK WAS WRITTEN.

Dr. Hoffmann, of Frankfort, Germany, whose "Shock-headed Peter" is one of the most famous child's books in the world, tells as a good joke how he happened to make it; for he is a quaint old German scientist, though good-humored. One Christmas he had been searching high and low for a suitable picture-book for his two-year-old boy, but in vain. At last he purchased a blank copy-book, and told his wife he was going to make a picture-book for the boy, "one he can understand, and in which the tedious morals 'be obedient,' 'be clean,' 'be industrious,' are brought home in a manner which impress the young child." Dr. Hoffmann was the head physician of the Frankfort Lunatic Asylum, and knew nothing of drawing; but he set to work and produced the gruesome picture of all the naughty boys and girls which everybody knows. His child was delighted; and, when some of his circle of literary friends saw it, they urged him to have it published before the boy spoiled it, and Dr. Loning, the publisher, said he would bring it out. "Well," said Dr. Hoffmann, "give me eighty gulden (about twenty-five dollars), and try your fortune. Don't make it expensive, and don't make it too strong. Children like to tear books as well as to read them, and nursery books ought not to be heirlooms. They ought to last only a time." An edition of fifteen hundred was quickly sold, and now one hundred and seventy-five editions have appeared in Germany, and forty in England; and it has been translated into Russian, Swedish, Danish, Dutch, French, Italian, and Portuguese, and it has penetrated India, Africa, and Australia.—Philadelphia Press.

Gold is tried by fire
—salt by water. Here's the way to try Bradley's

"Yorkshire" Salt

Stir well two tablespoonfuls of "Yorkshire" in a clear glass nearly full of water and let it stand five minutes. Do the same with the salt you are now using and compare the two. Which one contains lime and dirt?

Send your address and receive free a sample bag to make the trial. All grocers can supply "Yorkshire"—if you insist.

BRADLEY SALT CO.,

49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

CAUTION.

Spoons and forks not our make are frequently sold as "Rogers." Our trademark is 1847 Rogers Bros. "1847" guarantees original genuine goods, silver plate that wears, on nickel-silver. Look out for imitations.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO., Meriden, Conn.

"IT IS IGNORANCE THAT WASTES EFFORT." TRAINED SERVANTS USE

SAPOLIO

Dyspepsia,

* Gastritis

and all stomach troubles where that great life-maintaining organ refuses to dispense nourishment to every part of the body, and the sufferer gradually wasting away and losing flesh daily, finally meets his death from the perforation of a gastric ulcer or dies by actual starvation, can be cured, as has been done time and again, by the use of that great blood enricher, flesh and muscle builder, and strength creator. Give the vital centres of the body strength to perform their regular functions and perfect health is a natural sequence. Dr. Louis Faust, of Schenectady, N. Y., says of Bovinine, "In the severest cases of gastritis the stomach will bear it. For one month my mother lived almost exclusively on it during such a sickness." Over 25000 physicians use and endorse it.

Bovinine

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

CLOCKS.

FRENCH
TRAVELLING, ENGLISH
HALL, GILT AND CRYSTAL.

GUARANTEED TIME-KEEPERS

Bigelow,
Kennard & Co.
50 Washington St. cor West.

Henry F. Miller

Piano-fortes.

Henry F. Miller & Sons Piano Co.
88 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Rooms To Let.

Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at 36 RUTLAND SQUARE.

THE SAORED WHITE ELEPHANT.

The white or pink-splashed elephants are very rare; and in 1,352 years, between A.D. 515 and 1867, only twenty-four were captured, making about one in every fifty-six years. The last one captured was in 1885, and was conducted to the court of the King of Siam by his Royal Highness Somdetch Chowf Mahamalah Bramrah Parapako, amid much parade. His majesty accepted, and made the fortunate finder, with his mother and son, all poor natives, a present of a sum of money. The Siamese officials who brought the elephant to Bangkok were honored with an audience by his Majesty, and also given a number of valuable presents.

In former days the ceremonies attending the capture of a white elephant were very impressive. The discoverer, were he the humblest man in the kingdom, was immediately made a mandarin: he was exempted from taxation for the remainder of his life, and presented with large sums of money, the king himself giving him one thousand dollars. As soon as the capture was made, a special courier was despatched to the king, and a posse of nobles, with gifts and robes, started immediately for the scene of action. The ropes which the captors used in binding the royal victim were replaced by cords of scarlet silk. Mandarins attended to the slightest wants of the animal. Rich feather fans with gilt handles were used to keep the flies from it during the day, while a silk-embroidered mosquito net was provided at night. To remove it to the capital, a boat was built expressly for this purpose, and a magnificent canopy erected over it, ornamented, and bedecked as were the king's palaces. Silk draperies, heavy with silver and gold, enclosed the royal prisoner; and in this state he floated down the river, receiving the acclamations of the people. When near the city, the animal was landed, the king and his court going out to meet him and escort him to the city, where a place had been built for him within the royal palace grounds. A large tract of land was set apart for his country place, chosen from the best the kingdom afforded. A cabinet of ministers was appointed, and a large retinue of nobles to attend to the wants of his elephant majesty.

The priest of the king was appointed to see after the elephant's spiritual needs, and eminent physicians ministered to his physical requirements. Gold and silver dishes were supplied to feed him from, and every want was attended to as became one of the royal family. The city devoted three days to festivities, and the rich mandarins made it presents of great value and rarity.

When a white elephant died, the ceremonies were the same as those of a king or queen. The body lay in state for several days, and then it was placed upon a funeral pyre and cremated. This pyre often cost thousands of dollars, being made of the choicest sandal, sassafras, and other valuable woods. After the body had been thoroughly cremated, it was allowed to remain three days more. Then the ashes were collected, placed in costly urns, and buried in the royal cemetery, a magnificent mausoleum being erected over the spot.—S. C. Carrington, in California Magazine.

Music.

The New York Tribune, in an editorial on "The Musical Conductor," says:—

Three conductors who are now enjoying a special measure of European renown made their richest and most valuable experiences in the United States. Mr. Henschel has been conducting symphony concerts for ten years in London, and has achieved with them financial as well as artistic success, in spite of English conservatism. And Mr. Henschel won his spurs as a conductor in Boston. Instead of thinking his brief American sojourn unprofitable, he went back to Europe a decade ago with the confession that he had learned more in the last six months of his American career than in as many years in his native Germany. Mr. Gericke and Mr. Nikisch were men of larger experience than Mr. Henschel in the department of conducting; but they, too, found the opportunities offered to them in this country incalculably greater than they had ever enjoyed abroad or are likely to enjoy again, unless they should return to take their old place at the head of Mr.

Higginson's superb institution. America has thus had a much larger part than seems ever to have been suspected in developing these artistic prophets and lifting them into public view. Perhaps, too, America is responsible for a widening of their ideas, which has not produced such unalloyedly amiable results. Mr. Gericke returned to his old home and one of his old posts in Vienna. He took unto himself a wife, and thus riveted the bonds which held him to the Austrian capital. But, alas! there came reports of disagreements with the time-honored customs of the "Society of the Friends of Music"; and Mr. Gericke retired from his post as their conductor. Mr. Nikisch left us before the expiration of his contract, to become director of the Court Opera at Budapest; but he had been there scarcely a year when there came an explosion between him and the royal powers that be, and now he is going to conduct the Gewandhaus concerts in Leipzig regularly, and play the part of "star" conductor at the Philharmonic in Berlin. Did these good men imbibe social and political notions incompatible with the régime under which they were brought up along with musical experience while here?

Temperance.

An anti-saloon league has been working with great success in Ohio. It unites all opponents of the saloon, as it exists upon a common platform. It has a paid officer who traverses the State, and who has effected the organization of two or three hundred branches throughout the State.

Brockton, Mass., has built a magnificent city hall, at a cost of $310,000. At its dedication Hon. Z. C. Keith, ex-mayor, said, "The cost of this building has been more than saved to the people of this city during the seven years last past by the banishment of the saloon and the licensed places by your votes, supplemented by the action of the several boards of aldermen; and, ere this debt is paid, fourfold its cost will have been saved in this direction alone."

Here and There.

There are a good many new inventions on exhibition at the Mechanics' Fair, Boston. One of the most curious is an auger that bores a square hole.

One of Switzerland's mountain lakes, the Maerjelen See, at the foot of the Eggishorn, was completely emptied in one night during the hot spell in September. The lake was a mile long by a sixth of a mile wide and one hundred and thirty feet deep. The water probably escaped through fissures in the ice of the neighboring glaciers.

Some interesting discoveries have recently been made about animal life on the Hawaiian Islands. It appears that all the land and fresh-water shells are peculiar to the locality. Fifty-seven out of the seventy-eight species of birds and seven hundred out of the one thousand species of insects do not exist in any other portion of the globe.

"The safeguards adopted by the Bank of England to prevent that institution being robbed are about as thorough and complete as human ingenuity and mechanism can devise," says Mervin O. Todd, of Manchester, England. "Its outer doors are so finely balanced that a clerk by pressing a knob under his desk can close them instantly, and they cannot be opened again except by special process. The bullion department is nightly submerged in several feet of water by the action of machinery; and in some of the banks the bullion department is connected with the manager's sleeping-apartments, so that an entrance cannot be effected without setting off an alarm near this person's head.

"If a dishonest official during the day or night should take even one from a pile of a thousand sovereigns, the whole pile would instantly sink, and a pool of water take its place, besides letting every one in the office know of the theft."

LUSTER THE GREATEST

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

LABOR THE LEAST.

A penny proves it.
Address on postal brings trial quantity.

IT'S UNLIKE OTHERS. GROCERS SELL IT.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

named in the hope of confusing you—in the hope that you'll mistake them for Pearlina. For most people, that ought to be enough. It ought to convince them that the article so imitated, so copied, so looked-up to, is the one that is the best to use. If your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back—demand Pearlina.

382

JAMES PYLE, New York.

Stylish Jackets, Capes, and Furs.

Ladies desiring a just equivalent for their money, and Outside Garments of the very latest style and finish, should call at

Springer Brothers,

and examine their New Jackets. Handsome, Genteel, and as satisfactory in price as can be found in Boston. Central Location. Well-lighted salesrooms and courteous attendants.

500 Washington St., corner Bedford St., Boston.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "Blessed be Drudgery," "A Year of Miracle," etc.

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower-Furniture; Book-Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

Published in three styles:

Gift edition, fine cloth, wide margins, 60 pages, 50 cents.

Paper, ornamental, 26 pages, 15 cents. (In white, if desired.)

Cheap edition, 6 cents (ten copies for 30 cents, net).

"In 'The House Beautiful,' Rev. Wm. C. Gannett describes, with a rare combination of good sense and poetic insight, the essentials of a beautiful home, giving to flowers, books, and guests, for instance, their due place in its furnishing, while love is the bond that binds all together in gracious influence."—Literary World.

"It is on the side of sincerity, quietness, and simplicity. Meets with our entire approval."—The Critic.

"Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on 'The dear Togetherness' is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. Our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and, if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so."—The New Unity.

 For sale by booksellers or sent postpaid by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,

174 High Street, - - - Boston.

Just Published.

The Postulates of Revelation and of Ethics.

BY

THOMAS HILL, D.D., LL.D.

Contents:

PART I, POSTULATES OF REVELATION.—I. The Unseen Real; II. The Reality of Knowledge; III. The Infinite Knowable; IV. Final Causes; V. The Universe a Work of Art; VI. Power and Possibility; VII. Logic and Love; VIII. Beauty; IX. The Testimony of Conscience; X. The Infinite in Man; XI. Relativity and Reality; XII. The Universe a Revelation; XIII. Authority and Inspiration; XIV. Summary of Natural Sources of Religious Knowledge.

PART II, POSTULATES OF ETHICS.—I. The Field of Ethics; II. The Validity of Moral Perceptions; III. The Nature of Ethical Relations; IV. The Innocence and Sinfulness of Error; V. Love and Duty; VI. Determinism and Utility; VII. Duties Relative to Self; VIII. The Connection of Ethics with Religion; IX. Non-religious Morals and Moralists; X. Learning by Doing.

394 pages, with portrait, price $1.50.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

They End this way

—the names of most so-called washing compounds. And it isn't an accident, either. It's to make them sound something like Pearlina. That is the original washing compound—the first and in every way the best. These imitations are thus named in the hope of confusing you—in the hope that you'll mistake them for Pearlina. For most people, that ought to be enough. It ought to convince them that the article so imitated, so copied, so looked-up to, is the one that is the best to use. If your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back—demand Pearlina.

382

JAMES PYLE, New York.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites

many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods

in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus,

love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR NOVEMBER.

Unpardonable Sin." Rev. J. E. Roberts.
Savonarola: A Sketch. II. S. Fletcher Williams.
The Voice of Warning. James Rowe.
The Roman Catholic Church. Rev. Brooke Herford.
D.D.

At the Morning. Maud L. Cotton.

The Glorious Gospel.

Demands of the Age.

Sunday School Association.

Remembrance. H. C. Tenney.

The English Congregationalists. J. T. Sunderland.

A Lesson from Tolstoi. George S. Cottman.

Talk with Boys. Jessie Whittitt.

A Service of Welcome to the Church. Rev. Albert

Walkley.

Correspondence. Rev. Margaret T. Olmstead.

One Upward Look Each Day.

Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;

Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National

Alliance of Unitarian Women, Emily A. Fifield;

Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work,

Christopher R. Elliot; Literary Notes.

Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

* Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been re-issued, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.

2. God in the City.

3. Reaping Time.

4. Called to be Saints.

5. Prosperity and Adversity. (By George W. Stone.)

6. The Religious Situation.

7. The Forward Movement of Unitarianism. (By Rev. George Batchelor.)

8. Our Divine Partnership.

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Personals.

The Countess Marie von Linden has been graduated from the University of Tübingen with the degree of Ph. D., cum laude. She studied zoölogy, physics, and botany. The countess now intends to take a course in medicine at Zürich.

Mr. Stopford Brooke has been appointed chaplain to Manchester New College, Oxford, and will preach in the college chapel on Sunday evenings during term time. We understand that the principal and professors will, as hitherto, preach on Sunday mornings. The session of the college was opened on Tuesday with an address on "The Old Non-conformity and the Theory of the Church," by Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A., Professor of Ecclesiastical History under the Hibbert Trust.

All France is talking of the extraordinary attainments of Mlle. Jeanne Benaben, who received the college degree of bachelor of arts two years ago, when she was sixteen. She then became professor of philosophy in a woman's college at Lyons, and this year was a candidate at the Sorbonne for the important degree of licentiate in philosophy. The examiners, though prepared for a prodigy, were amazed at the extent of her erudition and her serene composure in dealing with the vexed problems of Descartes, Kant, and Comte. She was third on the list of two hundred candidates, all of them older than herself, and is now a lecturer on the science of the mind in the College of Rouen.

Charities and Reforms.

The Andover House Association has decided to change its name, and will henceforth be known as the South End Association,—undoubtedly, a change made for wise reasons. A new building has recently been leased on Harrison Avenue, which will afford facilities long desired. A group of Technology students have taken up their abode on Rollins Street, directly opposite the settlement.

It doesn't take long to raise a few hundreds of thousands for a popular charity in New York. At a recent meeting of the managers of St. Luke's Hospital it was decided to secure an endowment of $200,000 for the pathological department, in order to make it the most complete in the world. Within twenty-four hours the sum was secured by use of the mail and telephone. The Congregationalist.

The twelfth annual report of the South End Industrial School gives a good idea of the worth and value of this work, which will be needed so long as present school arrangements remain unchanged. This manual and industrial training tends to make people self-reliant and useful. The sewing-school and the dressmaking department, the classes in drawing, the printing-room, which last year graduated fifteen pupils into good places, the cooking, house-keeping, carpentry, and stenography classes, the boys' club, and the "Stamp-saving Society" have all contributed their share to the aggregate of useful and encouraging results accomplished in the school.

The fourteenth annual report of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute is marked by the manliness of purpose and hopefulness of tone that characterize all the utterances of Booker T. Washington, its principal. Through the year the attendance has been eight hundred and nine, representing seventeen States and one Territory. Instruction has been given in twenty-two industries. The influence of school and Negro conferences, the household and domestic economy of the school, the financial prospects, growth, and needs of the school, are all explained in the report, which may be had from Booker T. Washington, Tuskegee, Ala.

Education.

Every department of the great Exhibition of the Mechanics' Association, Boston, is filled, and in successful running order. All floor space is appropriated, the exhibits are almost endless in variety, representing every conceivable branch of industry, the whole constituting an industrial and business show worth going many miles to see.

It is a liberal education to spend a day at the Mechanics' Fair, Boston; and, if so much time cannot be spared, a couple of hours of an evening will enable the average visitor to learn much that he did not know before. The art gallery this year is not filled with the laudable efforts of amateurs, but is an art gallery in reality, of which its director, Mr. Frank T. Robinson, may well feel proud. The poster exhibit, too, is something unique in the way of art exhibits, and will serve to interest, and also, it is feared, to give a strong impulse to the craze for collecting posters, which has already sent so many excellent people to the lunatic asylum.

WILBERFORCE UNIVERSITY.—This institution is located three and a half miles north-east of Xenia, Ohio, central to the colored people of the United States, near the territory of the South, yet free from the depressing influences of slavery, which existed for so many years. By its peculiar trusteeship it is brought into close touch with more than a million of colored people. The University was reorganized by the African Methodist Episcopal Church in 1863, to be used, irrespective of denomination or creed, as an institution of learning for the colored race, which at that time was excluded from all the schools of higher education except a few, of which Oberlin was chief. Their admission into others, if admitted at all, was on such conditions as few persons of color would accept. On the 3d of July, 1863, the school was reopened. Six students only were present. In 1865, on the evening of the 14th of April, the large, beautiful frame building, worth about $40,000, was burned to ashes. On the same ground a large and substantial brick building was erected, at a cost of about $45,000. This institution since its reorganization in 1863 has sent forth between four and five thousand undergraduates, quite well prepared to play an intelligent part in life; also nearly two hundred graduates. They have come from every section of the country. During the last three or four years from twenty-five to thirty States have been represented annually. These students are to be found in almost every section of the country in the various grades of useful and honorable employment. The enrolment of last year was over three hundred. It will be larger this year. Connected with the faculty have been instructors from Edinburgh, Berlin, Harvard, Amherst, Oswego, Oberlin, Ann Arbor, and other prominent institutions. There are nineteen instructors. The departments include theological, collegiate, law, normal, business, music, industrial, and preparatory. The state supports the normal and industrial department. The military department is supported by the United States. The property consists of sixty-three acres of land, on which are located three substantial brick buildings and thirteen frame ones. The usefulness of this institution is only limited by its meagre amount of means.

Science.

It is said that in future firemen's clothes in England will be made of asbestos or mineral wood. It is non-combustible, a non-conductor of heat, and is in no way injured by water.

According to the Boston Journal of Commerce there is something quite unaccountable in the behavior of telegraph wires through the four and one-half miles of Hoosac tunnel. According to the journal, the electricians have so far failed to cause signals to pass through the wires traversing the tunnel; and they can assign no reason for the failure.

The Boston correspondent of the Springfield Republican says of one exhibit in the great Mechanics' Fair, now in progress: "Would the visitor see a far greater wonder, in colors, made by Nature, let him step on to the platform just back of this brilliant turnout, and observe the collection of butterflies. It is most wonderful. Such warmth and variety of color, such changing tints, such delicacy of form, man cannot reproduce. There are butterflies from India, from Colombia, and other foreign countries, as well as from our own locality. They are mounted in a most skilful way, so as to display their colors to the best advantage; and a letter could be written about them alone."

Christian

Entertainments!

No church ought to be without facilities for furnishing pure recreation. With a Stereopticon the interesting places of the world can be shown; inspiring moral and temperance stories illustrated; humor made realistic; choicest statuary and artistic gems flashed upon the screen. Do you know of anything better? We don't.

Write for free literature. Large illustrated catalogue 20 cents.

RILEY BROTHERS,

Branches: 16 Beekman St., New York. BOSTON, 244 Washington St. CHICAGO, 196 La Salle St. KANSAS CITY (Mo.), 516 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS, 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA, 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO, 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND, 411 Couch St.

DIE

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

Two large pies are made from each package of None Such Mince Meat. For sale by all Grocers. Be sure you get the None Such—avoid imitations.

MERRELL-SOULE CO., Syracuse, N. Y.

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.

ONE OF MANY REASONS WHY.

If it had no other original designs than the simple, practical one of re-wicking here illustrated, the

Miller Lamp

Might reasonably claim superiority. But there are several others you can learn about by sending for our ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE, free to all addressing

EDWARD MILLER & CO.,

Mill and Factories, Meriden, Conn.

63 Pearl Street, Boston.

Important Works. Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By REV. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Utaral and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMAN; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troubled, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star! The Star!"

"Afterglow," like Gannett's "Wrestling and Blessing," is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged.—Christian Register.

Vexed Questions in Theology. A Series of Essays. By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. 250 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The remarkable faculty possessed by James Freeman Clarke for presenting difficult problems in a simple way—clearing away all non-essentials, and having the heart of the subject stand out vividly and helpfully—is nowhere better seen than in the present volume. For any earnest seeker after the more reasonable thought of God, duty, life, religion, the book has very much of help.

Kindling Thoughts. By ELIZABETH P. CHANNING. 315 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

Contains fifty-seven brief essays, such as Deo upon the heart; The angel in the shadow; A disappointed life; Plain living and high thinking; The spiritual tangle; The charm of the old; Accepting ourselves as we are; etc., etc.

It is a long time since anything so brightly refreshing as these Kindling Thoughts has come to us. They are full of that best cheer which comes from the deepest, clearest springs of faith.—Unitarian.

Gems of the Orient. Selections from Eastern Wit and Wisdom. By Rev. C. D. B. MILLS. 238 pages. Cloth, full gilt, $1.50.

"The choicest gems of thought and expression from the literatures of the ages; the really fresh and living utterances of truth and the law of excellence, scattered along the different centuries of human history." "Full of invigorating and uplifting power."

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Mr. Chadwick's Sermons.

The Twenty-first Series of Mr. Chadwick's Sermons is printing in the usual form for the season of 1895-96. Copies can be had for six cents each, the annual series for fifty cents, including postage of copies sent by mail.

Now ready:—

1. The Public Service of Religion.
2. The Beseeching God.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

CHURCH CARPETS

AT MANUFACTURERS' PRICES. 658 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.

Pleasantries.

"What time does the last train leave?" asked the traveller. And the gate-keeper at the Boston depot gave him a haughty look and replied, "When the road quits business."

The Deacon's Wife: "I hope you have been careful about the new minister's qualifications?" The Deacon: "Yes. We made him define exactly what he means by 'a few words.'"—Brooklyn Life.

"No, Willie dear," said mamma, "no more cakes to-night. Don't you know you cannot sleep on a full stomach?" "Well," replied Willie, "I can sleep on my back."—Harper's Round Table.

A district school-teacher in New Hampshire has had great difficulty in explaining adverbs to a class of children. After toiling faithfully with them, he said: "Bring in a list of adverbs to-morrow. Remember that a great many adverbs end in ly." The next day one boy's list began, "Slowly, fastly, lily, emily!"—Harper's Round Table.

Wife (coming down from the store-room): "There you are! We'll have a treat to-day,—two cans of oysters I bought when Firkin sold out last May." Husband: "Last May? Heavens! why have you kept them all this time?" Wife: "The idea! What ignorance! Don't you know oysters are only fit to eat during the months that have an R in them?"—Sacred Heart Review.

Dr. Guinness Rogers, the well-known Congregational minister in England, was recently in Oban, Scotland, and was expected to preach. As is customary, the town-crier's services were invoked to secure an audience, and the people learned that they were to listen to Dr. Genesis Rogers, until Dr. Rogers's son heard the man, stopped him, and corrected the distortion.—Independent.

Echoes from the Syracuse Convention.—Dr. Wells said: "When I heard the address of the retiring Moderator, I felt that we were getting the quintessence of wisdom. Then came the burning brand from Oberlin, setting fire right and left. But, when I heard the Chicago pulpit orator (Dr. Gun-saulus), I felt like a barnyard fowl tied to the tail of a meteor which went gleaming and flashing through dizzy depths of space."—The Advance.

Near Hartford, Conn., where the aged Harriet Beecher Stowe lives, they tell a good story of her small grandson. A neighbor found him swinging rather too vigorously on another neighbor's front gate, and warned him that Mr. Smith might not like it. Whereupon the independent young gentleman remarked that "I don't care for Mr. Smith, or his ox, or his ass, or anything that is his." "Do you know who wrote those words?" asked the friend, deeply shocked. "Oh," was the nonchalant reply, "I d'no,—Grandma Stowe, I suppose!"—Boston Commonwealth.

During an exciting debate in the House of Representatives the members sometimes indulged in mixed metaphors. The National Tribune prints these specimens: A member, in referring to one of his colleagues, said: "The gentleman, like a mousing owl, is always putting in his oar where it is not wanted." In another speech occurred this expression: "The iron heel of stern necessity darkens every hearthstone." And another member, in a very forcible and dramatic manner, asked the House this startling question: "Would you stamp out the last flickering embers of a life that is fast ebbing away?"

A DEPARTMENT STORY.

Some years ago the Agricultural Department at Washington received a scrawly letter from a Wisconsin farmer. It was one of many, of course, but was noticeable for its laconic indefiniteness.

The envelope was addressed to the "Agricultral Deptment, Washntn, D.C.," and the communication itself ran thus:—

"Sir, I want a agrucultral report on being in the farmin busness I orter git it."

It happened that the gentleman in charge of the department correspondence was a very conscientious and even elegant letter-writer, and partly by way of pleasantry he replied to this communication in his most elaborately courteous manner. The department would be most happy to comply with its esteemed correspondent's request, he declared, but it needed to be informed somewhat more specifically which of its numerous reports was needed. Would Mr. — be kind enough to mention the date, or at least the subject of the document in question?

Mr. — replied promptly and succinctly thus:—

"I don't care a rap what the book is about or when it was rote. I want it fur a skrap book."—New York World.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Atlanta Exposition.

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors. Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Convenient to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.

EBBITT HOUSE,

WASHINGTON, D.C.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.

Popular Prices. Regular rate $4.00 per day up. Fifty rooms on the sixth floor, with steam heat and electric light, reduced to $2.50 and 3.00 per day. Fifty rooms on other floors reduced from $4.00 to $3.50 per day. Parlor and alcove parlors at equally low rates. Special rates for the Army and Navy Officers and the Clergy.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

A WINTER IN CALIFORNIA.

Parties will leave Boston in Elegant Trains of Palace Vestibuled Sleeping and Dining Cars, Tuesdays, November 19 and December 10, for Los Angeles, San Diego, etc., by way of Chicago, Kansas City, and Santa Fe. The tickets cover every expense of travel both ways, and give the holder entire freedom on the Pacific Coast. They may be used returning on Any Regular Train until July, 1896, or with Parties under personal escort, with a Choice of Three Different Routes.

Tours to Atlanta Nov. 5, 11, 13, 19, 25, and 27; and Dec. 3, 9, 11, and 17.

Additional California Tours, Jan. 7, Feb. 11, and March 3, via Chicago, Kansas City, and Santa Fe, and Jan. 23, Feb. 13, and March 5, via New Orleans.

Tours to Mexico January 23 and February 13. Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines; also Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular trip desired.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,

296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

BOILING WATER OR MILK.

BARLEY CRYSTALS

New Diuretic, Relaxing Tonic Cereal; also

Gluten Dyspepsia Flour, and Diabetes Flour.

Pamphlet and Cooking Samples Free.

Unrivalled in America or Europe. Ask Dealers, or Write Farwell & Rhine, Watertown, N.Y., U.S.A.

XMAS DIALOGUES, Pieces to Speak and how to get up Fascinating Sunday School Entertainment—all 10c. J. & P. B. MYERS, 85 John St., N.Y.

WANTED.—Young man desires board in the country, preferably in family of a Unitarian clergyman. Would pay extra for lessons on piano and French or German. Address R. L. P., Boston Transcript.

Thanksgiving Proclamation.

A special feature of the annual Harvest Festival is the Elaborate Dinner prepared for the Family and its Friends. Your table will doubtless groan under a great weight of seasonable, good things. With the important fact in mind that food is more palatable when properly served, we call to your attention our list of THANKSGIVING NECESSITIES.

ABRAM FRENCH COMPANY,

CROCKERY, CHINA, GLASS, AND SILVERWARE,

89, 91, 93 Franklin St., BOSTON.

USE "DURKLE'S SALAD DRESSING"

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building,

BEACON STREET, BOSTON,

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin

BLAKE BELL CO.,

Boston, Mass.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

New York, N.Y., 11 West 86th St.

THE JACOTOT SCHOOL. (adj. Central Park). A Boarding & Day School for Girls. Mile. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Fall term begins Oct. 1. Kindergarten begins Oct. 15.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address

HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address

JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION

for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

A PHYSICIAN'S WIDOW, who has travelled extensively abroad, will conduct a small party through Spain, Southern France, Italy, and Egypt, leaving New York by S.S. "Kaiser Wilhelm," Jan. 22, 1896. References exchanged. Address Mrs. Dr. RANDOLPH, 179 Herkimer Street, Brooklyn, N.Y.

A DOZEN SOUP PLATES.

A DOZEN OYSTER PLATES.

A DOZEN OYSTER FORKS.

A PAIR, OR SET, OF CARVERS.

A PAIR OF CLARET BOTTLES.

A DOZEN WINE GLASSES.

A CUT GLASS SALAD BOWL.

A DOZEN FRUIT KNIVES.

A DOZEN NUT PICKS.

A CHEESE PLATE.

A HANDSOME GAME SET.

A DOZEN FINGER BOWLS.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register.

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1895.

NUMBER 47.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; The Question of Conformity,	765
Church Commerce; Why Dr. Gregg rang the Bell,	766
MUSINGS,	766
BREVITIES,	767
PRO AND CON.
Shall we remain Congregationalists?	767
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Genoa, by Augusta Larned,	767
Russian Art and Artists, by Sophie Friedland; Boston Unitarian Club,	768
American Unitarian Association,	769
Education in the South, by Rev. A. D. Mayo; The Young People's Meeting at Washington,	772
New England Associate Alliance,	778
Thanksgiving; John S. West,	779
LITERATURE.
Book Notices,	773
Books and Authors,	774
Miscellaneous; Literary Notes; Books Received,	775
THE HOME.
Jim Elkins's Stripes, by Sarah Bierce Scarborough,	776
The Chaperones; A Bird's Nest of Metal; A Successful Scarecrow,	777
POETRY.
The Gospel of Art,	767
At Break of Day, by Mary S. Bacon,	772
Slow and Sure,	776
The Lord's Prayer in Van, by Alice Stone Blackwell,	778
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	770
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	770
PERSONALS,	779
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	779
EDUCATION,	779
PLEASANTRIES,	780

Editorial.

WITHOUT waiting to agree upon a basis of union depending on belief, the Massachusetts Committee of Congregational Ministers are seeking a plan for practical co-operation in actual parish work. There is no town in the Commonwealth in which there are not certain families, many of them living at a distance from the centre, who are under the ministerial care of nobody, as arrangements are at present. Various methods have been suggested by which the ministers of our churches might agree on some plan for visitation of these outlying families, in order to bring them under sympathetic care. It is proposed that this subject of co-operation be considered at the union meetings which are held in many towns on Thanksgiving Day.

THE situation in Turkey grows more and more complex. The government seems to be absolutely demoralized. All Armenians are in terror of their lives; and, allowing for the exaggeration of newspaper reports, there is every probability that thousands have been sacrificed since the Sassoun butchery. At Harpoot eight of the twelve buildings of the American missionaries have been burned. It is possible that this event may change somewhat the attitude of our own government. Germany, it is reported, is to take a hand in securing a settlement. The European powers are jealous of each other on the principle that all men join to guard what each desires to gain. In the interest of civilization, nothing better could happen than the dismemberment of Turkey. Nothing but European occupation can secure justice for Christians in Asia Minor.

DR. S. F. SMITH, the author of "America," did not die without knowing the success he had unexpectedly achieved. The tribute paid to him last spring showed how many elements of patriotic and personal satisfaction were blended in the offering. Dr. Smith reached an age far beyond the average. But, though eighty-seven years old, he was still vigorous enough to preach, and was on his way to an engagement at Hyde Park, Mass., when he died suddenly on the train. His life was nobly lived and nobly ended.

IF it is disheartening to turn to Armenia, it is sickening and humiliating to read that but a few days ago a Negro was burned to death in Texas, under circumstances of fiendish cruelty which the Turks and Kurds could not surpass. It is one of the weaknesses of our American system of government that crime is treated as a local matter, and that, though the vast majority of people in the United States do not believe in lynching, it can still be carried on in communities which have not accepted the standards of modern civilization. There is no State in the Union that is not able to put down lynching if it deems it worth while; and, until lynching is forever banished as a relic of barbarism, the United States must bear the disgrace and the Negro must suffer the injustice.

THE Baptists of New York have been discussing the question of Christian unity. Rev. Dr. David H. Greer, rector of St. Bartholomew's Episcopal Church, said, in part: "We hair-splitting religious denominations, striving after unity, are a kind of a fusion ticket; and it does not appear to be any better day for fusion in ecclesiastical circles than it is in politics. After the leaders of the different denominations have talked themselves hoarse over unity, they go straightway and vote straight tickets. We Episcopalians have had a good deal to say lately about Christian unity; but, if you look at us real hard, you will find out that our unity means that we want you all to believe as we do. I believe that Christian conduct is the first and ultimate ground of Christian unity." And this leads the Herald of Gospel Liberty, the organ of the Christians, to say: "This is only another way of teaching the doctrine of the Christians,—that Christian character should be the only test of fellowship. Conduct determines character. There is no other ground for Christian union."

THE English people, after they get through with Turkey, will need to turn their attention to Zanzibar and Pemba. Results of inquiry made by the British Anti-slavery Society, and set forth in the New York Observer, show that a terrible system of slavery exists in these territories: "Of the population of 400,000, no less than 140,000 are slaves, only five per cent. of whom were born in slavery, the rest having been captured in slave raids in the African interior, and sold to the Arab planters and employers in the islands. These unfortunates are forced to work without wages, are sold from hand to hand, imprisoned in jails if they attempt to escape; and, though in Zanzibar they have some right of appeal, in Pemba they are absolutely at the mercy of their masters. Under British permits, owners may transfer their slaves from one island to the other,—a privilege used to run cargoes to the slave marts on the Persian Gulf; and, to make good this drain and the loss by death, no less than 6,000 new slaves are smuggled in from the interior every year. As every slave reaching a market represents four blacks killed in slave raids, or dying en route to the coast, the total of slaves in the British protectorate stands for a slaughter of more than half a million blacks in the interior, and the number of new ones annually added for a slaughter of 24,000."

THE excuses given for the maintenance of this system are such as have always been made to the emancipation of slaves; namely, the "violent dislocation of all interest." It is said that the British protectorate is only five years old, and there has not been time to eradicate slavery. "It is urged, too, that the economic consequences of general emancipation would be disastrous, the chief industry of the islands—the growth of cloves—depending for success on slave labor; that the Arab owners would emigrate to the German territories; that freed Negroes will not work; and that the criminal class would be largely increased." But our contemporary shows that these are mere excuses prompted by love of gain or fear of loss, and that no serious attempt has been made to accelerate emancipation. Undoubtedly, so long as this is left to the traders, it will not be done. Fortunately, the public mind of England is waking up to this evil.

OUR contemporary, the Religious Herald, ventures the assertion that "the unexpected always produces the greatest effect." But this assertion, drawn from its "Wellsprings of Thought," is a dangerous precept as a controlling element in either art or life. The minister who accepts it will make his sermons a constant series of surprises, and there is no great difficulty in achieving a cheap sensationalism of this kind. The artist will run to the bizarre, the novelist become fantastic, the actor extravagant. The effectiveness of a surprise depends somewhat upon its nature. In music it may be an unexpected modulation or a crash of sound. The modulation may be as agreeable as it is unexpected, and the crash may be an abomination of noise. Haydn's "Surprise Symphony" received the name from the sudden introduction of the drum at an unexpected point. The interest of the symphony, however, has very little to do with the surprise feature from which it is named. While there is a certain crispness in art, music, literature, from piquancy and originality, it is just as well to remember that the expected need not be the commonplace. In music, as Mr. Curwen well says, "the ear remembers, and expects." It remembers a theme or a strain, and delights to hear it again, especially after it has wandered through some unexpected wilderness of discord. Neither spring nor autumn is any less beautiful because we expect the bloom and the fruit. It will be found that, after all, the solid enjoyments of life are those which depend upon the constancy of Nature and her laws,—the things we expect and are reasonably sure to get. Surprises are the condiment, not the nourishment. Dr. George Putnam, in his day one of the most popular preachers of Boston, used to preach over a great many of his sermons because his people constantly demanded to hear them; and one of his most popular sermons was preached fourteen times in his own pulpit, showing that with sermons, as with music, people may delight to hear that which has already become familiar.

THE Independent has been holding a symposium on the observance of Sunday, and has articles from a large number of contributors. The question how Sunday shall be observed so as to secure all the rest and all the profit which the day may furnish is one thing. The question how far we are bound by Mosaic traditions is quite another. It is time that the two questions were separated; and Prof. J. Henry Thayer of the Harvard Divinity School does separate them in his article, in which he shows that Sunday is not a continuation of the Jewish Sabbath, and that there is "no law of the Sabbath" for a Christian man. Prof. Zahn of the University of Erlangen likewise says: "It never entered the minds of the Christians of the first three centuries to regard Sunday as a continuation of the Jewish Sabbath or to call it the Sabbath. Not until the fourth and fifth centuries do we find the beginnings of this way of regarding the subject. The early Christians called it not Sunday, but the 'Lord's Day.' Sunday was a weekly-recurring Easter festival. Therefore, too, it was in every particular conceived as a day of joy. That on these festival days ordinary work was left aside as much as possible was matter of course. But it is significant for the earliest idea of Sunday that in the earliest church literature there is virtually nothing said about this point. Even as late as the fourth century nothing is said except that, as far as possible, Sunday should be marked by rest from labor. In the writings of the first three centuries there is but a single passage in which even as much as a mention is made of rest from labor on Sunday."

THE QUESTION OF CONFORMITY.

SOME months ago the writer was present at a Sunday service in a chapel of one of the English universities. It was an important day in the ecclesiastical calendar. There was much pomp and ceremony, and the occasion was made illustrious by the presence of various guests. Among them was a Roman Catholic scholar, who sat with the other dignitaries in the choir of the church. During the services, which were wholly liturgical, the Anglican tradition of reverence required the audience to stand most of the time, which was somewhat fatiguing to the flesh, whatever effect it may have had upon the spirit. After the service, among a knot of fellows and professors who dined together, the Roman Catholic guest was criticised for not standing during the service. The question was immediately raised, however, whether the Anglican scholars who were criticising him would have knelt and crossed themselves if they had been guests in a ceremonial of the Roman Catholic Church. Possibly, some of the High Churchmen would be glad of such an opportunity. But it was evident that several of the critics would have been afraid of compromising themselves by such a mere physical act in a Roman Catholic Church.

The question of conformity or nonconformity which this question opened is an interesting one, and to European travellers it is sometimes a matter of practical importance. The Protestant visitor to a Catholic church during service time has to decide whether he will kneel during the mass, whether he will sit quietly in his seat, or whether he will walk around and look at the pictures, as travellers often do, paying no more attention to the service than if it were a puppet-show. The question of conformity may be sometimes a matter of principle and sometimes a simple matter of courtesy. To take off one's hat when passing the colors is a part of the ritual of the United States army, and there are many good citizens who observe it likewise. But, if Congress or the President should issue an order that every American should doff his hat to the flag under penalty of fine or imprisonment if he neglected to do so, there would be a revival of the story of William Tell. The free act of reverence or courtesy is one thing, and a compulsory act is another. The Puritans revolted against certain practices in the Roman Catholic and in the English churches. Their hatred of bands and surplice and Prayer Books may seem trivial to us to-day. But they stood heroically for certain principles of liberty and simplicity. The things they objected to were the symbols of the oppression they resisted. The battle they fought was worth fighting, and the English Church and the Roman Catholic Church have both been benefited by the liberty which the Puritans helped to bring in.

Nevertheless, the Puritans and reformers, in their search for breadth, dropped into narrowness themselves. They became formal in their rejection of forms, and they tended to magnify the few which they retained. This was illustrated by the Quakers. Drab clothes and broad-brimmed hats, a decided formalism in conversation, was the result of a too rigid and too literal contention for simplicity.

The principle of freedom for which the Protestant conformers contended has been won; and, now that every one is free in this and other civilized countries to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience, the question of conformity assumes a new aspect. We have now not only the freedom to reject, but the freedom to choose. In the exercise of this freedom the children of the Puritans are using liturgies and responsive services, the Quakers are taking to music, their children are copying the fashions of the day; and, in the cathedrals of Holland, Protestants are trying to restore on the walls the frescos which their fathers covered with white-wash.

When a devout Protestant attends a Roman Catholic service, it does not follow, when he bows and kneels during the service, that he accepts the infallibility of the pope or believes in transubstantiation any more than it follows that a Methodist believes in Calvinism when he stands in a Presbyterian church during prayer, or that a Presbyterian is an Arminian when he kneels in a Methodist meeting. The Protestant who enters a Turkish mosque is none the less a Christian, but perhaps a little more so when he takes off his shoes; and the Turk is no less a Mohammedan when he takes off his hat in a Christian temple.

We are coming to a time when, without sacrificing our own convictions, we may hold in due respect not only the convictions of others, but the forms which represent them. We may wish, indeed, to beware of encouraging superstition by accepting superstitious practices. But, even under idolatry, we may recognize the primal sentiments of religion, and seek to avoid giving unnecessary offence. A missionary among the Indians may not wish to give his sanction to the orgies of the sun-dance, but the sympathetic study of their mythology and traditions would show him much that was worthy of respect. There are symbols and practices which are obstacles to progress and enlightenment, and we must sometimes get rid of the practice before we can kill the superstition concealed in it. But the way for doing this is sometimes made easier when we recognize that which is æsthetic and poetic in rituals which we are not accustomed to use, or when we pay courteous respect to forms which are not a part of our own heritage.

CHURCH COMMERCE.

Word comes from over the sea of an English archbishop who has published a letter discountenancing church fairs of every kind as an unsuitable way of raising money for religious purposes. He does not actually forbid it, but that would be a brazen parish which would dare open a bazaar in his see. We have no archbishop to issue such a mandate here; but public opinion is practically changing concerning the holding of fairs, with their attendant raffles, and voting contests and similar dubious ways of raising money for religious purposes. From the best church fairs the element of chance has disappeared, though hardly a week passes during the winter that reports do not appear in the papers of voting contests and guessing trials which are little better. The fair, as a rule, is now more in the nature of a sober sale, where hand-wrought articles are set forth. The more closely they can be kept to this plan, especially if the articles are not such as can be purchased at any shop in the vicinity, the less objectionable they are; for the things that are made may supply a genuine want in the community. But, even where they profess to be only "apron sales," there are often to be found the wearisome products of the common fair,—tidies, mats, cushions, all sorts of useless, dust-catching contrivances,—that make one sigh to think of the time and labor they have cost.

Yet we must have money to carry on the work of churches, of charity, of art, of libraries. It is a pity that these things in themselves should not appeal to the generous motives of people, and that there should seem to be any necessity of wheeling the money out of their pockets by apparently giving them a just equivalent for what they purchase, and still leave enough in our hands for the object for which we are trying to raise funds. It may be true, as many claim, that only by a fair can money be raised in certain cases; but it is equally true that, if the time, labor, and actual cost are counted, it is the most expensive way of raising money.

There are many, however, who argue that, though costly in one way, the fair has its compensations. It creates an esprit de corps among church workers: it brings people of all classes together in behalf of a common object. It creates good fellowship,—when it does not engender hard feelings and jealousies; and at the close of a successful fair there is a genial sense of comradeship and mutual congratulation which even the offices of the pulpit too often fail to produce. That is the best side of fairs.

But could not these be engendered in some other way? Concerts, lectures, even with home talent, or some other form of educative entertainment, may have in some churches taken the place of the annual fair. If there must be sales and bazaars, let them be reserved for rare and special necessities. One of the delights of the old-fashioned country winters used to be the singing-school and the concert at the end, which paid a handsome sum into the treasury of the church.

If there is a deep realization of what a church fair stands for, it is possible, after estimating the amount needed for various purposes, to collect it in small sums from the whole society, without recourse to these forms of money-making. This has been done with good success in some parishes. The ladies of the parish are asked how much they would contribute to a fair, and instead have been urged to give the value of the materials they would have used in money. Sometimes, as in the case of farmers' wives who have as a rule little enough spending money, that has been impossible. In those cases the products they could furnish—eggs, butter, cake, or whatever it might be—have been purchased by the committee and the money turned into the treasury direct without the intervention of a fair. Yet, conversely, we occasionally hear of people who have money given outright for a special object; and some would-be church speculator has bought with it sundry articles to stock a fair, and thus run the risk of losing on the original gift. At a time when the most astute business men find it hard to make a profit on their goods, it is doubly risky to expect to make large sums on small sales.

It is not, however, the extravagance of the fair or bazaar that is its worst feature. It is that people, instead of being inspired to give to a good cause, even if it involves self-sacrifice, are allowed to believe they are giving to support the church or the Alliance or the Sunday-school, when they simply make a purchase for their own use. And it is also an objection that it allows the women who contribute the articles to get wrong impressions of the commercial value of the materials they use and the time they expend. The church fair, properly conducted, may not be morally objectionable; but it is an expensive and laborious way of raising money.

WHY DR. GREGG RANG THE BELL.

Rev. Dr. Gregg of the Lafayette Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn has made a reputation in Boston and New York for his independent sounding of the gospel trumpet; and now he seems to be equally efficient as a gospel bell-ringer. The bell he has been ringing is that of All Souls' Unitarian Church in Washington, and the incident is dramatically related in the New York Tribune of last Saturday:—

There was a sensation last Sunday evening in the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, in Brooklyn, when Dr. Gregg told how he rang a church bell in the city of Washington. The sensation assumed the form of incipient applause. Had it been a week evening, the applause would have made the rafters of the old church ring.

The doctor was urging on Christians the duty of giving expression to their faith in God. His text was Psalm cvii. 2, "Say so." In speaking of the way Satan silences the witnesses of God, he told the incident of his ringing the church bell. "When I was in Washington, I went up to the roof of that towering bank building, the Washington Trust Company. Standing there, one has a bird's-eye view of the national city of the republic. The sight is full of beauty. It is grand and inspiring. It makes one feel proud that he is an American. Before me was the Capitol, with its vast dome,—$17,000,000 in massive stones. Beyond it was the new Congressional Library,—$6,000,000 in dazzling whiteness. Off in the distance was the White House. Shooting up into the sky was the great shaft of the Washington Monument; while stretched out at its base were the shining waters of the Potomac, quietly floating down toward Mount Vernon. But what interested me more that day than anything else was a little church to the left,—All Souls' Church. It is scarcely visible among the imposing government buildings of the city. In the tower of that church there hangs an historic bell, and it is this bell which makes the little church an object of interest. This bell was cast in the foundry established by Paul Revere. When John Brown of Harper's Ferry was hanged, this bell tolled his death knell. All Washington heard it as it tolled. Its solemn sound, announcing the fall of the champion of liberty, set the people who walked the streets thinking and asking questions relative to the crime of slavery inflicted upon the black man. People all over the country were thinking. I was a lad that day in the preparatory school, and I remember how we boys talked over the execution of that gray-headed old man. The hour set for his execution was an hour of hush in the school-room. There was a stillness in the school which every boy felt, and it told on our after lives. The tolling of his death knell, as the historic bell fearlessly rang it out, was heard in the White House and in the homes of all the government officials; and for its faithfulness the bell was silenced by the administration.

"I said to myself, 'If I do not see another thing in Washington, I shall go and see that bell.' And go to see it I did. There was not a soul in the church, but the church door was wide open. It was noon. I looked up into the belfry, and saw it from the outside; but that did not satisfy me. I wanted to see it from the inside. I wanted to lay my hands upon it and bless it. Entering the church, I climbed the stairs to the belfry; but, alas! the upper belfry door was shut and locked. But there was the bell-rope reaching down to the floor of the lobby. The temptation was irresistible. I found myself saying: 'Old bell, there is not power enough in the government of the United States to silence you to-day. You and I have always been the friends of John Brown. Now let us 'Say so!' Listen, all Washington! Listen, and you shall hear the name of one of the grandest of American heroes pronounced, just now, with honor and affection!'

"Having made this little patriotic address, I took hold of the bell-rope, and pulled it with all my might, once, twice, thrice. As I looked up and listened, between each pull of the rope, I heard up there the grand old bell, with its tongue of eloquence, pronounce in clear tones, which could be heard at the White House and in the Capitol and away down the Potomac, the name of the long-fallen leader of liberty whose soul is marching on. There was no mistake about it. As I listened, I heard it call out the old man's name, as it swung to and fro: 'John Brown!' 'John Brown!' 'John Brown!' When I had made Washington City hear that honored name once more, and that from the very bell which the United States government had once silenced, I felt that I had done my duty for one day; and I turned, and left the church.

"The sexton of the church was down street during my visit. When the bell rang out into the air the name of the hero of Harper's Ferry, he recognized its familiar tones, and in alarm flew up to the church. He reached it just as I was leaving it; and, all out of breath, he greeted me, 'Some one has been ringing the church bell.'

"'Yes,' I replied, 'I rang it; and I rang it in honor of John Brown!'

"'Good for you!' was his response; and I said, 'Amen!' And this closed the church service of that day.

"Every man who has an experience to relate in honor of Jesus Christ is a gospel bell. God forbid that any power on earth or under the earth should be allowed to silence a single gospel bell! My aim is to keep all the gospel bells of Christendom ringing, that God may be magnified among men, and that all mankind may be called to salvation!"

Dr. Gregg is not likely to be tried for heresy for ringing a Unitarian church bell; and we are sure that the trustees of the church will not prosecute him, nor will the government send him to Fort Warren. It is the same old bell, but it rings out on a different atmosphere. Its tongue is now free to tell its story. It will not be true to its traditions if it does not always make a proclamation of liberty and humanity. And him that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

Musings.

ONE day last week my ship came in,—not a ship, but a steamer. It brought me three letters, which I found lying on my desk. One was from Greece, another from Italy, and another from France. The letter from Greece proved to be from my friend, the eminent German archæologist, Dr. Wilhelm Dörpfeld. It brought Germany and Greece together in happy association. The letter from Italy came from an Italian lady in Florence whom I rank among the world's nobility, and the envelope from France contained two letters, one from a French Nightingale and the other from a Butterfly, as I have been accustomed to designate them.

THE letter from Greece carried me back to a delightful sojourn in that land, and to the kindly hospitality of the German Archæological Institute. There was the trip through the Peloponnesus and among the isles of the Ægean with Dr. Dörpfeld, and the memory of the sermons in stones which he so beautifully rendered at Mycæne, Tiryns, Epidaurus, Megalopolis, and Delos, and at last the identification of the Homeric city at Troy, where I had the pleasure of being the first American to see the result of Dr. Dörpfeld's surprising work. With it all came back the softness of the Greek climate, the beauty of landscapes, the impressiveness of ancient ruins, and the generosity, kindness, and friendship of Dr. Dörpfeld. The letter closed with the pleasing intelligence that next fall Dr. Dörpfeld is coming to America for a few weeks to accept an invitation long urged upon him to lecture before some American colleges. No man in this century has made such a contribution to Greek archæology and its scientific interpretation as Dr. Dörpfeld. And it is a great stroke of enterprise for the American colleges to secure him.

THE letter from Italy brought back again the rich associations of Florence,—the Tribune, the Pitti, the cathedral, the Campanile, the Arno, and Fiesole. But I have a picture before my eye and another photographed on my memory of two faces more living and as sweet as any to be found in the Pitti Palace. I would not exchange the pictures for any one of the Madonnas in the galleries, much as I love them. The sunshine, the warmth, the joy of Italy furnished the atmosphere; but the aureole is the light which is radiated by a beautiful personality. That is a crown of life which can never be put on outside: it is kindled from within. The two faces in my mental picture represent one a mother and the other a daughter, and I am accustomed to say that one can hardly know the best that is in Florence without knowing them.

THE Nightingale and the Butterfly brought on their wings the greeting and the suggestion of beautiful Paris. Externally, Paris, I maintain, is the most beautiful city in the world. But one who sees Paris from the outside, as the tourist generally does, only sees the shell. Paris is not only beautiful streets and noble buildings. Paris, like Florence, means to me personality. If there is a dark and turbid side to its life, there is a side that is bright, transparent, and beautiful. The French character, like the American, is more rapid, excitable, and mercurial than either the English or German. It has something of the warmth of the southern nations; but it is not thereby wholly superficial and trivial. Strength and solidity, moral earnestness, sincerity and poise of character, I do not know where to find better exemplified than in the Nightingale of Notre Dame de Champs. And then the Butterfly, coming from the south of France, light and gay, is a scherzo rather than an andante, but with serious aims in life, and with so much soul that one is reminded that the Greeks used the same word for "soul" and "butterfly," suggesting the combination "Psychic Papillon." So, when I think of Notre Dame in Paris, I think not merely of the great cathedral, but of a home in Notre Dame de Champs, as the street is called, and of the purity, devotion, and affection which centred in the family there.

And, when I think of the many other noble French men and women I met in Paris, the view I get of the city and of France, when taken from the altitude of these characters, is a great deal higher than one can get from the Eiffel Tower; and the foundations go even deeper.

PAUL, in his letters to the Corinthians, makes no mention of its ancient temple, whose monolithic columns still stand; and, when he writes to the Romans, he does not speak of the Forum, the Coliseum, or the Palace of the Caesars. But he has a long list of salutations to send to Priscilla and Aquila, to Mary and Andronicus and Junia, to Amplias, Urbane, Rufus, and the rest; and he is glad of the coming of Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, "for they have refreshed my spirit and yours." More than stones and temples, it was personality that loomed up in the mind and heart of Paul. So, as I think of the Old World, it is not merely to think of its temples and its ruins, its galleries and its landscapes, but to think still more of the ties of friendship which are linked all the way from France to Italy, from Greece to Hungary,—fresh memories of which have been vividly renewed by Mr. Lyon's charming letters,—from Hungary to Germany, and from Germany to England and the north of Scotland.

Brevities.

September lingers in the lap of November.

The Seniors of the medical department of the University of Michigan have chosen a Chinese girl to be secretary of the class. This is a credit to the girl and a credit to the students.

The Investigator has investigated the life hereafter. It has held a symposium on the subject. Some of the answers are positive denials of a future existence for man, others are agnostic, and a few are hopeful. One of them says, "I, as a materialist, rest confidently in such a hope."

There is the church boss as well as the political boss, and sometimes both are combined in one person. He appeared in a virulent form in a Vermont Congregational church, and turned out the minister because he was a Democrat. He publicly declared, "I would rather cut off my right hand than hear the gospel preached by a Democrat."

Referring to the "Musings" on the tooth-pick shoe, a correspondent thinks that the true history of a horse's foot is that the four toes of the primitive horse have "aborted," the middle toe of the five, only, persisting in the hoof of the modern horse. Whatever the history of the horse's foot, it can, like the human foot, easily be spoiled with bad shoeing.

The Investigator is rather hard on the ministers. It finds encouragement in the fact that many clergymen are finding it difficult to obtain positions, and it gleefully hopes that "many of them will be compelled by absolute necessity to earn their living by some useful occupation." We wonder how these unemployed ministers would rank the Investigator in the scale of utilities.

Long in the Year Book of the American Unitarian Association have we seen the name of "Thomas Treadwell Stone, D.D., ordained 1824." The name will be missed from the roll of the honored patriarchs of Unitarianism in the issue to come. Dr. Stone has passed away in the serenity and beauty of his old age. Those who had the good fortune to live within the influence of his personality will miss the man, as others miss the name. In our next issue we shall publish a fitting tribute to his memory from one who knew him in his home and study, as well as in his public career.

Mr. Kimball's comparison of the Unitarian churches to the United States seems to us to tell rather against his argument than for it. Shall we say because the United States are forty-four in number they do not constitute a nation? The right of local government is maintained; but it is something more to be a citizen of the nation than of any one State. We need have no more fear of a church with a big "C" than of a nation with a big "N," especially when we are at liberty to put into the word the meaning conferred by Unitarianism, and not that imposed by other religious bodies.

Pro and Con.

SHALL WE REMAIN CONGREGATIONALISTS?

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

I hope it may not seem invidious against other excellent things to make the distinction; but to an outsider, reading carefully the proceedings of the late Conference at Washington, the paper which stands out pre-eminent for its historical interest and its pertinency to our own immediate condition is that of Mr. Hosmer on "Our Congregational Polity." It touches exactly what an experience and observation of thirty-five years among our societies have confirmed as the one great source of their weakness,—the many of them that have departed from Congregationalism in everything except the name, and in which the trustees, or, it may be, the corporation, are just as much popes and star-chambers as any that ever existed in Romanism or Episcopacy. In early Puritan Congregationalism the religious society or parish covered the whole town; and its interests and needs were voted upon by all the citizens precisely the same as its secular affairs, and racy enough some of their proceedings were. With the growth of the country, this had to be given up; but, with some gain, it was in other respects a distinct loss, helped on that separation of religion from business by which each has been equally a sufferer, and prevented the town idea from playing the conspicuous part in ecclesiasticism that it has in civil government. In Orthodoxy the church, as distinct from the congregation, took charge of its special religious interests, though even there the congregation for the most part kept control of its larger interests; but in Unitarianism, while the church in this sense has become almost a nonentity, the corporation too often has taken charge of both, leaving the congregation to be only attendants on the services. What we need is to get rid of Corporationism and get back to Congregationalism. It is a great deal more than a mere matter of polity. It is a matter of life. The seat of all religious authority ought to be where the seat of all religious life is,—in the individual man. The difficulty is precisely the same as that which makes the problem of our large cities, the separation of the common people from the management of their affairs by leaving them to aldermen and councils, till now the people cannot be got to the polls. To keep an American citizen interested in anything, he must be kept interested in its management. When we were children, the best part of Thanksgiving was to be around with our mothers in the kitchen, helping to make the goodies,—was ourselves having "a finger in the pie." And now we are grown up, and the pie is the gospel, the principle is the same; and, no matter how rich it is made for us, or how much in our big Conference dining-rooms we pass resolutions of its being filled with love to man, never will it have all its sweetness and draw around it all the children till down in our Congregational kitchens they can all have again a finger in its making.

Consistently with this idea, is not Rev. Mr. Hosmer correct in what he says about "a big C Unitarian Church"? Its use is aping those bodies whose fundamental principle of government is different from ours, and which, consistently with it, have a right to the name. There is and can be, under the Congregational idea, no "Unitarian" Church. What with others is the Church is with us, as we have very properly named it, "a conference of churches." It is as incongruous to speak of "the Unitarian Church" as it would be to call our country "the United State."

Rev. Mr. Calthrop's word, however, about the need among us of officers having the function of bishops is not necessarily a departure from Congregationalism, if it be provided that they get their authority, as the minister does, from the churches they are to serve. It is when the bishop controls the churches, and not they him, that the office becomes objectionable. A rudder is a good appendage with which to move a ship when there is somebody on the ship to move the rudder; but it is the worst of all things when it becomes fixed in its place, and is what the intelligence of the ship can no longer control.

J. C. KIMBALL.

THE GOSPEL OF ART.

Work thou for pleasure: paint or sing or carve
The thing thou lovest, though the body starve.

Who works for glory misses oft the goal;
Who works for money coins his very soul.

Work for the work's sake, then; and it may be
That these things shall be added unto thee.

—Kenyon Cox.

GENOA.

BY AUGUSTA LARNED.

If you wish to know how modern an old city can look, come to Genoa. Here you will find electric lights, electric trams, bicycles, open omnibuses that resemble our street-cars, and a stir of business not unlike that prevailing in some of our Western towns. But the street cries, the cracking of the coachmen's long whips, and the mingling of soldiers with civilians would soon bring you back to a consciousness of Italy, even were not the air and the sun, the verdure, and the architecture so utterly unlike anything we have at home. The busy modernity, absent from so many quiet Italian cities, is in Genoa only a veneer. The heart of the city is very old. From any bit of rising street—and everything does rise in Genoa—you see wedges of old, brown, decrepit roofs, that bulk among the newer buildings splashed with their little courts and garden greenery, and which show the remains of the old city of the doges. Such places are not more clean or odorous than other archaic parts of foreign towns; but the city, as a whole, is very clean.

At first, on landing, we met our old acquaintances, the customs' officers,—the same suspicious, prying, obtuse species that live on the docks in New York, and are to be found in every other port of the world. These gentry insisted that we smoked, and must be smuggling in cigarettes. They opened every bag and bundle of scraps and necessities to find the prohibited weed, but could not lay their claws even on a bottle of Florida water or a pack of playing cards. Why their fury is so hot against Florida water we could not discover. The custom-house Cerberus does not eat you alive: he only leaves you with a rumpled and disordered trunk and a good deal of frilling to your temper.

We had left July in New York on the first day of the abortive race between the "Valkyrie" and the "Defender." We found an even more fervid July in Genoa, where it had not rained for nearly three months and there were fears of a water famine. But the New York heat was not all we found. Other old acquaintances were ready to welcome us. We could hardly believe for a moment that we had not landed at Sandy Hook, greeted as we were at once by these buzzing familiars. Their voices were just as exasperating and unmusical as those of our old house-mates at home, their probosces as skilful at blood-letting, and they do not dip their colors even to the American cousin. The Italian flea, supposed to be the wicked one of Holy Writ, pales before the Italian mosquito; and no charm of climate or loveliness of golden haze or tender blue can compensate for the nightly pest. The Italians seem to cherish much the same fiction in regard to the mosquito as in regard to the cold. If you ignore a thing long enough, it does not exist for you. You do not hear complaints. It is patienza in this, as in other things that cannot be helped.

In Genoa you look about for the superb city of the old doges and a great historic past; and you find its remains in the little Via Balbi, the street of old palaces and faded magnificence. Genoa was always a commercial city. Its burghers were fond of fighting, also of getting and spending. It created no school of art. Most that it possesses in the way of pictures or statuary was bought or borrowed; but it could afford a grandiose and costly style of architecture, as its fine palaces still attest. They are especially distinguished for noble courtyards and staircases. The Palazzo Du Razzo-Pallavicini is in the noblest style. Its grand entrance is like a poem of the old time, when doges, with their velvets and gold chains, trailed up and down, and ladies as fair as Desdemona or Juliet leaned over the marble balustrade. Such a house is not livable, if one may coin a word: it is only showable. Not a nook or corner for comfort, or where a mouse could rear her family with a sense of domesticity, but magnificent and satisfying in a large repose, an adequate and just ostentation. The perfect proportions of the rooms, the rich yet rather sparse decorations, the coved-ceilings painted mythologically, as all great houses are in Italy, the mosaic floors, the amplitude and lavish waste of room,—all bespeak an existence in no sense modern, but fitted to the slow and stately ceremonial of other days.

It is hard to picture the existence of a modern woman in such a place. Do children ever cry or romp in these great, stately rooms, with their crowded memories that always seem to hold finger on lip? They are so far removed from anything simple, homely, and natural, one fails to imagine a work-table or a tea-table in any corner, or how that tangled web of tears and smiles and sorrows and rejoicings of fun and tragedy called human life can ever go on inside these walls.

And yet how alluringly beautiful they are, with their exquisite gardens adorned with mossy fountains and old statuary and crowded with palm-trees and ilexes and the jointed cypress! It is the realization of our dreams of Italy, something mysterious and remote from the every-day life we know.

The old palaces are the things best worth seeing in Genoa, even though their vaunted original pictures, by great masters, are mainly copies, and not all good copies at that. The stock sights of a foreign city are not those most to be enjoyed. Generally, the things and places that linger lovingly in your memory are those you find out for yourself, and that smell least of the guide-book. The element of surprise counts for a great deal in one's pleasure. Thus I would give five hours spent in the Campo Santo of Genoa for one spent on the hill drive about the city called by the long name of Circonvallazione del Monte. This exquisite road, one of the loveliest in the world, has been nearly twenty years in building, having been projected in 1876; and it is not yet finished. A superb piece of engineering, it has carried with it a new city, whole districts rendered habitable on these dizzy heights by the steam-tram. Beautiful gardens and plaisances are carried up with the great stucco apartment houses, and the clean, bright streets that come into neighborhood with the Apennines, the sea, and harbor, and large villa suburbs planted in olive orchards and vineyards, with outlooks that afford unrivalled views over a wide extent of sea and land. It is a series of hanging gardens; but the gardens are the fringe of a beautiful city, and, turn where you will, the prospect is enchanting. The Apennines are at the back door, the sea at the front door, of Genoa. No divorce has been proclaimed from this smiling, delicious nature. Every spare nook is a little plot of flowers and beautiful greenery, with a fountain and benches for the repose of the wayfarer. The upper streets are lined with the Spanish chestnut, in full bearing. The linden is also a favorite shade-tree; and between all the white, yellow, and gray houses, old convent walls, and against church towers rises the pointed cypress, with its dark blue-green contrast.

You descend easily to the drive along the bay. A mile of unbroken sea view and sea air in the heart of a big, bustling city like Genoa is no small blessing to its people.

After you have enjoyed these drives, you feel that you have skimmed the cream of the Genoese pan; but the Campo Santo remains. You may not have a taste for graveyards and mortuary marbles, still you must see it. It is a piece of ostentation that only the greatest port of Italy could afford. An immense cemetery, where the poorer and humbler people lie, their graves marked by simple crosses and touching tributes of affection, is entirely surrounded by a grandiose marble colonnade, double lined with the most remarkable collection of statues and monuments to be seen. A few are appropriate and in good taste; but the greater part are of an execrable style, and seem sadly to illustrate the decadence of Italian art. But, surely, these works were not executed by artists, but by clever handicraftsmen, who knew how to make a similitude of bodies devoid of souls. Wearisome is the number of stone babies and overdressed children kissing stone papas and mammas, grandmas, sisters, cousins, and aunts, who themselves might stand for modiste's lay figures. The display of modes for the past thirty or forty years is depressing. Laces, buttons, fichus, fringes, flounces, ruffles, and frills are given to perfection. There is portraiture in abundance, but it is worse than the stone millinery. A mortuary fashion show! A magazine des modes in marble! This is the impression you bring away from all these misdirected efforts. But there is one fact that seems to glorify the Campo Santo of Genoa for those who love the idea of Italian liberty, and still seem to feel the heart-beats of her heroes through their ashes. Mazzini is buried there. Genoa cherishes the memory of Mazzini. A beautiful arcade bears his name, and there are other tokens that he did not live or die in vain.

The churches did not occupy us long. The cathedral is small, but more interesting than the gorgeous Annunziata, heavily overlaid with gilding and finished like a jewel-box. The big, bustling city shows no such miserable class of poor Italians as those who come to America to dig and delve and build our railways and do our heavy, dirty work. But poor there must be, of a wretched kind; for some of the streets where they live in the old town are like cracks in the thick walls, only fit to harbor spiders and lizards, and yet human beings exist in these sunless, airless passages, babies are born there, the middle-aged and the old, if ever they do grow old, live and die there. It is with a heart-pang that one remarks the crowds of soldiers who throng the streets, and reflects on the hideous poverty that reigns in many places, due to this over-armed and over-taxed Italy.

We were in Genoa on the 20th of September, the national holiday, commemorative of the entrance of Victor Emanuel into Rome. It was pleasant to see how the Italians took their pleasures, how orderly, how sober, how quiet, was their enjoyment, and how genuine their patriotism. This year's anniversary was especially marked as completing the quarter-century from the liberation of the capital. The whole peninsula was unusually stirred with patriotic fervor. For days the railway service, easily overstrained at any time, was put to its utmost resources to accommodate the crowds who streamed toward Rome. The clericals, of course, deemed the demonstration unseemly; but their protests were lost in the acclamations that went up for United Italy. Genoa tricked herself with flags all over the shipping in the harbor, on the streets, in the squares and gardens. Everywhere broke out the red, white, and green colors that suit so well the pure contrasts of sun and sky, pale or white walls, brown roofs, and rich clumps of verdure. In the evening there was a beautiful illumination of the city.

RUSSIAN ART AND ARTISTS.

BY SOPHIE FRIEDLAND.

Kramskoi, like nearly all our great artists, has sprung up from a lower and poorer class of society. He was born in 1837, in the province of Voronezh, of poor parents. He first went to a grammar school, then to a gymnasium (high school), from each of which he graduated with a gold medal. Until he was sixteen years old nobody, not even himself had ever noticed any particular talent or inclination for drawing or painting. But the first touch of the brush pronounced him an artist. Still, he had no desire to develop his talent: his sole ambition was to become a student at the university,—an ambition that could not be gratified on account of his mother's poverty. He became apprenticed, first to a village painter, then to a photographer, where he earned three roubles a month. In 1857 we find him a student at the Academy in St. Petersburg; and five years later he received a medal for the picture we notice as we pass into the gallery of Biblical paintings,—a picture called "Moses drawing Water from the Stone."

Mr. Constantin Makovsky has been called the "Painter with the Enchanted Brush"; and, indeed, as we look at the four panels representing scenes from the Greek mythology, we do not wonder at the name. The figures of the gods and goddesses, of the shepherds and shepherdesses, do not seem to be painted: they seem to be thrown on the canvas by a magic hand. The critics mostly praise Mr. Makovsky's imagination and his coloring, but now and then we hear a reproach as to his drawing. The fact is, he works too quickly. He is an artist who has a beautiful, fashionable wife; and he needs a great deal of money. I am told he makes a hundred thousand roubles a year, and he spends every copeck of it.

Mr. V. G. Vereschagin and his works are nearly as well known across the ocean as they are here. No doubt, Mr. Vereschagin is a great artist, but he can hardly be called a national one. He has none of the tendencies of the Russian artist; for nearly every painting of his reminds us of the pronounced passion of the great French painter for ethnographical types and the anecdotal side of the chosen subject. A look at his Oriental paintings will convince us that Vereschagin also has concentrated his sole interest on the reproduction of the ethnographical type. And nearly all his best pictures bear the same melodramatic character. Heaps of dead bodies, vast, snowy deserts, human brutality, destruction, misery, and suffering form the main subject of his paintings. The impression they leave is an unpleasant one, and those who have a preference for historical pictures turn with pleasure to the productions of Mr. V. G. Schwartz.

Although the brilliant career of Mr. Schwartz was cut short by an untimely death, it has undoubtedly left indelible traces in Russian art. Born in the wild regions of the Caucasus, where his father served as a general of the Cossacks, the boy became early acquainted with the agitated disturbances of a military life, which made a deep impression on his mind. At the age of three the walls of his nursery—to the great annoyance of his governess, a prim Englishwoman—were covered with drawings of soldiers, horses, ramparts, and mountains. Years later, at the lyceum in Moscow, his sketches in pen and ink, representing war scenes, were the delight of his comrades. His illustration of "Wallenstein's Camp," now in the possession of the academy, dates from that time.

After a brilliant examination he leaves the lyceum, and for some months he occupies a public office; but this is not the work to his taste, particularly as it leaves him little time for his beloved art. He gratifies the wish of his father, and enters the university for a course of studies in history and philology. Meanwhile his art has progressed as much as his studies in history; and now at last he enters the academy. His wonderful innate talent, however, forces him to give up his professors, and to plunge into a sphere of subjects which till that time no artist had regarded with the eyes of a realist. "The Meeting of Prince Svjatoslav with Tsimischy," "The Entry of Schuisky and De la Gardie in Moscow," the scenes taken from our historical dramas, are masterpieces of which the National Gallery might well be proud.

Some years ago it became the fashion for our great artists to paint scenes from the life of that monster who in Russian history is called Ivan the Terrible. Makovsky, Repine, Gé, and others have furnished the czar's galleries with pictures that have revived the interest of the public for ancient history; but Mr. Schwartz, in attempting his historical-psychological picture, "Ivan the Terrible before the Murdered Body of his Son," has been the messenger of a new era in Russian art.

Another representative of realism in Russian art is Mr. Repine, the painter of "The Cossacks' Answer," a picture which has found a great many admirers in the Russian section at the Columbian Exposition. "The Cossacks' Answer" is a masterpiece; but, like a great many others, it is too typically Russian to be understood by all. Mr. Repine's picture represents a crowd of Cossacks surrounding a Russian scribe, to whom they have confided the task of writing an insolent letter to his Turkish Majesty. The smile of amusement in the face of every one, as he puts in a word which he thinks would add to the strength of the letter, and principally the half-cunning, half-stupid expression of the Russian peasant writer, shows how well Mr. Repine renders typical expressions.

I, for my own part, prefer "The Cossacks' Answer" by far to the picture of "Ivan the Terrible stabbing his Son." Czar Alexander III. has bought this masterpiece of artistic realism at the price of seventy-five thousand roubles, but I doubt whether he has put it into his reception-room.

Russian art has this strange peculiarity,—that it belongs to no school, has no tendencies, at least none that could be compared to the tendencies of European art. Russian art does not subject itself to any principles. In fact, Russian art represents nothing but a poetical and genial artistic disorder.

BOSTON UNITARIAN CLUB.

WHAT SPIRITUAL SERVICE CAN THE UNITARIAN CHURCH RENDER?

The monthly session of the Unitarian Club was held at the Hotel Vendome on the evening of Wednesday, the 13th, the president, Hon. Roger Wolcott, in the chair. In opening the meeting, Lieut. Gov. Wolcott said:—

During the last two weeks there have been coming to us, on the printed pages of daily or weekly newspaper or in the speech of those whom we meet in the cars or in the street, reports of the intense interest and zeal which characterized the recent National Conference at Washington. One of the prominent benefits of a National Conference is not in the discovery or enunciation of new truth, so much as in bringing together men who are working in one faith and along the lines of a common purpose, that they may touch elbows and be brought in contact with that spirit which inspires large bodies of men.

The subject which has been assigned for discussion to-night is "What Spiritual Service can the Unitarian Church render to the American People?" It is a question which can be, and doubtless will be, answered in many ways. We Unitarians are pretty well assured already that the Unitarian Church has in its time rendered important spiritual service to the people of America. That service consists not alone in virtuous living or in good citizenship, for those are not the sole possession of any creed or any denomination. We may perhaps say that it has been rendered by bringing man more directly to his Maker, without the intermediary of creed or dogma, and also in not emphasizing so much the mystery of the divine incarnation of Christ as in laying emphasis on the brotherhood of Christ, and in making his life and his example and his teachings very near and very real to all mankind.

The president then introduced Rev. George Batchelor, secretary of the American Unitarian Association.

ABSTRACT OF ADDRESS BY REV. GEORGE BATCHELOR.

A year ago last month I had the honor to report in this place something concerning our eventful meeting at Saratoga. I come now to report in regard to a still more eventful meeting lately held in the city of Washington, not regarding the detail of work, but in regard to the total effect and the suggestion that is made to us concerning our own forward movement, our responsibility, and our duty. Many described that eventful hour at Saratoga, when for once in the history of the Unitarian Church in America our men and women, with tears, with cries of applause, with hand shaking hand, gave way to an outburst of enthusiasm such as is not common to our self-contained New England Puritan nature,—many described that as a high tide. And a high tide, you know, always suggests an ebb tide. I have now to report, Mr. President and gentlemen, that, instead of an ebb tide, or a tide flowing backward and forward with no meaning or purpose, it is a stream of which the volume has been increased, because the head-waters are filling. That which was a temporary mood of excitement and enthusiasm at Saratoga was taken for granted at Washington,—a solid basis of confidence, enthusiasm, expectation; and every day we reached some mountain peak, some nobler outlook into the world around us and the heavens above us.

Now I am to speak upon the spiritual service which the Unitarian Church can render to the people of America. What I mean by the word "spiritual" is just that which is suggested in the life of every man and woman who attempts at all to live the true life,—the feeling which sometimes impresses itself in a wonderful way in the "I will" which the young man utters when he takes the hand of the woman to whom he has given himself; a feeling that arises in the heart of a man when he looks into the eyes of his baby-boy or baby-girl, and says, "For the sake of this child I will be a better man"; the feeling that changes a commonplace man, when he comes face to face with the law of duty, into a hero, a patriot, who is ready to die for his country, and to rejoice in that death. It is that touch of something mysterious which rises in the heart of the politician and makes him a statesman, a pure-hearted and upright leader of men, having before him the ideal of a country which is not a mere aggregation of men, women, and children. From this point of view it is that I speak. For it is this subtle something in the heart of man which furnishes him the means of inter-communication between heaven and earth, which gives to all common life its glory, its beauty, and its power. It is no airy abstraction: it is a reality of the real life of the common man. Now what is the service which can be rendered?

Let me add one word more to indicate my point of view. It seems to me that the declaration of our religious purpose and spirit which was made at Saratoga marks for our Church a crisis at the end of its first hundred years of history in this country, and, more than that, that it is one of the things which at last have made it clear to men in our time that, when this generation goes into history, when time enough has passed so that the majestic work done in the latter part of this century shall appear, it will be seen as an age of religion, an age of heroism, an age of spiritual discovery. I verily believe that greater progress has been made in the interpretation of the spirit of religion in the last fifty years than in any thousand years before, and that, when the record is made up, it will stand to the ages to come as an age of revelation to be compared only with some of the great historical religious epochs of the past.

The revelation that has been made to us in the doctrine of evolution that religion is one of the most potent forces in the advancing life of man, and has been through all the past,—this revelation suggests always that a new service is to be rendered. We have come to the time when we see the vacant place, not filled to-day by any church in the land. There is a chance for spiritual leadership. Where is the church that will rise to the level of the opportunity? Shall it be the Roman Catholic Church or the Episcopal Church or the Congregational Church or the Universalist Church or the Unitarian Church? It may be one, it may be several; but the probability is that, in accordance with the law of evolution, some existing institution will feel the impulse and the power of this new revelation, and that those who have the work in hand will step forward to lead. What shall the service be?

In the briefest words possible I shall say that it will consist of three things. In the first place, it will be an explanation of all the religious history of the past. The principal obstacle to the advance of liberal religion in this country is the unfounded fear in the hearts of the majority that our success means the destruction of the things dear to them, means the putting aside of all that the past has given. Now, this is not in accordance with the law of evolution. We can render no service to the American people more marked than to make it plain to them that this simple declaration of religion, "love to God and love to man," contains in it the fulfilment of all that went before.

In the next place, to-day the world waits for the men and the church who are able, without circumlocution, without putting any bar before the intellect of man, without demanding assent to anything which is not of the essence of pure religion, without laying any ecclesiastical authority upon the hearts and minds of the people, to show that this spiritual function of the human child of God, exercised, furnishes the solution of all the problems of society, that it furnishes the means of intercommunication between man and man, that it establishes a basis of mutual confidence, and, better still, it shows that all reforms, that all philanthropies, all works of charity, are mere external palliatives, and that the real thing needed is for the Church of God to address itself to discovering what sort of man one ought to be who shall live up to the spirit of this declaration of love to God and love to man.

Doing this, the next service follows as a matter of course. Explaining the past, using the present, we make a programme for the future that shall have in it inspiration and power for all the sons and daughters who are to enter into the inheritance of the twentieth century and possess it.

There are three stages in the reception of this doctrine, or of any doctrine, preparatory to our addressing ourselves to the work in hand. One is the stage of opinion. You assent: "Yes, that is right. Yes, I agree to that; but I go about my business. I leave the care of these things to those who are set in charge." There is another stage,—the stage of belief which becomes operative in a man's life. He has plans to carry out, and the things that he believes he uses to gain the ends that he has in view. He becomes a valuable member of society. But that is not the highest stage. The third stage is that in which a man not merely says he believes, not merely acts upon his belief, but it is the stage of conviction. Those who are to do the world's work must come under conviction of the truth: they must feel that there is laid upon them a compulsion which they cannot resist. With a cheerful outlook into the world, seeing its need, seeing the magnificent inspirations which are now awaiting the world's workers, seeing what can be done by those who are free, who are devout, who are obedient to the law of righteousness, it may well happen that upon every successful and happy man there may be laid this hand of power, so that he shall become a convict of righteousness, a convict of truth.

In introducing Col. Carroll D. Wright, the president explained the absence of Rev. Thomas R. Slicer of Buffalo, and said:—

We have in his place a distinguished son of Massachusetts, who, when summoned to Washington a few years since, carried with him one of the best things to carry to Washington as a part of one's outfit,—an excellent Massachusetts reputation. That State reputation has since grown into national fame. He is occupied there in trying to solve some of the great sociological problems which present the greatest difficulty, next to vice, of our nineteenth century. No greater service can be performed than that which we look to him ultimately to perform in establishing some modus vivendi between the great forces of capital and labor. If he shall promote a better mutual understanding, an abandonment on the one side and on the other of unreasonable demands, or unreasonable response to fair and just demands, he will have rendered to the United States of America and to the world a very distinguished service.

ABSTRACT OF ADDRESS BY COL. CARROLL D. WRIGHT.

Prof. Lester Ward has told us that optimism is born of ignorance, that pessimism is born of oppression, and that under neither of these can there be any satisfactory solution of the great questions that press upon us. We like to be called optimists because the optimist looks forward always to a better state of affairs. The pessimist looks forward always to a continuance of bad conditions. Now, the world cannot succeed under either of these philosophies. A better expression is that of meliorism. Meliorism means a constant and active evolution which will enable us to remove difficulties. Through meliorism, through fighting ever for the better, striving always to bring uppermost the God-like stirring within men, we can remove some of the hardness of this life. So we must neither be optimists nor pessimists, but meliorists, in the sense that we are doing each one his share to carry on the work of the world.

The general principles underlying the question which we have before us to-night are broad and grand; but, if I catch the spirit of this club at all, it is that they expect to have some distinctive suggestion as to what particular service or particular line of service can be rendered toward spiritualizing the American people. The denominational work of the Unitarian Church has been doing this all through its years of existence, is doing it now. The echoes of the Conference at Washington have not died away. The practical and immediate result of some of the sermons and discourses there are grand in themselves. One little instance to illustrate what the power of speech is I can repeat to you. As that vast crowd came out of Metzerott Hall at the close of Mr. Savage's grand gospel of Unitarian faith, a gentleman, accompanied by his wife and two daughters,—the whole family having all their days attended an evangelical church,—said to his wife: "Mary, that is what I believe. I think that is true." And one of the daughters said, "Why, papa, I have always believed that." "Very well," he said, "henceforth we are Unitarians. We will give up our pew, and take one at All Souls'." And they have done it. As a result of that Conference, the Unitarian church in Washington is letting its pews to people who have during their whole lives attended some other church, but who were inspired by the utterances at that Conference or by the character of some of the men who made them.

That is the work which the denomination can do in a national sense. But it can do more. It can teach people the two sides of the great questions that are pressing us by establishing some work of this nature. This club, for instance, can establish somewhere a lectureship which shall do something toward removing the alienation which now exists between all churches and a certain order of the people. You know—and sad it is to know it,—that between the great universities of the country and the churches, on one side, and the working people, the industrial forces, on the other, there has been a feeling of alienation. It is good to know that it is wearing out, and that the ground of sympathy between the universities, the common people, and the Church is strengthening every day. The Church is strengthening every day by step-universities have done their share by step-universities down and helping people up, by university extension, by taking into their curricula the work of social science, by teaching a new political economy, by doing their share as teachers in the great work of melioration. To the Church belongs the preaching of the doctrine of Christ, of those grand principles which, for convenience' sake, we concentrate into the word "Christianity." Now, I would have the Unitarian order take a step in advance. You cannot get these people into your churches: I would therefore bring the churches to them. I would not close a single church in existence: I would open their doors wider. You cannot make changes in your church methods; but you can establish here and there, in the great industrial centres, lectureships, the object and purpose of which shall be to teach the vital and spiritualizing essence of industrial service, as well as of church service. You can teach the work of church service. You can teach the workingman, as Mr. Batchelor said, that there is something on his part to do. You can teach the capitalist and the great employer of labor that there is something on his part to do. You can teach the spirit of that grand man at Washington who settled the great railroad trouble a year ago. The Great Southern Railway, which employs five or six thousand people and controls six thousand miles of track, was besought a year ago to restore the wages of two or three years previous. The manager of that road met the committee who came to the Washington headquarters of the system, and said to them: "I do not blame you, gentlemen, for your demand. All the business of this road shall be laid before you in minute detail; and, if you will come here on such a day, we will meet you and talk it over between ourselves." He was as good as his word: they were as good as theirs. They met; and this great volume of information, brought into compact form, was laid before the men. They had a week of conference. That conference demonstrated the power of ethical forces brought into business relations. And the result was that the men went home, satisfied that the road was doing all in its power, and satisfied, furthermore, that the integrity back of the management was so great that, when an opportunity did come for the restoration of wages, that restoration would be made. That man received his ethical instruction in the Unitarian Church: he embodied in practical work the great principles which underlie our grand faith; and his name is William H. Baldwin, Jr. [Applause.]

To give you another concrete illustration of the power of this faith when put into practical use: I have a friend in Washington, who was a delegate to your Conference the other day, who is the president of a great manufacturing establishment in the West. He told me last year that in twenty-five years' experience they never had had any difficulty in their works. There never had been a strike, there never had been any reduction of wages, during that whole period; and yet there had been a constant reduction in the price of their goods and in their cost. A neighboring establishment has a strike about every year. The manager of this, seeing the prosperity of my friend's establishment and its freedom from difficulties, came to him when they were suffering from a strike, and said: "Colonel, what is the secret of your management? What do you do to escape strikes and these labor troubles?" "Well," the colonel said, "I probably do some things that you would not." "Well, what is that?" I want to learn." "To bring the thing down to a point, let me say that we have now on our pay-roll a man who has been with us twenty years,—a skilful man, who knows his business thoroughly, who has worked for our benefit and our success. We never have reduced his wages. He has been sick on his bed six months, and is likely to be there several months more. Yet his name stays on our pay-roll, and we pay him just the same as ever. Now, you wouldn't do that." "No," he said, "I wouldn't." "Very well," said the colonel, "have your strikes."

